This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

[Weekly Reporter, Oct. 29, 1904.]

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1903-1904

(FIFTY-SECOND YEAR),

CONTAINING

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

WITH

APPEALS TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1903, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1904.

TOGETHER ALSO WITH SOME CASES DECIDED PREVIOUSLY TO THAT PERIOD.

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

A DIGESTED INDEX

AND

A TABLE OF THE NAMES OF ALL CASES

REPORTED DURING THAT PERIOD,

WITH

REFERENCES TO CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS AND PUBLICATIONS.

VOL. LII.

EDITED BY
MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,
OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

LONDON: 27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

1904.

9

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD.,
Printers,
NORWICH STREET, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

94314

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE THIS PAGE

PREFACE.

In the fifty-second volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains a summary of the cases published from the 7th of November, 1903, to the 27th of August, 1904 (both inclusive), in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and from the beginning of September, 1903, to the end of August, 1904, in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports.

JUDGES AND LAW OFFICERS

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1903, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1904.

LORD HALSBURY, LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD MACNAGHTEN,
LORD DAVEY,
LORD ROBERTSON,
LORD LINDLEY,
} LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.
THE LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.
LORD ASHBOURNE,
LORD SHAND,
SIR FORD NORTH,
SIR ANDREW SCOBLE,
SIR ARTHUR WILSON,
SIR JOHN BONSER,
} ADDITIONAL JUDGES ORDINARILY ATTENDING.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE—COURT OF APPEAL.

SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
SIR ROLAND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS,
SIR ROBERT ROMER,
SIR JAMES STIRLING,
SIR JAMES CHARLES MATHEW,
SIR HERBERT HARDY COZENS-HARDY, } LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—CHANCERY DIVISION.

SIR ARTHUR KEKEWICH.
SIR EDMUND WIDDRINGTON BYRNE.
SIR GEORGE FARWELL.
SIR HENRY BURTON BUCKLEY.
SIR MATTHEW INGLE JOYCE.
SIR CHARLES SWINFEN EADY.
SIR THOMAS ROLLS WARRINGTON.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

LORD ALVERSTONE, CHIEF JUSTICE.
SIR ALFRED WILLS.
SIR WILLIAM GRANTHAM.
SIR JOHN COMPTON LAWRANCE.
SIR ROBERT SAMUEL WRIGHT.
SIR GAINSFORD BRUCE.
SIR WILLIAM RANN KENNEDY.
SIR EDWARD RIDLEY.
SIR JOHN CHARLES BIGHAM.
SIR CHARLES JOHN DARLING.
SIR ARTHUR MOSELEY CHANNELL.
SIR WALTER GEORGE FRANK PHILLIMORE.
SIR THOMAS TOWNSEND BUCKNILL.
SIR JOSEPH WALTON.
SIR ARTHUR RICHARD JELF.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

SIR FRANCIS HENRY JEUNE, PRESIDENT.
SIR JOHN GORELL BARNES.

SIR ROBERT BANNATYNE FINLAY, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR EDWARD CARSON, SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

EDITOR AND REPORTERS.

1903–1904.

EDITOR.

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

REPORTERS.

HOUSE OF LORDS	CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
PRIVY COUNCIL	CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. I.)	WILLIAM FREDERICK BARRY, FREDERICK GEORGE RÜCKER, WILLIAM ERSKINE REID, and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. II.)	JAMES IRVINE STIRLING, ALFRED R. TAYLOUR, ROBERT HILL, and ALFRED C. THOMAS, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Justice Joyce	CHARLES WALTER MEAD, ALAN C. NESBITT, and ALFRED C. THOMAS, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Buckley and Mr. Justice Warrington	NEVILLE TEBBUTT, H. L. ORMISTON, and PERCY H. WINFIELD, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Farwell and Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady	ROBERT HILL, HENRY STEPHEN, and PAUL STRICKLAND, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Company Cases	NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Barrister-at-Law.
KING'S BENCH DIVISION	WILLIAM ERSKINE REID, ALAN HOGG, and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
(COMMERCIAL COURT)	W. TREVOR TURTON, Barrister-at-Law.
(BANKRUPTCY CASES)	PAUL M. FRANCKE, Barrister-at-Law.
PROB., DIV., and ADM. DIVISION	GWYNNE HALL, Barrister-at-Law.

A TABLE

OF

THE NAMES OF CASES

REPORTED AND DIGESTED IN THIS VOLUME,

WITH REFERENCES TO THE CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS.

VOL. LII.

NOTE.—In the following Table the cases are arranged in the Alphabetical order of the PLAINTIFFS' names; but for convenience of reference, with respect to cases having double titles—e.g., In re Smith, Brown v. Jones—this Table gives the names of such cases under both titles.

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Acme Wood Flooring Co. v Marten	K.B.D.	—	75	90 L. T. 313
African Gold Recovery Co. v Hay	P.C.	—	178	[1904] A. C. 438
Akrokerri Mines v Economic Bank	K.B.D.	670	7	[1904] 2 K. B. 465
Algoma Central Railway Co. v Rex	P.C.	—	15	[1903] A. C. 478; 72 L. J. P. C. 108; 89 L. T. 100
Allen and Driscoll, In re	C.A.	680	93
Allison, Johnson, & Foster (Limited), In re	K.B.D.	—	30	[1904] 2 K. B. 327
Allman v Hardcastle	K.B.D.	—	112	89 L. T. 553
Alton Urban Council v Spicer	K.B.D.	624	147	[1904] 1 K. B. 678; 73 L. J. K. B. 280; 90 L. T. 576
Amyot v Dwairis	P.C.	—	191	[1904] A. C. 268; 73 L. J. P. C. 40; 90 L. T. 102
Andrew v Failsworth Industrial Society	C.A.	451	100	[1904] 2 K. B. 32; 73 L. J. K. B. 510; 90 L. T. 611
Andrew v Ramsay	K.B.D.	126	139	[1903] 2 K. B. 635; 72 L. J. K. B. 865; 89 L. T. 450
Anglesey (Marquis), In re. De Galve v Gardner	CH.D. BADY, J.	124	149	[1903] 2 Ch. 727; 72 L. J. Ch. 782; 89 L. T. 584
Aplin v Stone	CH.D. BADY, J.	—	189	[1904] 1 Ch. 543; 73 L. J. Ch. 456; 90 L. T. 284
Apollinaris Co. v Norddeutsche Insurance Co.	K.B.D.	174	76	[1904] 1 K. B. 252; 73 L. J. K. B. 62; 89 L. T. 670
"Arne," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	159	[1904] P. 154; 73 L. J. P. 34; 90 L. T. 517
Artizans' Land and Mortgage Corporation, In re	CHD. BYRNE, J.	330	31	[1904] 1 Ch. 796; 73 L. J. Ch. 581
Ashley v Hawke	K.B.D.	—	60	89 L. T. 538
Ashton v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway	K.B.D.	655	144	[1904] 2 K. B. 313; 73 L. J. K. B. 701
Ashworth v English Card Clothing Co. (No. 1)	CHD. JOYCE, J.	507	132	[1904] 1 Ch. 702; 73 L. J. Ch. 274; 90 L. T. 262
—— (No. 2)	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	132	[1904] 1 Ch. 704; 73 L. J. Ch. 282; 90 L. T. 263
Aston Tube Works v Dumbell	K.B.D.	444	41	[1904] 1 K. B. 535; 73 L. J. K. B. 208; 90 L. T. 315
Atkinson, In re. Barbers' Company v Grose-Smith	C.A.	—	5	[1904] 2 Ch. 160; 73 L. J. Ch. 585; 90 L. T. 825
Attorney-General v Ashton Gas Co.	CH.D. BUCK J.	347	61	73 L. J. Ch. 283; 90 L. T. 204
—— v Chamberlain	K.B.D.	—	69	90 L. T. 581
—— v Cobham	K.B.D.	—	67	90 L. T. 816
—— v Londesborough (Earl)	K.B.D.	—	67	[1904] 1 K. B. 749; 73 L. J. K. B. 503
—— v Montague	H.L.	—	68	[1904] A. C. 316; 73 L. J. K. B. 707; 90 L. T. 726
—— v Murray	C.A.	258	68	[1904] 1 K. B. 165; 89 L. T. 710
—— v Northumberland (Duke)	C.A.	518	74	[1904] 1 K. B. 762; 73 L. J. K. B. 418; 90 L. T. 630
—— v Nottingham Corporation	CH.D. FAR. J.	281	124	[1904] 1 Ch. 673; 73 L. J. Ch. 512; 90 L. T. 308
—— v Regent's Canal and Dock Co.	C.A.	211	73	[1904] 1 K. B. 263; 73 L. J. K. B. 50

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Attorney-General v Richmond Corporation	CH. D. EADY, J	—	15	89 L. T. 700
——— v Sandover . . .	K.B.D	573	38	[1904] 1 K. B. 689; 73 L. J. K. B. 478; 90 L. T. 480
——— v Scott . . .	C.A.	—	63	[1904] 1 K. B. 404; 73 L. J. K. B. 196; 89 L. T. 726
——— v Wimbledon House Estate Co. .	CH. D. FAR J.	—	174	[1904] 2 Ch. 34; 73 L. J. Ch. 593
——— for British Columbia v Ostrum	P.C.	—	14	[1904] A. C. 144; 73 L. J. P. C. 11; 89 L. T. 509
——— for Cape of Good Hope v Van Reenan	P.C.	—	17	[1904] A. C. 114; 73 L. J. P. C. 13; 89 L. T. 591
——— for New South Wales v Dickson	P.C.	—	121	[1904] A. C. 273; 90 L. T. 213
——— for Ontario v Hamilton Street Railway Co.	P.C.	—	15	[1903] A. C. 524; 72 L. J. P. C. 105; 89 L. T. 107
Bagg v Colquhoun . .	K.B.D.	494	79	[1904] 1 K. B. 554; 73 L. J. K. B. 272; 90 L. T. 386
Baily v British Equitable Assurance Co. .	C.A.	549	23	[1904] 1 Ch. 374; 73 L. J. Ch. 240; 90 L. T. 335
Baker, In re. Baker v Baker .	CH. D. BUCK. J	213	194	[1904] 1 Ch. 157; 73 L. J. Ch. 172; 89 L. T. 742
Baker v Wicks . . .	K.B.D.	556	149	[1904] 1 K. B. 743; 73 L. J. K. B. 410; 90 L. T. 706
Barnett v Covell . . .	K.B.D.	—	93	90 L. T. 29
Barque "Quilpué" v Brown . .	C.A.	—	162	[1904] 2 K. B. 264; 73 L. J. K. B. 596; 90 L. T. 765
Barr v Craven . . .	C.A.	—	150	89 L. T. 574
Barratt v Great Northern Railway Co. .	K.B.D.	479	145
Barrett v Davies . . .	K.B.D.	607	90	90 L. T. 460
Barrett v Kemp . . .	C.A.	257	104	[1904] 1 K. B. 517; 73 L. J. K. B. 138; 90 L. T. 305
Bartram v Lloyd . . .	C.A.	—	138	90 L. T. 357
Bateman v Hunt . . .	C.A.	609	116
Beachey, In re. Beaton v Beachey .	C.A.	309	119	[1904] 1 Ch. 67; 73 L. J. Ch. 68; 89 L. T. 685
Beard's Trusts, In re. Butlin v Harris .	CHD. BYRNE, J	312	179	[1904] 1 Ch. 270; 73 L. J. Ch. 176; 90 L. T. 274
Beardsley v Giddings . .	K.B.D.	—	4	[1904] 1 K. B. 847; 73 L. J. K. B. 378; 90 L. T 651
Beardsley v Pike . . .	K.B.D.	—	188	90 L. T. 652
Beauchamp, In re. Ex parte Beauchamp	C.A.	545	10	[1904] 1 K. B. 572; 73 L. J. K. B. 311; 90 L. T. 594
Beaumont v Kaye . . .	C.A.	241	99	[1904] 1 K. B. 292; 73 L. J. K. B. 213; 90 L. T. 51
Beeson v Derby Overseers . .	K.B.D.	—	147	89 L. T. 47
Bell v National Provincial Bank .	C.A.	406	70	[1904] 1 K. B. 149; 73 L. J. K. B. 142; 90 L. T. 2
"Benmohr," The . . .	P.D. & A.D.	686	166
Benson v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.	C.A.	243	100	[1904] 1 K. B. 242; 73 L. J. K. B. 122; 89 L. T. 715
Beyfus v Lawley . . .	H.L.	—	129	[1903] A. C. 411; 72 L. J. Ch. 781; 89 L. T. 309
Birmingham Excelsior Money Society v Haywood	C.A.	84	98	[1904] 1 K. B. 35: 73 L. J. K. B. 28; 89 L. T. 656
Bischoff's Trustee v Frank . .	K.B.D.	—	180	89 L T. 188
Bishop Auckland Industrial Society v Butterworth	CH. D. FAR. J	—	116	90 L. T. 149
Blake v Midland Railway . .	K.B.D.	—	101	[1904] 1 K. B. 503; 73 L. J. K. B. 179; 90 L. T. 433
Blovett v Sawyer . .	C.A.	503	104	[1904] 1 K B. 271; 73 L. J. K. B. 155; 89 L. T. 658
Board of Trade v "Glenpark" Sailing Ship	C.A.	646	170	[1904] 1 K. B. 682; 73 L. J. K. B. 315; 90 L. T. 360
Bodega Co., In re . .	CH. D. FAR. J.	249	27	[1904] 1 Ch. 276; 73 L. J. Ch. 198; 89 L. T. 694
Bolton Estates Act, In re. Russell v Meyrick	C.A.	87	173	[1903] 2 Ch. 461; 72 L. J. Ch. 605; 88 L. T. 851
Boord v Huddart . . .	CH. D. EADY, J	—	174	89 L. T. 718
Bothwick v Elderslie Steamship Co. .	C.A	439	160	[1904] 1 K. B. 319; 73 L. J. K. B. 240; 90 L. T. 187
Bostock v Nicholson . .	K.B.D.	—	152	[1904] 1 K. B. 725; 73 L. J. K. B. 524
Boston v Boston . . .	C.A.	65	59	[1904] 4 K. B. 124; 73 L. J. K. B. 17; 89 L. T. 468
Boucas v Cooke . . .	C.A.	99	40	[1903] 2 K. B. 227; 72 L. J. K. B. 741; 88 L. T. 760
Boulton v Houlder & Co. . .	C.A.	388	76	[1904] 1 K. B. 784; 73 L. J. K. B. 493; 90 L. T. 621
Bowden's Patents Syndicate v Smith .	CH. D. WAR. J.	630	126	[1904] 2 Ch. 122; 73 L. J. Ch. 522
Boyce v Paddington (Borough) .	C.A.	114	112	[1903] 2 Ch. 556; 72 L. J. Ch. 695; 89 L. T. 383
Bradbury, In re. Wing v Bradbury .	C.A.	—	197	73 L. J. Ch. 591; 90 L. T. 824
Brandts, Sons, & Co. v Dunlop Rubber Co.	C.A.	501	5	[1904] 1 K. B. 387; 73 L. J. K. B. 247; 90 L. T. 106
Brass v London County Council .	K.B.D.	—	57	[1904] 2 K. B. 336

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Breadalbane v Stewart	H.L.	—	153	[1904] A. C. 217
Brigg v Thornton	C.A.	276	81	[1904] 1 Ch. 386; 73 L. J. Ch. 301; 90 L. T. 327
Bright & Co. v Sellar	C.A.	148	136	[1904] 1 K. B. 6; 72 L. J. K. B. 809; 89 L. T. 431
Bright's Trustee v Sellar	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	131	[1904] 1 Ch. 369; 73 L. J. Ch. 245; 90 L. T. 155
Brinckman v Matley	CH.D.BUCK,J.	363	59	73 L. J. Ch. 160; 90 L T. 199
Brinklow v Singleton. In re Dunn	CHD.BYRNE,J	345	149	[1904] 1 Ch. 648; 73 L J. Ch. 425
British Home for Incurables v Royal Hospital for Incurables	C.A.	—	17	90 L. T. 601
Brooks & Co. v Lycett's Saddle Co.	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	127	[1904] 1 Ch. 512; 73 L. J. Ch. 319
Brown, In re Ingall v Brown	CHD BYRNE,J	173	189	[1904] 1 Ch. 120; 73 L. J. Ch. 130; 90 L.T. 220
Brown v Dimbleby	C.A.	53	98	[1904] 1 K. B. 28; 73 L. J. K. B. 35; 89 L. T. 424
Brown & Gregory, In re	CHD BYRNE,J	412	21	[1904] 1 Ch. 627; 73 L. J. Ch. 430
Browne, In re. Ex parte Martingell	BKCY.	384	12	[1904] 2 K. B. 133; 73 L. J. K. B. 446; 90 L. T. 291
Bruner v Moore	CH. D. FAR. J.	295	37	[1904] 1 Ch. 305; 73 L. J. Ch. 377; 89 L. T. 738
Burnand, In re. Ex parte The Trustee	BKCY.	437	13	[1904] 2 K. B. 68; 73 L. J. K. B. 413; 90 L. T. 292
Bushell v Hammond	C.A.	453	88
Butlin v Harris. In re Beard	CHD.BYRNE,J	312	190	[1904] 1 Ch 270; 73 L. J. Ch. 176; 90 L T. 274
Butt v Snow	K.B.D.	—	143	89 L. T. 302
Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v Pontypridd Waterworks Co.	H.L.	193	86	[1903] A. C. 426; 72 L. J. K. B. 805; 89 L. T. 280
Calverley's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. FAR. J	206	155	[1904] 1 Ch. 150; 73 L. J. Ch. 25; 89 L. T. 500
Canadian Pacific Railway v Blain	P.C.	—	15	[1904] A. C. 453
Cannon Brewery Co. v Gas Light and Coke Co.	H.L.	657	61	[1904] A. C. 331
Carey v Bexhill Corporation	K.B.D.	—	95	[1904] 1 K. B. 142; 73 L. J. K. B. 74; 90 L. T. 58
Carmichael v Evans	CHD.BYRNE,J	—	126	[1904] 1 Ch. 486; 73 L. J. Ch. 329; 90 L. T. 573
Carr's Trusts, In re. Carr v Carr	C.A.	595	97	[1904] 1 Ch. 792; 73 L. J. Ch. 459; 90 L. T. 592
Caryll v Daily Mail Publishing Co.	C.A.	—	134	90 L. T. 307
Caterham Urban Council and Godstone Rural Council, In re	H.L.	625	94	[1904] A. C. 171; 73 L. J. K. B 589; 90 L. T. 653
Cavendish v Strutt	CH.D.BUCK.J.	333	134	[1904] 1 Ch. 524; 73 L. J. Ch. 247; 90 L. T. 500
"Cayo Bonito," The (No. 1)	C.A.	133	166	[1903] P. 203; 72 L. J. P. 70; 89 L. T. 260
—— (No. 2)	P.D. & A.D.	—	169	[1904] P. 316
Central London Railway v Hammersmith Corporation	K.B.D.	—	114	90 L. T. 645
"Challenge" and "Duc d'Aumale," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	[1904] P. 41; 73 L. J. P. 2; 89 L. T. 481
Chandler v Webster	C.A.	290	36	[1904] 1 K. B. 493; 73 L. J. K. B. 401; 90 L. T. 217
Chapman, In Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	139	[1903] P. 192; 72 L. J. P. 62; 89 L. T. 308
Chapman, In re. Perkins v Chapman	C.A.	467	194	[1904] 1 Ch. 431; 73 L. J. Ch. 291; 90 L. T. 339
Chapman v Winson	K.B.D.	478	138	90 L. T. 159
Chappelle v Rex	P.C.	—	16	[1904] A. C. 127; 73 L. J. P. C. 18; 89 L. T. 513
Chelsea Waterworks Co. v Metropolitan Water Board	C.A.	449	184	[1904] 2 K. B. 77; 90 L. T. 831
Chemische Fabrik, &c. v Badische Anilin, &c.	H.L.	—	136	90 L. T. 733
Cheshire v Bailey	K.B.D.	631	100
Chester & Co., In re	CH.D.BUCK.J	189	32
Chesterfield District Council v Newton	C.A.	129	131	[1904] 1 K. B. 62; 73 L. J. K. B. 24; 89 L. T. 466
Christy v Tipper	CHD.JOYCE,J.	414	174	[1904] 1 Ch. 696; 73 L. J. Ch. 212; 90 L. T. 85
Church Patronage Trust, In re. Laurie v Attorney-General	CH.D.BUCK.J.	106	4	[1904] 1 Ch. 41; 73 L. J Ch. 77; 89 L. T. 505
Church Stretton Mineral Water Co., In re	CHD.BYRNE,J	375	137
Citizens' Life Assurance Co. v Brown	P.C.	—	87	[1904] A. C. 423; 90 L. T. 739
"City of Lincoln" Steamship v Smith	P.C.	—	164	[1904] A. C. 250
City of London Electric Lighting Co. v London Corporation	H.L.	158	110	[1903] A. C. 434; 72 L. J. Ch. 737; 89 L. T. 310
Civil Service Co-operative Society v General Steam Navigation Co.	C.A.	181	37	[1903] 2 K. B. 756; 72 L. J. K. B. 933; 89 L. T. 429
Clark's Estate, In re. McKechnie v Clark	CH.D. FAR. J.	212	192	[1904] 1 Ch. 294; 73 L. J. Ch. 188; 89 L. T. 736
Clayton v Peirse	K.B.D.	495	58	[1904] 1 K. B. 424; 73 L. J. K. B. 268; 90 L. T. 119
Clayton Engineering, &c., Co, In re	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	22	90 L. T. 283
Clergue v Murray	P.C.	—	16	[1903] A. C. 521; 72 L. J. P. C. 99; 89 L. T. 373

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04	Column in Digest	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Clifton's Patent, In re	CH.D. BUCK.J	629	127
Clippens Oil Co. v Edinburgh Water Trustees	H.L.	—	186	[1904] A. C. 64; 73 L. J. P. C. 32; 89 L. T 589
Colls v Home and Colonial Stores	H.L.	—	52	[1904] A. C. 179; 73 L. J. Ch. 484; 90 L. T. 687
Colwell v St. Pancras Corporation	CH.D.JOYCE,J	523	124	[1904] 1 Ch. 707; 73 L. J Ch. 275; 90 L. T. 153
Commissioner of Stamp Duties v Stephen	P.C.	—	122	[1904] A. C. 137; 73 L. J. P. C. 9; 89 L. T. 511
Conolly v Consumers Cordage Co.	P.C.	—	136	89 L. T. 347
Consolidated Car Heating Co. v. Came	P.C.	—	127	[1903] A. C. 509; 72 L. J. P. C. 110; 89 L. T. 224
Constantinidi v Constantinidi	P.D. & A D.	190	50	[1903] P. 246; 72 L. J. P. 82; 89 L. T. 340
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	—	51	[1904] P. 306
Continental Caoutchouc, &c., Co. v Kleinwort	C.A.	489	116	90 L. T. 474
Cooper v Hawkins	K.B.D.	233	47	[1904] 2 K. B. 164; 73 L. J. K. B. 113; 89 L. T. 476
——— v Skinner. In re Skinner	CH. D. FAR.J.	346	2	[1904] 1 Ch. 289; 73 L. J. Ch. 94; 89 L. T. 663
——— and Crondace, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	441	181	90 L. T. 258
Corbett, In re. Corbett v Cobham	CH.D. FAR. J.	74	1	[1903] 2 Ch. 326; 72 L. J. Ch. 775; 88 L. T. 591
——— v Pearce	K.B.D.	—	106	[1904] 2 K. B. 422; 90 L. T. 781
"Cordilleras," The	P.D. & A.D	—	167	[1904] P. 90; 73 L. J. P. 13; 89 L. T. 673
Cornbrook Brewery Co. v. Law Debenture Corporation	C.A.	242	19	[1904] 1 Ch. 103; 73 L. J. Ch. 121; 89 L. T. 680
Cornfo t v Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation	C.A.	49	77	[1904] 1 K. B. 40; 73 L. J. K. B. 22; 89 L. T. 490
Cotgrave, In re. Mynors v Cotgrave	CH.D. KEK. J.	411	193	[1903] 2 Ch. 705; 72 L. J. Ch. 777; 89 L. T. 433
Crane v Ormerod	K.B.D.	11	41	[1903] 2 K. B. 37; 72 L. J. K. B. 507; 89 L. T. 45
Cronon v Stanier	K.B.D.	75	76	[1904] 1 K. B. 87 · 73 L. J K. B. 102
Crosfield v Manchester Ship Canal Co.	C.A.	635	5	[1904] 2 Ch. 123; 73 L. J. Ch. 345; 90 L. T. 557
Crow v Davies	K.B.D.	—	111	89 L. T. 407
Crowther v West Riding Window Cleaning Co.	C A.	374	103	[1904] 1 K. B. 232; 73 L. J. K. B. 71
Croxon, In re. Croxon v Ferrers	CH.D. KEK.J.	343	195	[1904] 1 Ch. 252; 73 L. J. Ch. 170; 89 L. T. 733
Cullen v Elwin	C.A.	—	176	90 L T. 840
Cunard Steamship Co. v Marten	C.A.	39	77	[1903] 2 K. B. 511; 72 L. J. K. B. 754; 89 L. T. 152
Curl v Webster	CH.D. FAR. J.	413	62	[1904] 1 Ch. 685; 73 L. J. Ch. 540; 90 L. T. 479
Dallas, In re.	C.A.	567	119	73 L. J. Ch. 365; 90 L. T. 177
Davenport v Apollinaris Co.	K.B.D.	—	176	89 L. T. 19
David v Rees	C.A.	579	133	[1904] 2 K. B. 435
Dawson v Great Northern and City Railway Co.	K.B.D.	—	85	[1904] 1 K. B. 277; 73 L. J. K. B. 174; 90 L. T. 20
Dawson v Smart	H.L.	—	50	[1903] A. C. 457; 89 L. T. 343
Debtor, A, In re. Ex parte Rock Red Brick Co.	BKCY.	302	8	90 L. T. 64
Defries & Co., In re. Bowen v Defries & Co.	CH.D.BUCK,J.	253	21	[1904] 1 Ch. 37; 73 L. J. Ch. 1
De Galve v Gardner. In re Anglesey (Marquis)	CH.D. RADY,J	124	149	[1903] 2 Ch. 727; 72 L. J. Ch. 782; 89 L. T. 584
De Hart v Compania Anonima de Seguros Aurora	C.A.	36	78	[1903] 2 K. B. 503; 72 L. J. K. B. 818; 89 L. T. 154
De la Cour v Clinton	CHD. JOYCE,J.	—	24	90 L. T. 615
Denton, In re. Licenses Insurance Corporation v Denton	C.A.	484	118	[1904] 2 Ch. 178; 73 L. J. Ch. 465; 90 L. T. 698
Devonport Corporation v Tozer	C.A.	6	92	[1903] 1 Ch. 759; 72 L. J. Ch. 411; 88 L. T. 113
Dickinson v Forsyth	K.B.D.	—	91	90 L. T. 30
Dixon v Bradford Railway Servants' Coal Society	K.B.D.	—	83	[1904] 1 K. B. 444; 73 L. J. K. B. 136; 90 L. T. 122
Dixon v Dixon	CH.D.RADY,J.	—	125	[1904] 1 Ch. 161; 73 L. J. Ch. 103; 89 L. T. 272
Dover v Prosser	K.B.D.	140	56	[1904] 1 K. B. 84; 73 L. J. K. B. 13; 89 L. T. 724
Dowden v Pook	C.A.	97	38	[1904] 1 K. B. 45; 73 L. J. K. B. 38; 89 L. T. 688
Dowding, In re. Gregory v Dowding	CH.D. KEK. J.	293	157	[1904] 1 Ch. 441; 73 L. J. Ch. 194; 90 L. T. 82
"Duc d'Aumale," The	P.D. & A.D.	319	170	[1904] P. 60; 73 L. J. P. 8; 89 L. T. 486
Duffill v Duffill	P.C.	—	191	[1903] A. C. 491; 72 L. J. P. C. 97; 89 L. T. 82
Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v Maison Talbot	K.B.D.	254	67
——— v Moseley & Sons	C.A.	454	126	[1904] 1 Ch. 612; 73 L. J. Ch. 417
Dunn, In re. Brinklow v Singleton	CHD.BYRNE,J.	345	149	[1904] 1 Ch. 648; 73 L. J. Ch. 425

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Dunn v Holt	K.B.D.	—	65	90 L. T. 577
Dyer v Swift Cycle Co.	C.A.	483	104	[1904] 2 K. B. 36; 73 L. J. K. B. 566; 90 L. T. 613
East London Railway Co. v Conservators of River Thames	CH.D. FAR. J	—	57	90 L. T. 347
Eastbourne Corporation v Attorney-General	H.L.	577	73	[1904] A. C. 155; 73 L. J. K. B. 259; 90 L. T. 99
Eastwick v Smith. In re Smith	CH.D. FAR. J.	104	180	[1904] 1 Ch. 139; 73 L. J. Ch. 74
Edmundson v Render	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	172	90 L. T. 814
Egg v Craig	K.B.D.	—	34	89 L. T. 41
Ellinger v Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York	K.B.D	366	76	[1904] 1 K. B. 832; 73 L. J. K. B. 546; 90 L. T. 484
Elliott v Crutchley	C A.	499	36	[1904] 1 K. B. 565; 73 L. J. K. B. 406; 90 L. T. 497
Ellis v London County Council	K.B.D.	381	109	[1904] 1 K. B. 283; 73 L. J. K. B. 151; 90 L. T. 206
"Elmville," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	164	[1904] P. 319
"Elswick Park"	P.D. & A.D.	—	170	[1904] P. 76; 72 L. J. P. C. 79; 89 L. T. 217
Emary v Nolloth	K.B D.	107	46	[1903] 2 K. B. 264; 72 L. J. K. B. 620; 89 L. T. 100
Emerson v Henderson. In re Kurtz	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	3	90 L. T. 12
Escott v Newport Corporation	K.B.D.	543	95	[1904] 2 K. B. 369; 73 L. J. K. B. 693; 90 L. T. 348
Estlin, In re. Prichard v Thomas	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	18	72 L. J. Ch. 687; 89 L. T. 88
Euphrates and Tigris Steam Navigation Co., In re	CH.D.EADY.J.	—	23	[1904] 1 Ch. 360; 73 L. J. Ch. 175; 90 L. T. 56
Evans v. Evans	P.D. & A.D.	—	51	[1904] P. 274; 73 L. J. P. 87
Everson, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	BKCY.	656	8
Farnham's Trusts, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	535	156
Farthing v Parkinson	K.B.D.	—	4	90 L. T. 783
Fenton v Thorley & Co.	H.L.	81	105	[1903] A C. 443; 72 L. J. K. B. 787; 89 L. T. 314
Ferrand v Bingley District Council	K.B.D.	77	64	[1903] 2 K. B. 445; 72 L. J. K. B. 734; 89 L. T. 333
Finch and Chew, In re	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	129	[1903] 2 Ch. 486; 72 L. J. Ch. 690; 89 L. T. 162
Firth v Inland Revenue Commissioners	K.B.D.	622	72	[1904] 2 K. B. 205; 73 L. J. K. B. 632
Fitzgerald, In re. Surman v Fitzgerald	C.A.	432	32	[1904] 1 Ch. 573; 73 L. J. Ch. 436; 90 L. T. 266
Fitzmaurice v Hesketh	P.C.	—	53	[1904] A. C. 266; 73 L. J. P. C. 53
Fitzsimon v Mostyn	H.L.	337	84	[1904] A. C. 46; 73 L. J. K. B. 72; 89 L. T. 616
Fletcher and Dyson, In re	CH.D.EADY,J.	27	171	[1903] 2 Ch. 688; 72 L. J. Ch. 791; 89 L. T. 473
Forster, Ex parte	K.B.D.	—	54	89 L. T. 18
Foster v Great Western Railway	K.B.D.	685	145	[1904] 2 K. B. 306; 90 L. T. 779
Fox, In re. Wodehouse v Fox	CHD.BYRNE,J	229	190	[1904] 1 Ch. 480; 73 L. J. Ch. 314; 90 L. T. 477
Fraser, In re. Lowther v Fraser	C.A.	516	196	[1904] 1 Ch. 726; 73 L. J. Ch. 481
——— v Fraser	C.A.	147	130	[1904] 1 K. B. 56; 73 L. J. K. B. 6; 89 L. T. 491
——— (No. 2)	K.B.D.	—	5	[1904] 2 K. B. 245; 90 L. T. 709
French Brewster, In re. Walters v French Brewster	CH.D.EADY.J	377	109	[1904] 1 Ch. 713; 73 L. J. Ch. 405; 90 L. T. 378
Frowd v Frowd	K.B.D.	—	66	[1904] P. 177; 73 L. J. P. 60; 90 L. T. 175
Fullerton v Provincial Bank of Ireland	H.L.	238	117	[1903] A. C. 309; 72 L. J. P. C. 79; 89 L. T. 79
Gale v Rhymney and Aber Gas and Water Co.	C.A.	—	185	89 L. T. 399
Galloway v Galloway	H.L.	—	153	[1904] A. C. 50
Garbutt v Durham Joint Committee	C.A.	678	127	[1904] 2 K. B. 514
Gardner v Hodgson's Kingston Brewery Co.	H.L.	17	52	[1903] A. C. 229; 72 L. J. Ch. 558; 88 L. T. 698
Garner v Murray	CHD.JOYCE,J.	208	125	[1904] 1 Ch. 57; 73 L. J. Ch. 66; 89 L. T. 665
Gaskell, In re. Ex parte Gaskell	C.A.	—	9	[1904] 2 K. B. 478; 73 L. J. K. B. 656
Geipel's Patent, In re	C.A.	339	126	[1904] 1 Ch. 239; 73 L. J. Ch. 215; 90 L. T. 70
General Accident Assurance Corporation, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	332	24	[1904] 1 Ch. 147; 73 L. J. Ch. 84; 89 L. T. 699
George v Thomas	CH.D. EADY,J	416	182	90 L. T. 505
"Germania," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	170	[1904] P. 131; 73 L. J. P. 59; 90 L. T. 296
Giblan v National Amalgamated Labourers' Union	C.A.	—	176	[1903] 2 K. B. 600; 72 L. J. K. B. 907; 89 L. T. 386
Gibson v Wormald	C.A.	661	102	[1904] 2 K. B. 40; 73 L. J. K. B. 491
Gist, In re	C.A.	422	96	[1904] 1 Ch. 398; 73 L. J. Ch. 251; 90 L. T. 35
Glamorganshire Coal Co. v South Wales Miners' Federation	C.A.	165	177	[1903] 2 K. B. 545; 72 L. J. K. B. 893; 89 L. T. 393
Glasdir Copper Works (Limited), In re	CH.D.JOYCE,J	—	58	[1904] 1 Ch. 819; 73 L. J. Ch. 461; 90 L. T. 412

Name of Case	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Glenwood Co. v Phillips	P.C.	—	121	[1904] A. C. 405; 90 L. T. 741
Goerz v Bell	K.B.D.	—	76	[1904] 2 K. B. 136; 73 L. J. K. B. 448; 90 L. T. 675
Goldsmiths' Company v West Metropolitan Railway Co.	C.A.	21	147	[1904] 1 K. B. 1; 72 L J. K. B. 931; 89 L. T. 428
Goodchild v Matthews	K.B.D.	—	115	89 L. T. 369
Goodrich, In re. Payne v Bennett	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	[1904] P. 138; 73 L. J. P. 33; 90 L. T. 170
Gordon v Gordon	C.A.	389	33	[1904] P. 163; 73 L. J. P. 41; 90 L. T. 597
Gorton Local Board v Prison Commissioners	K.B.D.	—	46	[1904] 2 K. B. 165*n*
Gough and Aspatria, Silloth and District Water Board In re	C.A.	552	183	[1904] 1 K. B. 417; 73 L. J. K. B. 228; 90 L. T. 43
Grand Hotel Co. of Caledonia Springs v Wilson	P.C.	286	176	[1904] A. C. 103; 73 L. J. P. C. 1; 89 L. T. 456
Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v Rodocanachi	K.B.D.	508	186	[1904] 2 K. B. 230; 73 L. J. K. B. 441; 90 L. T. 819
Grange v Taylor	K.B.D.	429	159	90 L. T. 486
Graves v Gorrie	P.C	113	39	[1903] A. C. 496; 72 L. J P. C. 95; 89 L. T. 111
Gray v Bonsall	C.A.	387	83	[1904] 1 K. B 601; 73 L. J. K. B. 515; 90 L. T. 404
Great Torrington Commons Conservators v Moore Stevens	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	151	[1904] 1 Ch. 347; 73 L. J. Ch. 124; 89 L. T. 667
Great Western Railway v Caswell	K.B.D.	—	145	[1904] 2 K. B. 508
Greaves, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	BKCY.	633	11	[1904] 2 K. B. 493
Green v Britten	C.A.	198	104	[1904] 1 K. B. 350; 73 L. J. K. B. 126; 89 L. T. 713
Greenock Steamship Co. v Maritime Insurance Co.	C.A.	186	78	[1903] 2 K. B. 657; 72 L. J. K. B. 868; 89 L. T. 200
Gregory v Dowding. In re Dowding	CH. D. KEK. J.	293	157	[1904] 1 Ch. 441; 73 L. J. Ch. 194; 90 L. T. 82
Greymouth Point Elizabeth Railway and Coal Co., In re	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	22	[1904] 1 Ch. 32; 73 L. J. Ch. 92
Griffin v Houlder Line (Limited)	C.A.	323	104	[1904] 1 K. B. 510; 73 L. J. K. B. 202; 90 L. T. 142
Griffith, In re. Jones v Owen	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	2	[1904] 1 Ch. 807; 73 L. J. Ch. 464; 90 L. T. 639
Groom v Grimes	K.B.D.	—	90	89 L. T. 129
Groos, In the Estate of	P.D. & A.D.	—	140	[1904] P. 269; 73 L. J. P. 82
H. B., In re	C.A.	—	11	[1904] 1 K. B. 94; 73 L. J. K. B. 1; 89 L. T. 592
Hambro v Burnand	C.A.	583	138	[1904] 2 K. B. 10; 73 L. J. K. B. 669; 90 L. T. 803
Hamilton v Seal	C.A.	581	132	[1904] 2 K. B. 262; 73 L. J. K. B. 560; 90 L. T. 592
Hammond v Farrow	K.B.D.	—	148	[1904] 2 K. B. 332; 73 L. J. K. B. 726
Hanbury, In re. Hanbury v Fisher	C.A.	662	195	[1904] 1 Ch. 415; 73 L. J. Ch. 222; 90 L. T. 66
Hancock, In re. Ex parte Hillearys	C.A.	546	12	[1904] 1 K. B. 585; 73 L. J. K. B 245; 90 L. T. 389
Handler v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association	C.A.	—	75	90 L. T. 192
Hankinson v Hayter. In re Wheeler	CH. D. WAR. J.	586	98	[1904] 2 Ch. 66; 73 L. J. Ch. 576
Hannah v Hunter	H.L.	—	65	[1904] A. C. 379
Hardwick v Lane	K.B.D.	591	61	[1904] 1 K. B. 204; 73 L. J. K. B. 96; 89 L. T. 630
"Hare," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	73 L. J. P. 47; 90 L. T. 323
Harman v Ainslie	C.A.	615	80	[1904] 1 K. B. 698; 73 L. J. K. B. 539; 90 L. T. 624
Harris v Boot's Cash Chemists (Limited)	CH. D. WAR. J.	668	42
——— v Flower	CH. D. EADY, J.	—	53	90 L. T. 669
——— v Hickman	K.B.D.	—	83	[1904] 1 K. B. 13; 73 L. J. K. B 31; 89 L. T. 722
Harrison v Kirk	H.L.	—	3	[1904] A. C. 1; 73 L. J. P C. 35; 89 L. T. 566
Harrogate Corporation v Dickinson	C.A.	—	91	[1904] 1 K. B. 468; 73 L. J. K. B. 262; 90 L. T. 41
Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co.	C.A.	457	75	[1904] 1 K. B. 558; 73 L. J. K. B. 373; 90 L. T. 245
Harvey v Truro District Council	CHD. JOYCE, J.	262	65	[1903] 2 Ch. 638; 72 L. J. Ch. 705; 89 L. T. 90
Hawley v Blake. In re Houghton	CH. D. KEK. J	505	57	[1904] 1 Ch. 622; 73 L. J. Ch. 317; 90 L. T. 252
"Hawthornbank," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	168	[1904] P. 120; 73 L. J. P. 18; 90 L. T. 293
Hay, In re. Kerr v Stinnear	CH. D. BUCK, J.	92	189	[1904] 1 Ch. 317; 73 L. J. Ch. 33
Haycocks v Mulholland	K.B.D.	400	133	[1904] 1 K. B. 145; 73 L. J. K. B. 125; 90 L. T. 88
Hayward v Hamilton. In re Jordan	CHD. BYRNE, J	150	136	[1904] 1 Ch. 260; 73 L. J. Ch. 128; 90 L. T. 223
Heathcote, In re. Heathcote v Trench	CH. D. EADY, J	—	1	[1904] 1 Ch. 826; 73 L. J Ch. 543; 90 L. T. 505
Heaton v Beachey. In re Beachey	C.A.	309	119	[1904] 1 Ch. 67; 73 L. J. Ch. 68; 89 L. T. 685
Heaver's Executors v Fulham Borough	K.B.D.	—	110	[1904] 2 K. B. 383; 73 L. J. K. B. 715
Hebburn Urban Council, In re	CH. D. KEK. J.	—	53	90 L. T. 145

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Hennan v Duckworth	K.B.D.	—	48	90 L. T. 546
Hennen v Long	K.B.D.	—	4	90 L. T. 387
Henniker v Howard	K.B.D.	—	178	90 L. T. 157
Herne Bay Steamboat Co. v Hutton	C.A.	183	36	[1903] 2 K. B. 683; 72 L. J. K. B. 879; 89 L. T. 422
Higgins v Campbell & Harrison (Limited)	C.A.	195	103	[1904] 1 K. B. 328; 73 L. J. K. B. 158; 89 L. T. 660
High v Billings	K.B.D.	—	110	89 L. T. 550
Hill v Pannifer	K.B.D.	588	49	[1904] 1 K. B. 811; 73 L. J. K. B. 556; 90 L. T. 511
Hoare v Morshead	C.A.	87	135	[1903] 2 K. B. 359; 72 L. J. K. B. 724; 89 L. T. 125
Hobbs v Morey	K.B.D.	348	54	[1904] 1 K. B. 74; 73 L. J. K. B. 47; 89 L. T. 531
Hodson v Deans	CH. D. JOYCE, J.	122	119	[1903] 2 Ch. 647; 72 L. J. Ch. 751; 89 L. T. 92
Hogmaier v Willesden Overseers	K.B.D.	654	80	[1904] 2 K. B. 316; 73 L. J. K. B. 638; 90 L. T. 683
Holder v Williams. In re Williams	CHD. JOYCE, J.	318	3	[1904] 1 Ch. 52; 73 L. J. Ch. 82; 89 L. T. 663
Honywood v Honywood	C.A.	—	194	89 L. T. 378
Hooper v Bromet	C.A.	—	43	90 L. T. 234
Hope-Johnstone, In re. Hope-Johnstone v Hope-Johnstone	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	156	[1904] 1 Ch. 470; 73 L. J. Ch. 321; 90 L. T. 253
Horan v Hayhoe	K.B.D.	231	74	[1904] 1 K. B. 288; 73 L. J. K. B. 133; 90 L. T. 12
Houghton, In re. Hawley v Blake	CH.D. KEK. J.	505	57	[1904] 1 Ch. 622; 73 L. J. Ch. 317; 90 L. T. 252
—— v Houghton	P. D. & A.D.	272	50	[1903] P. 150; 72 L. J. P. 31; 89 L. T. 76
Houston's Settlement, In re	CH. D. FAR. J.	61	131	89 L. T. 469
Hubback v British North Borneo Co.	C.A.	—	132	[1904] 2 K. B. 473; 73 L. J. K. B. 654
Hunter v Attorney-General	H. L.	593	71	[1904] A. C. 161; 73 L. J. K. B. 381; 90 L. T. 325
Hurrell v Littlejohn	CH.D. JOYCE, J.	—	155	[1904] 1 Ch. 689; 73 L. J. Ch. 287; 90 L. T. 260
Ibo Investment Trust (Limited), In re	CHD. BYRNE, J.	—	29	[1904] 1 Ch. 26; 73 L. J. Ch. 71; 90 L. T. 373
Igoe v Shann	H.L.	111	89	[1903] A. C. 320; 72 L. J. K. B. 693; 89 L. T. 105
Ilford Park Estates v Jacobs	CH.D. FADY, J.	—	43	[1903] 2 Ch. 522; 72 L. J. Ch. 699; 89 L. T. 295
Illingworth v Houldsworth	H.L.	—	20	[1904] A. C. 355
Ingall v Brown. In re Brown	CHD. BYRNE, J.	173	189	[1904] 4 Ch. 120; 73 L. J. Ch. 130; 90 L. T. 220
Islington Corporation v London School Board	C.A.	115	114	[1903] 2 K. B. 354; 72 L. J. K. B. 677; 89 L. T. 53
Jackson v Mumford	C.A.	342	76
—— v Wimbledon Urban Council	K.B.D.	—	142	[1904] 2 K. B. 359; 73 L. J. K. B. 428; 90 L. T. 417
James v Ocean Coal Co.	C.A.	497	102	[1904] 2 K. B. 213; 90 L. T. 834
Jeapes v Jeapes	P.D. & A.D.	—	50	89 L. T. 74
Jenkins, In re. Ex parte The Trustee	BKCY.	—	9	90 L. T. 65
—— v Grocott	K.B.D.	267	55	[1904] 1 K. B. 374; 73 L. J. K. B. 215; 90 L. T. 90
Johnson, In re. Ex parte Matthews and Wilkinson	K.B.D.	304	13	[1904] 1 K. B. 134; 73 L. J. K. B. 220; 90 L. T. 61
——, In re. Greenwood v Greenwood	C.A.	—	190	89 L. T. 520
—— v Whitaker	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	135	90 L. T. 535
Johnston, In re. Mills v Johnston	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	133	[1904] 1 Ch. 132; 73 L. J. Ch. 17; 89 L. T. 497
—— v Great Western Railway	C.A.	612	135	[1904] 2 K. B. 250; 73 L. J. K. B. 568
Jones v Green	C.A.	—	164	[1904] 2 K. B. 275; 73 L. J. K. B. 601; 90 L. T. 768
—— v Owen. In re Griffith	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	3	[1904] 1 Ch. 807; 73 L. J. Ch. 464; 90 L. T. 639
Jordan, In re. Hayward v Hamilton	CH.D BYRNE, J.	150	136	[1904] 1 Ch. 260; 73 L. J. Ch. 128; 90 L. T. 223
Joynt v Cycle Trade Publishing Co.	C.A.	—	87	[1904] 2 K. B. 292
Judgment Debtor, In re	C.A.	178	8
Kaufman v Gerson	C.A.	420	32	[1904] 1 Ch. 591; 73 L. J. K. B. 320; 90 L. T. 608
Keck's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	362	156	[1904] 2 Ch. 22; 73 L. J. Ch. 262; 90 L. T. 113
Keith v Gancia	C.A.	532	82	[1904] 1 Ch. 774; 73 L. J. Ch. 411; 90 L. T. 395
—— v Twentieth Century Club (Limited)	CH.D. BUCK. J.	554	48	73 L. J. Ch. 545; 90 L. T. 775
Kent Waterworks Co. v Lamplough	H.L.	401	184	[1904] A. C. 27; 73 L. J. Ch. 96; 89 L. T. 704
Keslake v Board of Trade	K.B.D.	127	170	[1903] 2 K. B. 453; 72 L. J. K. B. 829; 89 L. T. 534
Kilgour v Gaddes	C.A.	438	53	[1904] 1 K. B. 457; 73 L. J. K. B. 233; 90 L. T. 604

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
King, In re. Travers v Kelly	CH.D.EADY.J	230	198	[1904] 1 Ch. 363; 73 L. J. Ch. 210; 90 L. T. 281
Kingsland v Haben	K.B.D.	—	111	90 L. T. 449
Kinnear, In re. Kinnear v Barnett	CH.D KEK.J	—	191	90 L. T. 537
Kirkdale Burial Board v Liverpool Corporation	CHD EADY.,J.	427	96	[1904] 1 Ch. 829; 73 L. J. Ch. 529
Knight v Isle of Wight Electric Light Co.	CH.D.JOYCE,J	—	123	73 L. J. Ch. 299; 90 L. T. 410
Knuckey v Redruth Rural Council	K B.D.	558	115	[1904] 1 K. B 382; 73 L. J. K. B. 265; 90 L. T. 226
Krell v Henry	C.A.	246	37	[1903] 2 K. B. 740; 72 L. J. K. B. 794; 89 L. T. 328
Kurtz, In re. Emerson v Henderson	CH.D.EADY,J	—	3	90 L. T. 12
Lake George Mines (Limited), In re	CHD.BYRNE,J	—	30	[1904] 1 Ch. 803
Lanark County Council v Hart	H.L.	—	153	[1904] A. C. 235
Lancashire, Derbyshire, and East Coast Railway Acts, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	26	145	[1903] 2 Ch. 711; 72 L. J. Ch. 789
Laurie v Attorney-General. In re Church Patronage Trust	CH D.BUCK J.	106	4	[1904] 1 Ch. 41; 73 L. J. Ch. 77; 89 L. T. 505
Lawrence & Bullen v Aflalo	H.L.	369	39	[1903] A. C. 17; 73 L. J. Ch. 85; 89 L. T. 589
Lawson v Reynolds	CH D FAR. J.	375	80	[1904] 1 Ch. 718; 73 L. J. Ch. 451; 90 L. T. 278
Lea v Thursby	C.A.	—	137	90 L. T. 265
—— (No. 2)	CH D.EADY,J.	—	10	[1904] 2 Ch 57; 73 L. J. Ch. 518; 90 L. T. 667
Lead Co.'s Workmen's Funds Society, In re	CH.D. WAR. J.	571	60	[1904] 2 Ch. 196
Leconfield, In re. Wyndham v Leconfield	C.A.	—	69	90 L.T. 399
Leeds and Hanley Theatre of Varieties, In re	CH.D BUCK J.	506	30	[1904] 2 Ch. 45; 73 L. J. Ch. 553
Letheby & Christopher (Limited), In re	CH D.BUCK.J	460	18	[1904] 1 Ch. 815; 73 L. J. Ch. 509; 90 L. T. 774
Lewin v Newnes	K B.D.	—	148	90 L. T. 160
Lewis v Durham Union	K.B.D.	—	149	90 L. T. 383
Linzell v Felixstowe Urban Council	K.B.D.	—	91	90 L. T. 388
Liskeard and Caradon Railway Co., In re	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	146	[1903] 2 Ch. 681; 72 L. J. Ch. 754; 89 L. T. 437
Lister v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.	K.B.D.	12	17	[1903] 1 K. B. 878; 72 L. J. K. B. 385; 88 L. T. 561
Livingstone v Westminster Corporation	K.B.D.	395	93	[1904] 2 K. B. 109; 73 L. J. K. B 434
Local Government Board for Ireland v McKay	H.L.	—	147	[1903] A. C. 402; 72 L. J. P. C. 100; 89 L. T. 277
Lockwood v Cooper	K.B.D.	48	89	[1903] 2 K. B. 428; 72 L. J. K. B. 690; 89 L. T. 306
Lodder v Slowey	P.C.	—	123	[1904] A. C. 442
Logan v Bank of Scotland	C.A.	—	136	[1904] 2 K B. 495
London and North-Western Railway Co. v Westminster Corporation	C.A.	596	113	[1904] 1 Ch. 759; 73 L. J. Ch. 386; 90 L. T. 461
London Bridge Buildings Co. v Thomson	CH D.JOYCE J	—	84	89 L. T. 50
London County Council v Dundas	ARCHES CT.	—	53	[1904] P. 1
—— v Payne	K B.D.	299	188	[1904] 1 K. B. 194; 73 L. J. K. B. 192; 89 L. T. 632
—— v South Metropolitan Gas Co.	C.A.	161	61	[1904] 1 Ch. 76; 73 L. J. Ch. 136; 89 L. T. 618
London School Board v Fulham Borough	K.B.D.	—	110	90 L. T. 116
London Transport Co. v Trechmann	C.A.	—	103	[1904] 1 K. B. 635; 73 L. J. K. B. 253; 90 L. T. 132
Longbotham & Sons, In re	C.A.	660	172	[1904] 2 Ch. 152; 90 L. T. 801
Loveridge, In re. Pearce v Marsh	CHD. BUCK.J.	138	118	[1904] 1 Ch. 518; 73 L. J. Ch. 15; 89 L. T. 503
Ludlow v Pike	K.B.D.	475	85	[1904] 1 K. B. 531; 73 L J. K. B. 274; 90 L. T. 458
Lukey v Sydney Harbour Commissioners	P.C.	—	122	[1904] A. C. 382; 90 L. T. 743
Lumby v Faupel	C.A.	—	82	90 L. T. 140
Lund's Settlement, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	157	89 L T. 606
McCabe v Jopling	C A.	358	107	[1904] 1 K. B. 222; 73 L. J. K. B. 129; 89 L. T. 624
McCartney v Londonderry Railway	H.L.	—	183	[1904] A. C. 301
MacCulloch v Anderson	H.L.	—	178	[1904] A. C. 55
McDonald v Belcher	P.C.	—	16	[1904] A. C. 429; 90 L. T. 735
McKechnie v Clark. In re Clark's Estate	CH.D. FAR. J.	212	193	[1904] 1 Ch. 294; 73 L. J. Ch. 188; 89 L. T. 736
McNair v Baker	K.B.D.	—	114	[1904] 1 K B. 208; 73 L. J. K. B. 120; 90 L. T. 24
"Madeleine" and "André Théodore," The	P.D. & A D.	—	168	73 L. J. P. 24; 89 L. T. 675
Manchester v Carlton Iron Co.	C.A.	291	103	89 L. T. 730
Manchester Carriage Co. v Swinton Urban Council	K.B.D.	—	177	90 L. T. 795
Marks v Samuel	C.A.	—	171	[1904] 2 K. B. 287; 73 L. J. K. B. 587; 90 L. T. 590

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04	Column in Digest	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Martin, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	139	90 L. T. 264
Mawle v Jagoe. In re O'Connell	CH.D. KEK.J.	102	157	[1903] 2 Ch. 574; 72 L. J. Ch. 709; 89 L. T. 166
Maxwell v British Thomson Houston Co.	K.B.D.	—	131	[1904] 2 K. B. 342; 73 L. J. K. B. 644
Maynard v Consolidated Kent Collieries Corporation	C.A.	117	27	[1903] 2 K. B. 121; 72 L. J. K. B. 681; 88 L. T 676
Maynard v Robinson	K.B D.	—	108	89 L. T. 136
Mellor v Walmesley	CH D.EADY J.	665	58
Meltham Spinning Co. v. Huddersfield Corporation	C.A.	—	186	89 L. T. 403
"Mercedes de Larrinaga," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	166	[1904] P. 215; 73 L. J. P. 65; 90 L. T. 520
Midland Railway Co., Ex parte	C.A.	—	86	[1904] 1 Ch. 61; 73 L. J. Ch. 64; 89 L. T. 545
——— v Sharpe	H L.	—	105	[1904] A. C. 349; 73 L. J. K. B. 666
Miles, In re	CH.D.EADY,J	47	172	[1903] 2 Ch. 518; 72 L. J. Ch. 704; 88 L. T. 863
——— v Hutchings	K.B.D.	284	46	[1903] 5 K. B. 714; 72 L. J. K. B. 775; 89 L. T. 420
Millard v Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban Council	K.B.D.	—	143	90 L. T. 489
Millett v Ballard	C.A.	675	40
"Minnetonka," The	P.D. & A.D.	672	166	[1904] P. 202; 73 L. J. P. 62; 90 L. T. 354
Mitchell v New Zealand Loan, &c., Co.	P.C.	—	130	[1904] A. C. 149; 73 L. J. P. C. 17; 89 L. T. 83
Molyneux v Hawtrey	C A.	23	181	[1903] 2 K. B. 487; 72 L. J. K. B. 873; 89 L. T. 350
Montefiore v Guedalla	CH.D.BUCK J.	151	179	[1903] 2 Ch. 723; 73 L. J. Ch 13; 89 L. T. 472
Montgomerie v Wallace-James	H L.	—	4	[1904] A. C. 73; 73 L. J. P. C. 25; 90 L. T. 1
——— (No. 2)	H.L.	—	65	[1904 A. C. 214
Montreal City v Montreal Street Railway Co.	P.C.	—	177	[1903] A. C. 482; 72 L. J. P. C. 119; 89 L. T. 30
Moon v Camberwell Corporation	C.A.	—	34	89 L. T. 595
Moore v Oxford (Bishop)	P.C.	—	53	[1904] A. C. 283; 73 L. J. P. C. 43; 90 L. T. 425
Moore, Nettlefold, & Co. v Singer Manufacturing Co.	C.A.	385	49	[1904] 1 K. B. 820; 73 L. J. K. B. 457; 90 L. T. 469
Morel v Westmorland	H.L.	353	98	[1904] A. C. 11; 73 L. J. K. B. 93; 89 L. T. 702
Morgan, In re. Ex parte Board of Trade	BKCY.	79	42	[1904] 1 K. B. 68; 72 L. J. K. B. 948; 89 L. T. 452
Morris v Baker	CH.D.BUCK.J.	207	150	73 L. J. Ch. 143
Morton v Bank of England	CH.D. FAR. J.	393	128	[1904] 1 Ch. 664; 73 L. J. Ch. 503; 90 L. T. 375
Moseley v Koffyfontein Mines	C.A.	—	27	[1904] 2 Ch. 109; 73 L. J. Ch. 569
Mount Lyell Mining Co. v Inland Revenue Commissioners	K.B.D.	—	73	[1904] 1 K. B. 757; 73 L. J. K. B. 371; 90 L. T. 579
Mynors v Cotgrave. In re Cotgrave	CH.D. KEK.J.	411	193	[1903] 2 Ch. 705; 72 L. J. Ch. 777; 89 L. T. 433
Natal Land, &c., Co. v Pauline Colliery Syndicate	P.C.	—	18	[1904] A. C. 120; 73 L. J. P. C. 22; 89 L. T. 678
National Telephone Co. v Kingston-upon-Hull	CH.D.BUCK.J.	26	134
Neagle v Nixon's Navigation Co.	C.A.	356	105	[1904] 1 K. B. 339; 73 L. J. K. B. 165; 90 L. T. 49
Nelson & Co. v Faber	K.B.D.	—	21	[1903] 2 K. B. 367; 72 L. J. K. B. 771; 89 L. T. 21
New Balkis Eersteling v Randt Gold Mining Co.	H.L.	561	26	[1904] A. C. 165; 73 L. J. K. B. 384; 90 L. T. 494
Newfoundland Whaling Co. v Newfoundland Government	P.C.	—	121	[1904] A. C. 399
New River Co. v Westminster Corporation	K.B.D.	—	115	90 L. T. 792
New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co. v Attorney-General	P.C.	—	178	[1904] A. C. 415
Nicholas v Ridley	C.A.	226	120	[1904] 1 Ch. 192; 73 L. J. Ch. 145; 89 L. T. 653
Nightingale v Reynolds	C.A.	2	120	[1903] 2 Ch. 236; 72 L J. Ch. 564; 88 L. T. 654
Nixon, In re. Gray v Bell	CHD.BYRNE,J	—	57	[1904] 1 Ch. 638; 73 L. J. Ch. 416
Nokes v Islington Corporation	K.B.D.	399	93	[1904] 1 K. B. 610; 73 L. J. K. B. 109; 90 L. T. 22
Norfolk County Council v Green	K.B.D.	—	64	90 L. T. 451
Norman v Walder	C.A.	402	105	[1904] 2 K. B. 27; 73 L. J. K. B. 461; 90 L. T. 531
"Normandy," The	P.D & A.D.	634	167	[1904] P. 187; 73 L. J P. 55; 90 L. T. 351
North American Land and Timber Co. v Watkins	CH.D. KEK. J.	360	91	[1904] 1 Ch. 242; 73 L. J. Ch. 117; 89 L. T. 602
Northampton Corporation v Ellen	C.A.	305	187	[1904] 1 K. B. 299; 73 L. J. K. B. 329; 90 L. T. 71

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
O. C. S. (a Debtor), In re	C.A.	595	11	[1904] 2 K. B. 161; 73 L. J. K. B. 585
O'Connell, In re. Mawle v Jagoe	CH.D. KEK.J.	102	157	[1903] 2 Ch. 574; 72 L. J. Ch. 709; 89 L. T. 166
O'Donoghue v Moon	K.B.D.	—	70	90 L. T. 843
Ogdens v Nelson	C.A.	—	35	[1904] 2 K. B. 410; 90 L. T. 656
Olde v Olde	CH.D. FAR. J.	260	182	[1904] 1 Ch. 35; 73 L. J. Ch. 81; 89 L. T. 604
Oldfield, In re. Oldfield v Oldfield	C.A.	—	195	[1904] 1 Ch. 519; 73 L. J. Ch. 433; 90 L. T. 392
Oliver v Camberwell Corporation	K.B D.	511	113	90 L. T. 285
——— v Nautilus Steam Shipping Co.	C.A.	200	163	[1903] 2 K. B. 639; 73 L. J. K. B. 857; 89 L. T. 318
Ormskirk Union v Chorlton Union	C A.	—	129	[1903] 2 K. B. 498; 72 L. J. K. B. 721; 89 L. T. 256
Osborne v Bradley	CH.D FAR. J.	—	44	[1903] 2 Ch. 446; 73 L. J. Ch. 49; 89 L. T. 11
Owens v Campbell	C.A.	481	107	[1904] 2 K. B. 60; 73 L. J. K. B. 634; 90 L. T. 811
Owner v Hooper	K.B.D.	—	108	89 L. T. 130
Pain v Pain	P.D. & A.D.	271	50	[1903] P. 263; 73 L. J. P. 1; 89 L. T. 588
Parker v London County Council	K B.D.	476	141	[1904] 2 K. B. 501; 73 L. J. K. B. 561; 90 L. T. 415
——— v Lord Advocate	H.L.	—	58	[1904] A. C. 364
Parry, In re. Ex parte The Trustee	BKCY.	256	13	[1904] 1 K. B. 129; 73 L. J. K. B. 83; 89 L. T. 612
——— v Holmes. In re Richardson	CH.D.BUCK.J.	119	190	[1904] 1 Ch. 332; 73 L. J. Ch. 153
Payne v Bennett. In re Goodrich	P.D. & A.D.	—	56	[1904] P. 138; 73 L. J. P. 33; 90 L. T. 170
Pearce v Marsh. In re Loveridge	CH.D.BUCK.J.	138	118	[1904] 1 Ch. 518; 73 L. J. Ch. 15
Pearce v Merriman	K.B.D.	141	55	[1904] 1 K. B. 80; 73 L. J. K. B. 183; 89 L. T. 745
"Pearlmoor," The	P.D. & A.D	—	159	[1904] P. 286; 73 L. J. P. 50; 90 L. T. 319
Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v Kingston	P.C.	—	6	[1903] A. C. 471; 72 L. J. P. C. 123; 89 L. T. 223
Perkins v Chapman. In re Chapman	C.A.	467	194	[1904] 1 Ch. 431; 73 L. J. Ch. 291; 90 L. T. 339
Perrott and King, In re	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	181	90 L. T. 156
Phillimore, In re. Phillimore v Milner	CH D. FAR. J.	682	154
Pimm, In re. Sharpe v Hodgson	CH.D. FAR. J.	648	193
Plews v Samuel	CH.D. KEK.J.	410	182	[1904] 1 Ch. 464; 73 L. J. Ch. 279; 90 L. T. 533
Police Commissioner v Roberts	K.B D.	560	89	[1904] 1 K. B. 369; 73 L J. K. B. 231
Police Commissioners v Donovan	K.B.D.	14	79	[1903] 1 K. B. 895; 72 L. J. K. B. 545; 88 L. T. 555
Polley v Fordham	K.B.D.	—	141	[1904] 2 K. B. 345; 73 L. J. K. B. 687; 90 L. T. 755
Pomeroy v Malvern Urban Council	K B.D.	—	141	89 L. T. 555
Pomfret v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.	C.A.	66	101	[1903] 2 K. B. 718; 72 L. J. K. B. 729; 89 L. T. 176
Poole and Clarke's Contract, In re	C.A.	—	181	[1904] 2 Ch. 173
"Port Caledonia" and "Anna," The	P.D. & A.D.	223	169	[1903] P. 184; 72 L. J. P. 60; 89 L. T. 216
Porter v Moore	CH.D.EADY,J.	619	179
Poulett Peerage, The	H.L.	—	87	[1903] A. C. 395
Pretoria Pietersburg Railway, In re	C.A.	—	29	[1904] 2 Ch. 170; 73 L. J. Ch. 551
Price v Union Lighterage Co.	C.A.	325	17	[1904] 1 K. B. 412; 73 L. J. K. B. 222; 89 L. T. 731
Prichard v Thomas. In re Estlin	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	18	72 L. J. Ch. 687; 89 L. T. 88
"Prince Llewellyn," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	169	[1904] P. 83; 73 L. J. P. 22; 89 L. T. 489
Prince of Wales Dock Co. v Fownes	C.A.	—	47	90 L. T. 527
Pringle & Co., In re	CH.D.BUCK.J.	—	137	89 L. T. 743
Pryse, In the Goods of	C.A.	—	140	[1904] P. 301; 73 L. J. P. 84; 90 L. T. 747
Public Works Minister v Hart	P.C.	—	122	[1904] A. C. 259; 90 L. T. 104
Pulsford v Devenish	CH.D. FAR. J.	73	29	[1903] 2 Ch. 625; 73 L. J. Ch. 35
Punt v Symons & Co.	CH.D.BYRNE,J	41	18	[1903] 2 Ch. 506; 72 L. J. Ch. 768; 89 L. T. 525
Purvis, In re	C.A.	—	96	[1904] 1 Ch. 373; 73 L. J. Ch. 381; 90 L. T. 394
Rabe v Otto	K.B.D.	—	151	89 L. T. 562
Rainbow v Howkins	K.B.D.	—	6	[1904] 2 K. B. 322; 73 L. J. K. B. 641
Rasch v Wulfe t	C.A.	145	137	[1904] 1 K. B. 118; 73 L. J. K. B. 20; 89 L. T. 493
Rathbone Brothers v David McIver & Co.	C.A.	68	158	[1903] 2 K. B. 378; 72 L. J. K. B. 703; 89 L. T. 378
Raven v Southampton Justices	K.B.D.	574	89	[1904] 1 K. B. 430; 73 L. J. K. B. 282; 90 L. T. 94
Ray v Hazeldine	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	52	[1904] 2 Ch. 17; 73 L. J. Ch. 537; 90 L. T. 703
Rayner, In re. Rayner v Rayner	C.A.	273	192	[1903] 1 Ch. 176; 73 L. J. Ch. 111; 89 L. T. 681
Reid v Macbeth	H.L.	—	152	[1904] A. C. 223; 90 L. T. 422
Reis, In re. Ex parte The Trustee	K.B.D.	302	10	[1904] 1 K. B. 451; 90 L. T. 62
Repington, In re.	CH.D. FAR. J.	522	72	[1904] 1 Ch. 811; 73 L. J. Ch. 533; 90 L. T. 663

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Rex v Beer	K.B.D.	221	40	[1903] 2 K. B. 693; 72 L. J. K. B. 608; 89 L. T. 412
—— v Birmingham County Court Judge	K.B.D.	524	41	[1904] 1 K. B. 827; 73 L. J. K. B. 344; 90 L. T. 514
—— v Bristol Justices	K.B.D.	—	88	89 L. T. 474
—— v Cornwall Justices	K.B.D.	31	133	[1903] 2 K. B. 178; 72 L. J. K. B. 622; 88 L. T. 775
—— v Gillespie	K.B.D.	367	148	[1904] 1 K. B. 174; 73 L. J. K. B. 106; 90 L. T. 15
—— v Humphris	C.C.R.	591	45	[1904] 2 K. B. 89; 73 L. J. K. B. 464; 90 L. T. 555
—— v Kent Justices	K.B.D.	—	63	[1904] 2 K. B. 319
—— v Louw	P.C.	—	130	[1904] A. C. 412
—— v Nepean	K.B.D.	264	54
—— v Parke	K.B.D.	215	34	[1903] 2 K. B. 432; 72 L. J. K. B. 839; 89 L. T. 439
—— v Pinckney	C.A.	338	63	[1904] 2 K. B. 84; 73 L. J. K. B. 475; 90 L. T. 468
—— v Rouse	C.C.R.	236	46	[1904] 1 K. B. 184; 73 L. J. K. B. 60; 89 L. T. 677
—— v Turner	C.C.R.	214	45	[1904] 1 K. B. 181; 73 L. J. K. B. 46; 89 L. T. 676
—— v Westminster High Bailiff	K.B.D.	10, 109	86	[1903] 2 K. B. 189; 72 L. J. K. B. 600; 88 L. T. 834
—— v West Riding Justices	K.B.D.	540	88	[1904] 1 K. B. 545; 73 L. J. K. B. 224; 90 L. T. 381
—— v Wyatt	C.C.R.	285	45	[1904] 1 K. B. 188; 73 L. J. K. B. 15
Richardson, In re. Parry v Holmes	CH.D.BUCK J.	119	190	[1904] 1 Ch. 332; 73 L. J. Ch. 153
Ridout v Fowler	C.A.	—	181	[1904] 2 Ch. 93; 73 L. J. Ch. 579
Rigby v Cox	C.A.	195	101	[1904] 1 K. B. 358; 73 L. J. K. B. 80; 89 L. T. 717
—— (No. 2)	K.B.D.	—	103	[1904] 2 K. B. 208; 73 L. J. K. B. 690
Rising, In re. Rising v Rising	CH.D.EADY,J.	—	47	[1904] 1 Ch. 533; 73 L. J. Ch. 455; 90 L. T. 504
Roberts v James	C.A.	—	138	89 L. T. 282
Roberts & Co., In re. Ex parte Bonzoline Co.	C.A.	—	8	[1904] 2 K. B. 299; 73 L. J. K. B. 724
Robertson v Buchanan	C.A.	—	44	90 L. T. 390
Robins v Goddard	K.B.D.	587	14	73 L. J. K. B. 712; 90 L. T. 772
Robinson v Burnell	K.B.D.	526	20
—— Brothers v Dixon	K.B.D.	8	70	[1903] 2 K. B. 701; 72 L. J. K. B. 717; 89 L. T. 132
—— Gold Mining Co. v Alliance Insurance Co.	H.L.	—	77	[1904] A. C. 359
Rowe, In re. Ex parte Derenberg	C.A.	628	12	[1904] 2 K. B. 483; 73 L. J. K. B. 594
——, In re. Ex parte West Coast Gold Fields	BKCY.	608	12	[1904] 2 K. B. 489
Rowell v Rowell	C.A.	—	66	89 L. T. 288
Rowson v Atlantic Transport Co.	C.A.	85	158	[1903] 2 K. B. 666; 72 L. J. K. B. 811; 89 L. T. 204
Ruben v Great Fingall Consolidated (Limited)	K.B.D.	—	26	[1904] 1 K. B. 650; 73 L. J. K. B. 299; 90 L. T. 163
Ruscoe v Groundsell	C.A.	—	51	89 L. T. 426
Ruther v Ruther	K.B.D.	154	79	[1903] 2 K. B. 207; 72 L. J. K. B. 826
St. James' and Pall Mall Electric Light Co. v Rex	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	120	90 L. T. 344
Safety Explosives (Limited), In re	C.A.	470	30	[1904] 1 Ch. 226; 72 L. J. Ch. 184; 90 L. T. 331
Salt v Scott-Hall	K.B.D.	95	92	[1904] 2 K. B. 245; 72 L. J. K. B. 627; 88 L. T. 868
Samuel v Jarrah Timber Corporation	H.L.	673	117	[1904] A. C. 323; 73 L. J. Ch. 526; 90 L. T. 731
Sanderson v Blyth Theatre Co.	C.A.	33	131	[1903] 2 K. B. 533; 72 L. J. K. B. 761; 89 L. T. 159
Saragossa and Mediterranean Railway Co. v Collingham	H.L.	609	32	[1904] A. C. 159; 73 L. J. Ch. 568; 90 L. T. 212
Saunderson v Collins	C.A.	354	7	[1904] 1 K. B. 628; 73 L. J. K. B. 358; 90 L. T. 243
Savage v Bentley	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	150	90 L. T. 641
Scott, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	140	[1903] P. 243; 73 L. J. P. 17; 89 L. T. 588
—— v Scott	CH.D.JOYCE,J	—	125	89 L. T. 582
Searle v Lund	C.A.	—	161	90 L. T. 529
Sellar v Charles Bright & Co.	C.A.	563	17	[1904] 2 K. B. 446; 73 L. J. K. B. 643
Sharman v Holliday & Greenwood	C.A.	—	107	[1904] 1 K. B. 235; 73 L. J. K. B. 176; 90 L. T. 46
Sharpe v Hodgson. In re Pimm	CH.D. FAR. J.	648	193
Sharpington v Fulham Guardians	CH.D. FAR. J.	617	141
Sheffield Corporation v Barclay & Co.	C.A.	54	26	[1903] 2 K. B. 580; 72 L. J. K. B. 777; 89 L. T. 227

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Shephard, In re. George v Thyer	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	97	[1904] 1 Ch. 456; 73 L. J. Ch. 401; 90 L. T. 249
Shepherd v Broome	H.L.	—	24	[1904] A. C. 342
Shilson, Coode, & Co., In re	CH.D. EADY, J.	556	172	[1904] 1 Ch. 837; 73 L. J. Ch. 541; 90 L. T. 641
Shoreditch Corporation v Bull	H.L.	—	63	90 L. T. 210
Simpson v Simpson	C.A.	310	157	[1904] 1 Ch. 1; 73 L. J. Ch. 53; 89 L. T. 543
Skinner, In re. Cooper v Skinner	CH.D. FAR. J	346	3	[1904] 1 Ch. 289; 73 L. J. Ch. 94; 89 L. T. 663
—— v Hunt	C.A.	—	84	[1904] 2 K. B. 452; 73 L. J. K. B. 680
Slobodinsky, In re. Ex parte Moore	BKCY.	156	13	[1903] 2 K. B. 517; 72 L. J. K. B. 883; 89 L. T. 190
Smith, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	139	[1904] P. 114; 73 L. J. P. 28; 90 L. T. 169
——, In re. Eastwick v Smith	CH.D. FAR. J.	104	180	[1904] 1 Ch. 139; 73 L. J. Ch. 74; 89 L. T. 604
—— v Betty	C.A.	137	171	[1903] 2 K. B. 317; 72 L. J. K. B. 853; 89 L. T. 258
—— v Dauney	K.B.D.	—	72	[1904] 2 K. B. 186; 73 L. J. K. B. 646; 90 L. T. 760
—— v Giddy	K.B.D.	—	124	[1904] 2 K. B. 448
—— v Law Guarantee and Trust Society	CH.D. BYRNE, J	—	19	[1904] 1 Ch. 500; 73 L. J. Ch. 233; 90 L. T. 659
—— v Leigh Union	C.A.	340	128	[1904] 1 K. B. 484; 73 L. J. K. B. 185; 90 L. T. 240
—— v McArthor	P.C.	—	123	[1904] A. C. 389; 90 L. T. 744
—— v Sibray, Hall, & Co.	K.B.D.	218	57	[1903] 2 K. B. 707; 72 L. J. K. B. 822; 89 L. T. 358
Smyth v Stretton	K.B.D.	—	71	90 L. T. 756
Sneade v Wotherton Barytes and Lead Mining Co.	C.A.	225	42	[1904] 1 K. B. 295; 73 L. J. K. B. 170; 90 L. T. 53
Société Générale du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France v Johann Maria Farina	C.A.	404	57	[1904] 1 K. B. 794; 73 L. J. K. B. 355; 90 L. T. 472
Solomons, In re	C.A.	473	9	[1904] 1 K. B. 106; 73 L. J. K. B. 55; 89 L. T. 637
Somerville and Turner, In re	CH.D. KEK.J	101	182	[1903] 2 Ch. 583; 72 L. J. Ch. 727; 89 L. T. 405
Sorsbie v Tea Corporation. In re Tea Corporation	C.A.	177	29	[1904] 1 Ch. 12; 73 L. J. Ch. 57; 89 L. T. 516
South African Supply and Cold Storage Co., In re	CH.D. BUCK.J.	649	25
South-West Suburban Water Co. v St. Marylebone Union	K.B.D.	378	185	[1904] 2 K. B. 174
Spark's Trust, In re. Massey v Spark	CH.D. KEK J.	426	66	[1904] 2 Ch. 121; 73 L. J. Ch. 259; 90 L. T. 54
Speake v Hughes	C.A.	—	48	[1904] 1 K. B. 138; 73 L. J. K. B. 172; 89 L. T. 576
Spillers v Taff Vale Railway Co.	K.B.D.	—	146	90 L. T. 713
Springfield v Thame	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	39	89 L. T. 242
Stafford's Settlement, In re. Gerard v Stafford	CH.D. WAR. J.	536	154	[1904] 2 Ch. 72; 73 L. J. Ch. 560
Stainer v Hodgkinson	CH.D. BUCK.J.	260	193
Steel v Grand Canary Coaling Co.	H.L.	—	162	90 L. T. 729
Stephens, In re. Kilby v Betts	CH.D. BUCK J.	89	191	[1904] 1 Ch. 322; 73 L. J. Ch. 3
—— v Dudbridge Ironworks Co.	C.A.	644	101	[1904] 2 K. B. 225; 90 L. T. 838
Stephenson v London Joint Stock Bank	C.A.	183	99
Stevens v King	CH.D. FAR. J	443	195	[1904] 2 Ch. 30; 73 L. J. Ch. 535; 90 L. T. 665
Stewart v Weber	K.B.D.	—	131	89 L. T. 559
Stiles v Galinski	K.B.D.	462	93	[1904] 1 K. B. 645; 73 L. J. K. B. 485; 90 L. T. 437
Stockdale v Ascherberg	C.A.	289	82	[1904] 1 K. B. 447; 73 L. J. K. B. 206; 90 L. T. 111
Stone and Hastie, In re	C.A.	130	109	[1903] 2 K. B. 463; 72 L. J. K. B. 816; 89 L. T. 353
—— v Midland Railway Co.	C.A.	491	146	[1904] 1 K. B. 669; 73 L. J. K. B. 392; 90 L. T. 194
Strand Wood Co., In re	C.A.	—	26	[1904] 2 Ch. 1; 73 L. J. Ch. 550; 90 L. T. 800
Strickland v Whittaker	K.B.D.	538	90	90 L. T. 445
Stroud v Royal Aquarium	CH.D. JOYCE, J	—	28	89 L. T. 243
Stuart v Joy	C.A.	—	81	[1904] 1 K. B. 362; 73 L. J. K. B. 97; 90 L. T. 78
"Sunlight," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	[1904] P. 100; 73 L. J. P. 25; 90 L. T. 32
Surrey Commercial Docks Co. v Bermondsey Corporation	K.B.D.	446	112	[1904] 1 K. B. 474; 73 L. J. K. B. 293; 90 L. T. 123
"Sussex," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	165	[1904] P. 236; 73 L. J. P. 73; 90 L. T. 549
Sussex Brick Co., In re	C.A.	371	31	[1904] 1 Ch. 598; 73 L. J. Ch. 308; 90 L. T. 426
Taddy v Sterious	CH.D. EADY, J.	152	151	[1904] 1 Ch. 354; 73 L. J. Ch. 191
Taylor v Hamstead Colliery Co.	C.A.	417	106	[1904] 1 K. B. 838; 73 L. J. K. B. 469; 90 L. T. 363
Taylor's Agreement Trusts, In re	CH.D. BUCK. J.	602	28	73 L. J. Ch. 557
Tea Corporation, In re. Sorsbie v Tea Corporation	C.A.	177	29	[1904] 1 Ch. 12; 73 L. J. Ch. 57; 87 L. T. 516

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903 04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Tendring Hundred Waterworks Co. v Jones	CH.D. FAR. J.	61	173	[1903] 2 Ch. 615; 73 L. J. Ch. 41
Tewkesbury Guardians v Birmingham Guardians	K.B.D.	—	128	[1904] 2 K. B. 395; 90 L. T. 787
Thompson v Eccles Corporation	K.B.D.	—	143	[1904] 2 K. B. 1; 73 L. J. K. B. 497; 90 L. T. 507
Thompson v Mason	K.B.D.	—	61	90 L. T. 649
Tivoli Manchester (Limited) v Colley	K.B.D.	632	150
Tolhurst v Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers	H.L.	143	34	[1903] A. C. 414; 72 L. J. K. B. 834; 89 L. T. 196
Tomalin v Smart	P.D. & A.D.	—	140	[1904] P. 141; 73 L. J. P. 37; 90 L. T. 171
"Torbryan," The	C.A.	40	158	[1903] P. 194; 72 L. J. P. 76; 87 L. T. 265
Tough v Hopkins	K.B.D.	605	124	[1904] 1 K. B. 804; 73 L. J. K. B. 628; 90 L. T. 672
Tower Justices v Chambers	K.B.D	541	87	90 L. T. 228
Towers v African Tug Co.	C.A.	530	22	[1904] 1 Ch. 558; 73 L. J. Ch. 395; 90 L. T. 298
Townshend's Settlement, In re	CH.D. FAR J.	—	155	89 L. T. 691
Trasenond Lennard, In re	C.A.	—	163	[1904] 2 K. B. 377; 73 L J. K. B. 553; 90 L. T. 407
Travers v Kelly. In re King	CH.D.EADY,J	230	198	[1904] 1 Ch. 363; 73 L. J. Ch. 210; 90 L T. 281
Trust and Loan Co. of Canada v Gauthier	P.C.	—	15	[1904] A. C. 94; 73 L. J. P. C 5; 89 L. T. 453
Turner, Brightman, & Co. v Bannatyne & Sons	K.B D.	—	168	89 L. T. 507
Tynemouth Corporation and Duke of Northumberland, In re	K.B.D.	—	187	89 L. T. 557
Underground Electric Railways Co. v Inland Revenue Commissioners	K.B D.	—	73	[1904] 2 K. B. 198; 73 L. J. K. B. 549
Upperton v Union Castle Steamship Co.	C.A.	—	161	89 L. T. 289
Usk Urban Council v Mortimer	K.B.D	—	142	90 L. T. 25
Valletort Sanitary Steam Laundry Co, In re	CH.D.EADY,J	—	20	[1903] 2 Ch. 654; 72 L. J. Ch. 674; 89 L. T. 60
Van Laun & Co. v Baring Brothers	C.A.	59	79	[1903] 2 K. B. 277; 72 L. J. K. B. 756; 89 L. T. 120
Venn, In re. Lindon v Ingram	CH.D.JOYCE,J	603	190	[1904] 2 Ch. 52; 73 L. J. Ch. 507; 90 L. T. 502
Vezey v Rashleigh	CH.D BYRNE,J	442	38	[1904] 1 Ch. 634; 73 L. J. Ch. 422; 90 L. T. 663
Vickers v Selwyn	K B.D.	153	56	89 L. T. 747
"Ville de St. Nazaire," The	C.A.	68	171
Wakefield Corporation v Cocke	H.L.	321	95	[1904] A. C. 31; 73 L. J. K. B. 88; 89 L. T. 707
Walker v Walker	K.B.D.	—	89	90 L. T. 88
Walkers, Winser, & Co. v Shaw & Co.	K.B.D.	—	151	[1904] 2 K. B. 152; 73 L. J. K. B. 325; 90 L. T. 454
Walter v Bewicke	C.A.	—	130	90 L. T. 409
Walters v French Brewster. In re French Brewster	CH D.EADY,J	377	109
Warburg v McKerrow	K.B.D.	—	5	90 L. T. 644
Ward v Huddrill	K B.D.	398	40	[1904] 1 K. B. 399; 73 L. J. K. B. 277; 90 L. T. 232
Warr & Co. v London County Council	C A.	405	86	[1904] 1 K. B. 713; 73 L. J. K. B. 362; 90 L. T. 368
Watson v Watson	P.D. & A.D.	—	50	89 L. T. 78
Weardale Waterworks Co. v Chester-le-Street Co-operative Co.	K.B.D.	684	185	[1904] 2 K. B. 240; 73 L. J. K. B. 659
Weaving v Kirk & Randall	C.A.	209	106	[1904] 1 K. B. 213; 73 L. J. K. B. 77; 89 L. T. 577
Webster v Sharp	C.A.	275	105	[1904] 1 K. B. 218; 73 L. J. K. B 141; 89 L. T. 627
Weingarten v Bayer	C.A.	—	175	89 L. T. 56
Wellcome v Thompson	C.A.	581	175	[1904] 1 Ch. 736; 73 L. J. Ch. 474
Welsbach Incandescent Gas Light Co., In re	C A.	327	24	[1904] 1 Ch. 87; 73 L. J. Ch. 104; 89 L. T. 645
Werner Motors v Gamage	CHD. BYRNE J	—	48	[1904] 1 Ch. 264; 73 L. J. Ch. 266; 90 L. T. 342
West Ham Union v Holbeach Union	C.A.	513	129	[1904] 2 K. B. 121
—— v London County Council	H.L.	465	128	[1904] A. C. 40; 73 L. J. K. B. 85; 89 L. T. 614
West Riding Rivers Board v Rawson	K.B.D.	—	183	89 L. T. 363
West and Hardy, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	188	99	[1904] 1 Ch. 145; 73 L. J. Ch. 91; 89 L. T. 579
Westminster Corporation v Johnson	K.B.D.	350	72	[1904] 1 K. B. 19; 73 L. J. K. B. 8; 89 L. T. 562
Wheeler, In re. Hankinson v Hayter	CH.D.WAR.,J	586	98	[1904] 2 Ch. 66; 73 L J. Ch. 576
Whitaker, In re. Whitaker v Palmer	CH.D. FAR. J	—	3	[1904] 1 Ch. 299; 73 L. J. Ch. 166; 90 L. T. 277

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1903-04.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
White v Metcalf . . .	CH.D. KEK. J.	280	118	[1903] 2 Ch. 567; 72 L. J. Ch. 712; 89 L. T. 164
Whiting, In re. Whiting v De Rutzen .	CH.D.WAR.,J.	653	157
——— v Turner . . .	P.D. & A.D.	—	140	89 L. T. 71
Wieland v Butler-Hogan . .	K.B.D.	—	142	90 L. T. 588
Wilcox v Steel . . .	C.A.	—	97	[1904] 1 Ch. 212; 73 L. J. Ch. 217; 89 L. T. 640
Wiles, Ex parte . . .	K.B.D.	—	148	90 L. T. 225
Wilkinson v Llandaff District Council	C.A.	50	94	[1903] 2 Ch. 695; 73 L. J. Ch. 8; 89 L. T. 462
Williams, In re. Holder v Williams .	CHD.JOYCE J	318	3	[1904] 1 Ch. 52; 73 L. J. Ch. 82; 89 L. T. 663
——— v North's Navigation Collieries	C.A.	564	108	[1904] 2 K. B. 44; 73 L. J. K. B. 575
——— v Williams . . .	P.D. & A.D.	—	66	[1904] P. 145; 73 L. J. P. 31; 90 L. T. 174
Wilson v Basset . . .	P.D. & A.D.	271	140	[1903] P. 239; 72 L. J. P. 89; 89 L. T. 586
——— v Twamley . . .	C.A.	529	82	[1904] 2 K. B. 99; 73 L. J. K. B. 703; 90 L. T. 751
Wimborne, In re . . .	CH.D. EADY,J	334	156	[1904] 1 Ch. 480; 73 L. J. Ch. 270; 90 L. T. 540
Winans v Attorney-General . .	H.L.	—	51	[1904] A. C. 287; 73 L. J. K. B. 613; 90 L. T. 721
Wing v Epsom Urban Council .	K.B D	461	80	[1904] 1 K. B. 798; 73 L. J. K. B. 389; 90 L. T. 543
Wodehouse v Fox . . .	CHD BYRNE,J	229	189	[1904] 1 Ch. 480; 73 L. J. Ch. 314; 90 L. T. 477
——— v Scobell. In re Repington .	CH.D. FAR. J.	522	72	[1904] 1 Ch. 811
Woods, In re. Gabellini v Woods .	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	198	[1904] 2 Ch. 4; 73 L. J. Ch. 204; 90 L. T. 8
Wordsley Brewery Co. v Halford .	K.B D.	—	84	90 L. T. 89
Wrightson, In re . . .	C.A.	—	196	[1904] 2 Ch. 95; 90 L. T. 748
Wyke v Wyke . . .	P.D. & A.D.	—	49	[1904] P. 149; 74 L. J. P. 38; 90 L. T. 172
Wynne-Finch v Chaytor . .	C.A.	24	130	[1903] 2 Ch. 475; 72 L. J. Ch. 723; 89 L. T. 123
Yeoman v Rex . . .	C.A.	627	162	[1904] 2 K. B. 429
Young v Steamship "Scotia" . .	P.C.	—	169	[1903] A. C. 501; 72 L. J. P. C. 115; 89 L. T. 374

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1903-1904.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — April 7, 8; May 22, 1903.

NIGHTINGALE v. REYNOLDS. (a.)

Mortgage—Priority—Portion—Mortgage pursuant to order of court to raise two out of three portions charged on real estate.

Under the will of a testator, who died in 1851, three sums of £5,000, for children's portions, were charged on his real estate. In 1880 two of the portions had become raiseable, and in an action brought for the purpose of clearing the estate from charges an order was made in 1882 directing that the two portions should be raised by a mortgage of the estate to a person who was willing to lend the money, such mortgage to be settled by the judge. The proposed mortgagee was aware of all the circumstances and of the purposes for which the money to be advanced was required. The mortgage as settled contained recitals of the title to the portions and of the proceedings in the action, and was expressed to be without prejudice to any charge which might be subsisting in the mortgaged hereditaments under the will. The money was paid by the mortgagee into court, and was afterwards distributed among the persons interested. In an action by the mortgagee claiming priority over the persons interested in the third portion,

Held, that, having regard to the circumstances of the action and the actual terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee was only entitled to a charge on the estate for the two sums of £5,000, pari passu with the third sum of like amount.

Decision of Kekewich, J. ([1902] 2 Ch. 117), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 1902, 2 Ch. 117, 50 W. R. Dig. 120).

The facts were as follow:

Henry Muskett had three daughters, Emily Louisa Dashwood, Clara Hannah Reynolds, and Julia Matilda Etheridge. The first two married before he made his will, but the other was then a spinster. On the marriage of Mrs. Dashwood, in 1847, he secured to her by bond, given to the trustees of her marriage settlement, a sum of £5,000, and on the marriage of Mrs. Reynolds, in 1848, he secured a like sum of £5,000 by covenant. The sum of £5,000, which was in each case made payable after the death of Henry Muskett, was also in each case settled on the children of the marriage attaining twenty-one. In each case two life annuities were also secured as a provision for the daughter and her husband until the £5,000 became payable.

Henry Muskett made his will, dated the 16th of April, 1849. He thereby gave to his daughter Mrs. Etheridge (then unmarried) an annuity of £200 for her life, and in case she should marry and leave children he gave for the portions of such children attaining twenty-one the sum of £5,000. He subjected and charged specified real estate (which was in fact all his real estate) with the annuity to his said daughter, as also with an annuity given to his wife, and with the said sum of £5,000. He referred to the bond given on the marriage of Mrs. Dashwood, and the settlement of the £5,000 thereby secured; and after confirming the bond and settlement in every respect, he exonerated his personal estate from the payment of the several annuities and sums of money so secured and made payable, stating his intention that the same should be charged upon and payable out of his real estate only. He referred to the settlement made on the marriage of Mrs. Reynolds, confirmed that also, exonerated his personal estate from the payment of the several annuities and sums of money thereby secured and made payable, and stated his intention that the same should be charged upon and payable out of his real estate only. He gave the residue of his personal estate to his son, Henry Joseph Muskett, subject nevertheless to and after payment of his just debts and his funeral and testamentary expenses, and certain legacies which he had given to his wife and daughters respectively, and he provided that in case his personal estate should be insufficient for the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies thereinbefore last mentioned, the same should be a charge upon and payable out of his real estate, which he thereby gave to his said son for his life, with remainder to his children.

Henry Muskett died in 1851. His daughter Julia Matilda married Mr. Etheridge in 1856, and died in 1858, leaving one child, who attained twenty-one in October, 1879. Mrs. Dashwood died in 1880. She had two children, who attained twenty-one before May, 1882. Mrs. Reynolds had several children, one of whom at least attained twenty-one before May, 1882. Mrs. Reynolds was still alive, and was the first defendant to the action.

In 1880 Henry Joseph Muskett, the testator's son and devisee for life of the real estate, commenced an action of Muskett v. Muskett, in the Chancery Division in order to get the real estate cleared of the charges thereon. The action was properly constituted for this purpose, such of the parties interested as were not made defendants in the first instance being served with notice of the decree, and therefore equally bound by the proceedings as if they had been named defendants. There was a statement of claim, and on the 3rd of July, 1880, a decree was made by Hall, V.C., directing numerous inquiries mainly concerned with the parties interested in the real and leasehold estates passing by the will and the charges thereon. The first and thirteenth inquiries were in the following terms:

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1. An inquiry whether the debts of the testator other than the bond debt of £5,000 to the plaintiff and to William Collett Reynolds and Robert Fickling, and other than the sum of £5,000 secured by the testator's covenant with Charles Burton Dashwood and the said Robert Fickling in the said will respectively mentioned, and whether the funeral and testamentary expenses of the tetsator and the pecuniary legacies given by his said will, other than the portion of £5,000 bequeathed to the child or children of his daughter Julia Matilda, have been respectively paid.

13. An inquiry whether any and which of the several portions of £5,000 and £5,000 in the said will respectively mentioned and thereby charged upon the testator's real estate in exoneration of his personal estate are now raisable, and to whom such of the said portions as are now raisable ought to be paid.

The decree gave liberty to apply in chambers for raising by sale or mortgage what was necessary for the purpose of satisfying such, if any, of the testator's debts as remained unpaid, and were then raisable out of his real estate, and also what should be certified to be due in respect of the principal of such of the said portions respectively as should for the time being be raisable, together with the costs of action.

This decree was based on a statement of claim which set forth the will at length, and stated that the plaintiff, to whom administration with the will annexed had been granted, had long since received and got in the personal estate of the testator, and had paid thereout the testator's debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies given by his will other than the said portion of £5,000 for the child or children of his daughter Julia Matilda. It also stated that Mrs. Etheridge and Mrs. Dashwood, and Mrs. Holmes, one of the latter's children who had attained twenty-one, had respectively applied to the plaintiff and had required payment of their portions of £5,000 and £5,000. The plaintiff claimed inquiries respecting the said several sums of £5,000, £5,000, and £5,000, and that such (if any) of them as were then due and payable might be ordered to be raised by mortgage of the real estate, and that provision might be made for raising the other or others of the said portions when the same became payable.

The chief clerk's certificate, in answer to the inquiries directed by the decree, was made on the 17th of February, 1882. The answer to the inquiry No. 13 commenced thus: "Of the several portions of £5,000, £5,000, and £5,000, in the said will respectively mentioned, and thereby charged upon the testator's real estate, only the following are now raisable, that is to say," and it then proceeded to find that the portion of £5,000, given for the children of Mrs. Etheridge, and also the portion of £5,000 given or secured to the children of Mrs. Dashwood, were then raisable, and ought respectively to be paid to the persons in the certificate mentioned in that behalf.

The decree did not reserve further consideration, but an application was made in chambers under the liberty to apply, and on that application an order was made dated the 17th of May, 1882. It provided for the taxation of costs, and, after reciting that it appeared by the chief clerk's certificate that the sums of £5,000 and £5,000 were raisable in respect of the portions of the children of Mrs. Etheridge and Mrs. Dashwood, it was ordered that the said sums and costs should be raised by a mortgage of the real estate to one Samuel Nightingale, who was willing to lend the same, and that such mortgage should be settled by the judge. Provision was made for the execution of the mortgage, and the money lent was ordered to be paid into court, and after directing payment thereout of the taxed costs, it was further ordered that thereout also the said sums of £5,000, and £5,000, and £185 19s. 10d., which had been expended in the enfranchisement of copyholds, should be paid to such persons as should be certified to be entitled to receive the same, and in such proportion as should be also certified.

The mortgage was settled and executed as directed by the order. The moneys lent, including the taxed costs and the enfranchisement moneys, amounting altogether to £10,862 12s. 3d., were paid into court, and on the 2nd of August, 1883, there was a further certificate finding to whom the moneys were payable. For the present purpose it is sufficient to say that £5,000 was certified to be payable and was paid to the trustees of Mrs. Etheridge's only child, and £5,000 was found payable and was paid to the children of Mrs. Dashwood or those claiming through them.

The mortgage was dated the 21st of July, 1883, the parties being Henry Joseph Muskett (the person appointed by order of the court to convey) and Samuel Nightingale. It was a lengthy document, and contained many recitals, including, of course, all the Chancery proceedings. There were recitals to the effect that the portions of Mrs. Etheridge and Mrs. Dashwood were raisable by reason of those ladies having had children who attained twenty-one, and that Mrs. Reynolds was still living and had had several children, but their ages were not mentioned. The operative part was as follows: "Now this indenture witnesseth, that in further pursuance of the said recited order, and by virtue thereof, and in consideration of the said sum of £10,862 12s. 3d. so paid by the said Samuel Nightingale as aforesaid, he, the said Henry Joseph Muskett, as beneficial owner, so far as relates to his estate and interest for life under the said recited will of the said Henry Muskett in the hereditaments intended to be hereby assured, and so as to pass the full benefit of the charge created by the same will in priority to the said life estate or interest, for the purpose of raising the portions of £5,000, and £5,000 provided respectively for the child or children of the said Julia Matilda Etheridge and for the children of the said Charles Burton Dashwood and Emily Louisa his wife, and the interest on the same portions respectively, and as trustee so far as relates to the estate or interest of the persons entitled in remainder in the same hereditaments, hereby grants and conveys unto the said Samuel Nightingale all and singular the manor or lordship, or reputed manor or lordship, advowson, capital and other messuages, farms, lands, tenements, and hereditaments specified and particularized in the schedule hereunder written, being part of the hereditaments and premises mentioned in the first schedule to the chief clerk's certificate made in the said action, to hold unto and to the use of the said Samuel Nightingale in fee simple and particularly as to the premises specified and particularized in the second part of the said schedule hereto, with the full benefit and advantage of the enfranchisement intended to be made thereof as aforesaid, but as to the premises specified and particularized in the third part of the same schedule according to the custom of the same manor of Burgh Vaux, and by and under the rents, suits, and services therefor due and of right accustomed, and subject as to the life estate or interest of the said Henry John Muskett to the mortgage thereon hereinbefore mentioned, and as to all the said hereditaments and premises without prejudice to any charge which may be subsisting therein under the said will of the said Henry Muskett, subject to the proviso for redemption hereinafter contained." The proviso for redemption in effect was that on the principal and interest being paid the property should be conveyed to the then subsisting uses or limitations of the will.

The mortgagee, Samuel Nightingale, died in 1886, having by his will appointed his son, the plaintiff, Samuel Nightingale, and two other persons his executors, and by an indenture of the 14th of March, 1890, the mortgage was duly transferred to the plaintiff, who now brought this action, claiming a declaration that he was entitled in respect of his security to priority as against the hereditaments comprised therein over the Reynolds portion of £5,000, and foreclosure, accounts, and other relief.

The defendants were Mrs. Reynolds and her children, the seven children of Henry Joseph Muskett (deceased), and the National Reversionary Investment Co., who were assignees of the share of one of the children of Mrs. Reynolds.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff could only claim a charge for the two sums of £5,000 pari passu with the third sum.

The plaintiff appealed.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and J. K. Young, for the appellant.

Warrington, K.C., and Tyssen, for the Reynolds family.

W. A. Peck, for the National Reversionary Investment Co.

The following authorities were referred to: Sheppard v. Wilson, 4 Hare 392; Morley v. Morley, 5 Ves. 248; Davidson's Precedents in Conveyancing, vol. 3, part 1 (3rd ed.), p. 457; Seton's Judgments and Orders, vol. 2 (6th ed.), p. 1736.

Cur. adv. vult.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment, in which Collins, M.R., concurred: The question we have to decide is to what extent the mortgage to Mr. Nightingale—hereafter called the mortgagee—has prejudiced or affected the charge created by the will of the testator Henry Muskett in favour of the annuities to Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds and of the portion of £5,000 for their children. For brevity I shall hereafter refer to these annuities as "the annuity" and to the portion as "the Reynolds portion." At the date when the action of Muskett v. Muskett was commenced the annuity and the Reynolds portion were charged by the will on the testator's real and leasehold estate pari passu with the two other portions of £5,000 each. The annuity and the Reynolds portion and one of the two other portions were secured by the covenant of the testator in his lifetime, and in respect of these there was a debt due from his estate at his death. The two last-mentioned portions, hereafter called the two portions, had become payable, but the Reynolds portion was not payable. The plaintiff in that action, hereafter referred to as the plaintiff, was under the will legal tenant for life, and the defendants were legal tenants in remainder of the estate subject to the above-mentioned charges. In the will there was no provision enabling the tenant for life or any other person to free the estate or any part of it from the charges. In this state of things I think it is advisable, in order to properly determine this appeal, in the first place to carefully consider the proceedings in the action of Muskett v. Muskett—hereafter called the action—which resulted in Mr. Nightingale's mortgage, and then to discuss the terms of that mortgage on which the mortgagees' rights must ultimately depend. Now it is clear from the statement of claim in the action that its sole object was to have the portions that were then due and payable raised and paid out of the settled estate and to have the remaining portion raised and paid when it became payable. The only parties to the action were the persons legally entitled to the estate subject to the charges; there were no trusts to be administered. The statement of claim alleged, as the facts were, that the plaintiff, who was the sole legatee of the residuary personal estate under the will, had paid all the debts and legacies of the testator, other than portions, and had kept down the annuities bequeathed by the will. The statement of claim further alleged that those entitled to the two portions required payment, and the claim was only to have an inquiry what portions were then due and payable and to have them raised by mortgage of the estate. The action as constituted in no wise appears to contemplate any interference with the charge of the Reynolds portion or with the rights of those interested therein. Still less does it appear in any way concerned with or to relate to the annuity, and the persons entitled to that annuity were in no wise concerned in that capacity with the raising of the portions. In short, the action appears only to relate, so far as concerns the immediate action of the court, to the enforcement of a right claimed on behalf of the tenant for life of the estate subject to its charges as against those entitled in remainder to have the two charges that were then due and payable raised out of the corpus of the estate belonging to the parties to the action, that is to say, the estate subject to its charges. But in such an action it was obviously right and proper, were it not actually necessary, especially as the plaintiff was the legatee of the testator's residuary personal estate, that it should be shown to the court that the testator's debts and pecuniary legacies and funeral and testamentary expenses were paid, and that the annuities charged against the estate were not in arrear. Accordingly when the action came on for judgment in default of defence on the 3rd of July, 1880, there are inquiries and accounts directed to bring out the above facts. Also, as was right and proper, there was an inquiry whether any and which of the three portions were then raisable and an account was directed of what was then due for interest and principal in respect of each of such of the portions as were then raisable. I need scarcely say that there is nothing in these inquiries and accounts to alter or enlarge the nature of the action or to prejudice the annuity or the Reynolds portion, but there are parts of the judgment which confirm the view of the action that I have previously indicated. After the above-mentioned inquiries it is ordered that what, if anything, should be certified was then due in respect of the said annuities, and also the future payments of the then subsisting annuities should be paid and kept down by the plaintiff during his life out of the rents and profits of such parts of the estate as was subject to the said payments respectively. Then follows the following significant provision: [His lordship referred to the order, and continued:] Now this last provision seems to me to show clearly that the court was only considering for the purpose of raising the necessary moneys the beneficial estate belonging to the parties to the action at the time of the judgment, for it not only includes as part of the moneys to be raised any sum necessary to discharge any unpaid debts of the testator, which as between the then parties to the action and those entitled to the charges on the estate would have to be borne by the former, but it also includes in the moneys to be raised the costs of the action. It is almost incredible that the court should have contemplated that the plaintiff and defendants to the action should obtain payment of their costs by a charge to take precedence over the charges in favour of the annuity and of the Reynolds portion. With reference to the liberty to apply for a sale as well as for a mortgage contained in the last-mentioned provision, it does not appear to me to militate against the view I am taking. A sale of part of the estate might have been made subject to the annuity, and if necessary also subject to the Reynolds portion. And even if for the purposes of raising the two portions payable, the court might have had jurisdiction as against the Reynolds portion to order a sale of part of the estate it would never have done so without inquiry as to value in order to see that a part of the estate sufficient in value was left for the Reynolds portion, and no such inquiry was ever directed or, so far as I can see, ever really contemplated. And as against the annuity I do not see what right the court would have had in this action, and in the circumstances existing to order a sale of any part of the estate freed from the annuity. Looking, then, at the action as framed and to the judgment obtained, having regard to its form and to the circumstances under which it was given, it appears to me that so far no interference with the charge of the annuity and of the Reynolds portion was contemplated or authorized.

Although it may not have been actually necessary that this judgment should be served on the members of the Reynolds family, it was obviously convenient and proper that that should be done, and that they should have an opportunity of appearing, and should be bound by the result of the proceedings. They were interested in several of the inquiries and accounts directed, and moreover, through their trustees they were interested as ordinary creditors of the testator, and should they have thought it right to insist on their rights as such creditors difficulties might have ensued, and those difficulties would be removed by their being served and appearing and raising no claim. Accordingly they were served with the judgment and became bound by the proceedings, but it is clear that so far nothing had been done which had in any way prejudiced or affected their charges or had indicated any suggested right or any intention on the part of the court to prejudice or affect them. Then followed the chief clerk's certificate. It answered the inquiries and found inter alia that there were no outstanding ordinary debts of the testator and no arrears of the annuity, and stated the position of affairs with regard to the portion and set forth in the schedule the particulars of the estate and found that there was no incumbrance affecting it other than the charges created by the will. Then came the order on further consideration of the 17th of May, 1882; that order on the face of it appears to me also to bear out the view that the court throughout the action was not contemplating or sanctioning anything to the prejudice of the charge for the annuity and the Reynolds portion. It made an order for taxation of the further costs of the plaintiff and defendants to the action and of the costs of the parties served with the judgment and having liberty to attend, and found that a sum of £185 19s. 10d. was needed for the enfranchisement of a copyhold portion of the estate required by the lord of the manor. It then stated that Mr. Nightingale was willing to advance the two sums of £5,000 and £5,000 required for the two portions raisable and the enfranchisement money and the taxed costs on a mortgage of the estate mentioned in the schedule to the chief clerk's certificate, or a competent part of the estate. And it was ordered that the said sums and costs be raised by mortgage accordingly, such mortgage to be settled by the judge. Then comes an important part of the order: "And it is ordered that the plaintiff be and he is hereby appointed to execute the same for the purpose of conveying the real estate so to be mortgaged for all the estate and interest of the infant defendants or other the persons entitled in remainder." That is to say, the order contemplates that the plaintiff would convey in respect of his own life interest and in respect of those entitled in remainder, and not (so far as expressed) on behalf of any other persons. It is difficult to suppose from this that the court contemplated any conveyance except by and on behalf of those entitled to the estate as settled by the will—that is to say, the estate subject to the charges. The order then gives leave to Mr. Nightingale to pay into court to the credit of the action the total of the said sums and costs, and then directs that thereupon the said mortgage should be executed by all proper parties as the judge shall direct and be delivered to the mortgagee, and then directs payment out of court of the costs and of the two portions raised and the enfranchisement money to the parties entitled to the same. It is to be noticed that Mr. Nightingale was made aware of the exact position of affairs. He knew of the charges by the will. He knew what the action was for and the various proceedings in it, and he knew that he was asked to lend moneys in respect of the different items that had been raised and he knew the purposes for which they were raised, and to whom when raised they would go after his mortgage was executed. There was nothing in the proceedings in the action to lead Mr. Nightingale to suppose that he was to receive a security which would prejudice in any way the charge in favour of the annuity and of the Reynolds portion, and if he desired to obtain such a security he should have made his desire plain, and if he did not do so and did not in fact obtain such a security then he has only himself or his advisers to blame. It follows from the above observation that, looking to the order on further consideration as a whole, it is perfectly consistent with the original object and scope of the action and with all the other proceedings in the action, and shows no intention whatever to interfere with or prejudice or affect the charges of the annuity and of the Reynolds portion. This brings me to a consideration of the mortgage deed itself, for the subsequent proceedings in the action so far as material were merely an approval by the court of the form of mortgage to be executed and an ascertainment by taxation of the costs to be raised, payment into court by Mr. Nightingale of the necessary moneys, and then the mortgage to him was executed. From these proceedings I should have expected to find that the mortgage in favour of the mortgagee approved of by the court and executed would be one that did not in any way enlarge or in any way prejudice the right of those entitled to the annuity and to the Reynolds portion. And on perusal and consideration of that mortgage it fulfils my expectation and in my opinion on its construction its effect is what I have above indicated.

The only parties to the mortgage deed are the plaintiff and the mortgagee. The recitals are full, and show clearly all the material facts, and the rights of all persons interested in the mortgage property and the proceedings in the action and what moneys had to be raised and advanced by the mortgagee and for what purposes. There is, however, a recital of a fact which did not appear from the proceedings in the action and which is of some materiality. It appeared from this recital that the plaintiff as tenant for life had mortgaged his life estate to one George Durrant (who was in no wise party or in any way bound by the proceedings in the action) and that this mortgage was still effective as against some parts of the estate, though what parts is not stated. Then, coming to the assurance by the plaintiff, it is important to notice the form in which he conveys. It is as follows: "He, the said Henry Joseph Muskett, as beneficial owner so far as relates to his estate or interest for life under the said recited will of the said Henry Muskett in the hereditaments intended to be hereby assured, and so as to pass the full benefit of the charge created by the same, will in priority to the said life estate or interest for the purpose of raising the portion of £5,000 and £5,000 provided respectively for the child or children of the said Julia Matilda Etheridge and for the children of the said Charles Burton Dashwood and Emily Louisa, his wife, and the interest on the same portions respectively and as trustee so far as relates to the estate or interest of the persons entitled in remainder in the same hereditaments hereby grants and conveys unto the said Samuel Nightingale."

Now, two points for observation arise from this. The first concerns the assurance by the plaintiff "so far as relates to his estate or interest for life under the . . . will," and "as trustee so far as relates to the estate or interest of the person entitled in remainder." That carried out the order on further consideration in that behalf and tends strongly to show that the plaintiff was only authorized to convey the estate on behalf and in respect of the interests of those entitled to it, subject to the charges created by the will, and not on behalf or in respect of the interests of those entitled to the annuity and the Reynolds portion. The second point which gives rise to observation is that the plaintiff is made to assure so as to pass the full benefit of the two charges in respect of the two portions of £5,000 each which were being raised, and not so as to pass any right in respect of the Reynolds portion or of the annuity. The assurance in this respect is curiously framed from a strict conveyancing point of view, but the object of it is clear and its effect is undoubted. The charges in favour of the two portions paid off were clearly intended to be kept alive in favour of the mortgagee and there is no difficulty in giving effect to the clear intention. This was of practical importance to the mortgagee having regard to the mortgage on the life estate in favour of George Durrant; and Mr. Nightingale as against Durrant would have had to rely on the charges in respect of the two portions. Now these two charges only ranked pari passu with the charges in favour of the annuity and the Reynolds portion, and could only be set up by the mortgagee as ranking pari passu, and it seems clear from this, as well as from the reference to the two raised portions, that it was contemplated that all the charges were to remain unaffected by the mortgage deed. Then comes the habendum showing that the lands conveyed were to be held by the mortgagee with the full benefit of the enfranchisement intended to be made, and subject as to the life estate or interest of the plaintiff to the mortgage thereon and as to all the lands "without prejudice to any charge which may be subsisting therein under the said will," "subject to the proviso for redemption hereinafter contained (that is to say)," and then followed the proviso for redemption.

Now, on the construction of this part of the deed I think its meaning and effect is that Mr. Nightingale was to hold subject to the existing charges, and not that the reference to those charges was merely made part of the proviso for redemption to be treated as if it had been put in at the end of the proviso. This view is, in my opinion, in accordance with the words employed when read according to their primâ facie and natural meaning. And it is borne out by the position and wording of the clause referring to the charges and by the difficulty of treating that clause as intended to come in at the end of the proviso for redemption, where it would be difficult to read in the exact words used in the clause—viz., "and as to all the said hereditaments and premiums without prejudice," &c. But still more strongly it is borne out by the other part of the deed, and also by the difficulty of supposing that in such an action as that in which the mortgage was authorized, and after the proceedings in that action to which I have called attention the court intended to sanction or did sanction a mortgage which would interfere with the charge of the Reynolds portion, and still less one which would interfere with the annuity, which was in no wise concerned with the portions.

I have now completed my examination of the deed, which in my opinion carefully and properly preserves the rights of those interested in the annuity and Reynolds portion without in any way enlarging them, but I will add a few words on the argument on behalf of the appellant, which was much pressed upon us, and was based on the inconvenient nature of the security obtained by Mr. Nightingale, and on the alleged difficulty of supposing that he could have been expected to lend his money on such a security. In the first place, even admitting this to the full, yet it affords no sufficient ground for altering the view I have taken as to the effect of the deed, or for prejudicing or affecting those interested in the annuity and in the Reynolds portion. The mortgagee was, as I have already pointed out, made fully aware of all the circumstances of the case, and the deed was approved of on his behalf before he parted with his money, but in my opinion the inconvenience arising from the nature of his security has been much exaggerated. He obtained a mortgage on the whole estate subject only to such rights therein as existed in respect of the annuity and the Reynolds portion. It is not suggested that at the time he made his advance that security was not ample. It is the subsequent diminution in the value of the lands which has rendered the present question important. In respect of the security he obtained he could have sold the estate subject to the right I have mentioned under his power of sale, and could otherwise have enforced all the rights of a mortgagee. That he was not obtaining a security altogether free from difficulty is perfectly free from doubt, seeing that he knew of the mortgage of the life interest and the necessity of having the benefit of the charges of the two portions that were being raised. And it seems to me that any argument based upon the exact amount of difficulty in the nature of his security is entitled to little weight. It only remains for me to say a word as to the enfranchisement money. I have pointed out that the rights of those interested in the annuity and in the Reynolds portion were in no way enlarged by the mortgage. Now there was good ground (which I need not further enter into) for saying that so far as the mortgagee's money went to pay for the enfranchisement he could support a claim to a first charge over the estate, or at any rate over the enfranchised portion. And so far as the respondents are concerned it would not matter much whether that first charge was only on the enfranchised lands or on all the lands, and accordingly they appear not to have objected to the view that in respect of the enfranchisement money the mortgagee obtained a first charge, at any rate there is no appeal by them from this part of the order. But that in no wise prejudices them in saying that as to the rest of his moneys the mortgagee has only the ordinary rights given to him by his deed. He knew exactly, and the proceedings and mortgage set forth what moneys he was advancing, and for what purposes, and any special security he may have obtained by reason of the purpose to which part was applied cannot enlarge his security in respect of the other moneys. It appears to me that the order of Kekewich, J., has at least given to Mr. Nightingale all the rights he was entitled to, assuming that the mortgage deed did not prejudice the rights of the respondents. As to the sum advanced for costs, those costs were clearly not chargeable in front of the charges of the respondents, but were payable by those entitled to the estate subject to the charges. I am not sure that the order so far as it covers the sum advanced for costs is not too favourable to the appellant, but as there is no counter-appeal on this head I need not further consider the point. I think, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed for the reasons stated by Romer, L.J., in the judgment which he has read. But I desire to add a few words on the nature and frame of the action of Muskett v. Muskett. The sole plaintiff was the legal tenant for life and the sole defendants were the legal remaindermen in fee, though the plaintiff was also the legal personal representative of the testator. No person interested in the annuity and portion charged upon the property was made a party. I doubt whether such an action could be maintained except on the footing that it was an action for the administration of the unadministered estate of the testator. It was treated as falling within ord. 16, r. 40, the annuitant or portioners being all served with notice of the judgment, and thus treated as being bound by the proceedings in the same manner as if they had originally been made parties. In short they were regarded as legatees whose legacies were payable out of and charged upon the testator's real estate solely. In this view the court had jurisdiction to direct the two legacies, which were then raisable to be raised by mortgage or sale and to give a mortgagee or purchaser a good title free from the claims of the Reynolds family. The court was not bound to raise all the portions or legacies at once, and probably would not have done so against the wish of the claims of the Reynolds family.

But I agree with Romer, L.J., that it rests upon the appellants, who assert that that which was originally a pari passu charge has been postponed, to establish the proposition, and that there is no presumption in their favour. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that there is nothing either in the orders of the court or in the form of the mortgage settled by the court which justifies us in giving the appellants any better or larger security than they have obtained under the judgment of Kekewich, J. Nightingale or his advisers had all the documents before them, and it is not for us to consider how far their true operation and effect may have been misapprehended.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Pasco Daphne; J. M. Yetts; Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Feb. 6, 16, 18, 1903.

DEVONPORT CORPORATION v. TOZER. (a.)

Local government—Bye-laws—Infringement—Erection of houses abutting on public highway—Laying out new street—Urban authority—Statutory remedy—Attorney-General, Absence of—Jurisdiction.

The defendants were the owners of a triangular piece of land within the plaintiffs' borough. Two sides of the triangle abutted upon public highways within the borough. The defendants, in pursuance of a building scheme, erected houses on their land fronting the highways. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants were laying out the highways as new streets which did not comply with the requirements of the borough bye-laws as to width, and they claimed, first, an injunction, and, secondly, a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to remove or pull down any work begun or done by the defendants in contravention of the bye-laws. The bye-laws, which were framed under the Public Health Act, 1875, prescribed a penalty for infringement, to be recovered by summary proceedings, and provided that the plaintiffs might, subject to any statutory provision in that behalf, remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of the bye-laws.

Held, (1) that the plaintiffs could not maintain an action in the absence of the Attorney-General; (2) that the facts did not justify the inference that the defendants were laying out a "new street" within the meaning of the bye-laws.

Decision of Joyce, J. ([1902] 2 Ch. 182, 50 W. R. Dig. 97), affirmed.

Attorney-General v. Ashborne Recreation Ground Co., 51 W. R. 125, [1903] 1 Ch. 101, approved.

Appeal from the decision of Joyce, J. (reported [1902] 2 Ch. 182, 50 W. R. Dig. 97).

The facts were as follows: The defendants were the owners of a triangular piece of land, containing about three acres, one side of which abutted upon a public highway known as Ham-lane, and another side of which abutted on a public highway known as Tavistock-road. The roadway of Ham-lane was within the borough of Devonport, but the defendants' land, together with the portion of Tavistock-road upon which it abutted, was, down to November, 1900, within the rural district of Plympton St. Mary.

Within this rural district were certain bye-laws, with respect to new streets, framed under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875. They provided, inter alia, as follows: "With respect to the width and construction of new streets.—Every person who shall lay out a street which shall be intended for use as a carriage-road shall so lay out such street that the width thereof shall be 36 feet at the least." "Every person who shall construct a new street which shall exceed 100 feet in length shall construct such street for use as a carriage-road, and shall, as regards such street, comply with the requirements of every bye-law relating to a new street intended for use as a carriage-road." Bye-law 90 provided that every person who should intend to lay out a street should give to the sanitary authority certain notices and deliver plans and sections of such intended street; and bye-law 97 provided that "every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing bye-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of £5, and, in the case of a continuing offence, to a further penalty of 40s. for each day after written notice of the offence from the sanitary authority. Provided nevertheless that the justices or court before whom any complaint may be made or any proceedings may be taken in respect of any such offence may, if they think fit, adjudge the payment as a penalty of any sum less than the full amount of the penalty imposed by this bye-law." Bye-law 98 was as follows: "If any work to which any of the bye-laws relating to new streets and buildings may apply, be begun or done in contravention of any such bye-law, the person by whom such work shall be so begun or done, by a notice in writing, which shall be signed by the clerk of the sanitary authority, and shall be duly served upon or delivered to such person, shall be required, on or before such day as shall be specified in such notice, by a statement in writing under his hand or under the hand of an agent duly authorized in that behalf and addressed to and duly served upon the sanitary authority, to show sufficient cause why such work shall not be removed, altered, or pulled down; or shall be required on such day and at such time and place as shall be specified in such notice to attend personally or by agent duly authorized in that behalf before the sanitary authority and show sufficient cause why such work shall not be removed, altered, or pulled down. If such person shall fail to shew sufficient cause why such work shall not be removed, altered, or pulled down, the sanitary authority shall be empowered, subject to any statutory provisions in that behalf, to remove, alter, or pull down such work."

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By Part V. of the Devonport Corporation Act, 1900, it was enacted that as from the 9th of November, 1900, the boundaries of the borough and parish of Devonport should be extended so as to comprise the triangular piece of land in question. It was also enacted by section 43 of that Act in conjunction with Art. xii. of the Devonport Extension Order, 1898, which order was confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 10) Act, 1898, that all bye-laws in force in the existing borough should thenceforth apply to the borough so extended, and that all bye-laws made by the council of the said rural district should as from the 9th of November, 1900, cease to have any effect in any part of the added area, but without prejudice to anything duly done thereunder, and provided that any porceedings which might have been taken against any person for any offence against the said bye-laws before the 9th of November, 1900, might be taken by the plaintiffs as if those bye-laws had remained in force.

The bye-laws of the Borough of Devonport were, so far as material to this case, virtually the same as the bye-laws of Plympton St. Mary.

The defendants, whose land was at a considerable distance from any town, had some time before the commencement of the Devonport Corporation Act, 1900, began to build on their land. Proper plans were deposited with the rural authority and proper notices given as required by the bye-laws. The rural authority had neither approved nor disapproved of the plans, nor had they instituted any proceedings for penalties under the bye-laws. On the commencement of the said Act the rights of the rural authority to take proceedings in the matter, if any, were transferred to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs had not taken any proceedings before the justices, but instituted this action, in which they claimed an injunction and other relief, without joining the Attorney-General as plaintiff.

Joyce, J., held, (1) that the defendants were not laying out or intending to lay out the highways as new streets within the meaning of the bye-laws; (2) that the bye-laws could not be enforced by action for an injunction, but only by the special remedies thereby provided, or by way of information by the Attorney-General; (3) that no such declaration as asked for ought to be made.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the appellants.—There is abundant evidence of an intention on the part of the defendants to turn an old highway into a new street. If a person begins to build with an intention of going on with his buildings, the moment he begins to build he lays out a new street: Robinson v. Barton-Eccles Local Board, 32 W. R. 249, (1883) 8 App. Cas. 798; Williams v. Powning, (1883) 48 L. T. 672, 31 W. R. Dig. 113; Gozzett v. Maldon Urban Sanitary Authority, [1894] 1 Q. B. 327; and St. George's Local Board v. Ballard, 43 W. R. 409, [1895] 1 Q. B. 702. If a man intends to lay out a new street, he must provide for its width as required by the bye-laws. [They also cited on this point Attorney-General v. Rufford & Co., 47 W. R. 405, [1899] 1 Ch. 537.] Further, the appellants are entitled to proceed by an action for an injunction. By sections 157, 158, and 183 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the local urban authority is given authority with regard to new streets. It has power to pull down what it disapproves. It may, if it so chooses, make bye-laws imposing penalties. There is a duty cast on an urban authority to enforce its bye-laws, and the power to bring an action for an injunction is an implication from this duty.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Ashborne Recreation Ground Co., ante, p. 125, [1903] 1 Ch. 101; Tottenham Urban Council v. Williamson & Sons, 44 W. R. 676, [1896] 2 Q. B. 353; Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey, 35 W. R. 694, (1887) 36 Ch. D. 593; Attorney-General v. Logan, [1891] 2 Q. B. 100, 39 W. R. Dig. 115; Hendon Local Board v. Pounce, 38 W. R. 377, (1889) 42 Ch. D. 602; Bromley Local Board v. Lloyd, (1892) 66 L. T. 462, 40 W. R. Dig. 134; Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton Urban Council, 46 W. R. 644, [1898] 2 Ch. 331; Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, [1894] A. C. 347; and Barraclough v. Brown, [1897] A. C. 615, 45 W. R. Dig. 152.

Danckwerts, K.C., and A. Glen, for the respondents.—The defendants have not constructed or laid out a new street. They could not construct either of these roads without committing a trespass upon the highway: Harrison v. Duke of Rutland, 41 W. R. 322, [1893] 1 Q. B. 142. They have not infringed the bye-laws: Gozzett v. Maldon Urban Sanitary Authority; Williams v. Powning; Reg. v. Fulford, (1864) 33 L. J. M. C. 122. The defendants have committed no offence under the bye-laws. But even if they have, the plaintiffs cannot enforce them by such an action as this without the intervention of the Attorney-General. The plaintiffs have no proprietary right of any sort. They can only enforce their bye-laws in the proper statutory manner: Barraclough v. Brown; Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton Urban Council; Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council, [1898] A. C. 387, 46 W. R. Dig. 106. Disobedience to bye-laws is a criminal matter: Mellor v. Dewham, (1880) 5 Q. B. D. 467, 28 W. R. Dig. 163; Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey; Tottenham Urban Council v. Williamson & Sons. [They were stopped by the court.]

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J., who decided two questions: First of all, he held that the particular bye-laws in this case did not apply under the circumstances; but, secondly, he held that this was an action which could not be maintained by the local authority otherwise than in the name of the Attorney-General; that the Attorney-General was not a party to the cause, and that that in itself was a complete answer. If the learned judge is right in holding that this was not an action that could be maintained by the local authority without the Attorney-General, this appeal must fail.

These proceedings are not taken for the penalty imposed by the bye-laws, they are taken on the general right of a public body who are trying to put in suit a claim for the breach of a statute. Buckley, J., in a very elaborate judgment in the case of the Attorney-General v. Ashborne Recreation Ground Co., has covered the whole of the law, as it seems to me, upon this point. I do not think I could usefully add anything to the reasons there given—namely, that when there is a public wrong, and when the local authority, who have certain special rights to sue in their own name for certain special remedies, but have not done so, and are trying to put in suit a public wrong, they must do it in the recognized way—namely, at the suit of the Attorney-General. In this case the plaintiffs have attempted to do it without the intervention of the Attorney-General, and that is really enough to dispose of this case.

With regard to the other part of the case, I do not think it necessary to say more than that I see no reason for differing from Joyce, J. The question is purely one of fact—namely, whether we are bound to draw an inference from the acts done by these particular owners, the defendants, who are building on the land in question, that they are making or laying out a new street. It seems to me that the learned judge was perfectly justified in drawing the inference that he did draw—namely, that the facts are not sufficient in a matter of this kind, involving such large consequences, to enable the court to arrive at the conclusive inference of fact that these defendants are laying out a new street. We find a plan which, if carried out, will undoubtedly involve the construction of a large number of houses in a row; we find that three houses are practically finished, but not finished in the sense of being ready for occupation, nor is there as yet any occupier, and we find that those houses are separated from the existing highway by a strip of land which belongs to the building owners, which is fenced off from the highway, and through which there is no aperture for persons to pass out from the houses, except through such gaps in the fence as were made for introducing building materials for the purpose of carrying out the building scheme. Under those circumstance it seems to me it is quite impossible to say that the strip in front of these houses has, in any sense, become a street. It may hereafter, for all I know, become a street, or part of a street, but we are asked at the present moment to say the defendants are engaged in forming a new street. The learned judge has come to the conclusion that they are not, and it seems to me that the difficulties of holding that they are are greater than the difficulties of drawing the inference that they are not.

For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is to be borne in mind that the plaintiffs here have no proprietary rights which are being interfered with by what is being done by the defendants. The plaintiffs, no doubt, have powers conferred on them to make bye-laws, but that alone gives them no special rights over other bodies, or other members of the public, as to initiating proceedings to enforce those bye-laws. Such powers as the plaintiffs (the public body) have to enforce bye-laws must be conferred upon them by special powers given to them by statute, and, in fact, you do find special powers here given; and, except in so far as special powers are given, they have no inherent right to take proceedings. And I think it is rather to be deprecated that public bodies such as the plaintiffs in this case should be at liberty, without the leave of the Attorney-General, to commence expensive proceedings such as these at their own will. The fact that you do find a special power given to a public body such as the plaintiffs to initiate proceedings at law, or in equity, in certain special cases is an additional proof that the Legislature never contemplated that, apart from special legislative permission they should have a right to take any proceedings they might think fit for the purpose of enforcing the bye-laws apart from the special power conferred upon them by statute.

With regard to the other point, I think Joyce, J., also came to a right conclusion. It appears to me, especially with respect to the bye-law as to laying out a new street, that if you look at that bye-law, coupled with the other bye-laws which refer to laying out a new street, it is clear that the bye-law in question is dealing with something in the nature of a physical laying-out, and not what I may call a metaphorical laying-out. These bye-laws relate to something to be done, or contemplated to be done, on the land in question which is to be the street. It is to be borne in mind that these bye-laws have to be very carefully construed, because any infringement of them is in the nature of a criminal offence; and if the plaintiffs wish to assert that an offence has been committed or is threatened by the defendants, they must show clearly which bye-law it is which is said to have been or to be about to be infringed. The defendants are not, to my mind, within the meaning of the terms of the bye-laws relied upon by the plaintiffs, either laying out, or threatening at present to lay out, a new street at all. On that ground also I think the decision of Joyce, J., was perfectly right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. On the point on which alone we are really deciding this appeal I do not think I can with advantage add anything to the very careful judgment of Buckley, J., in the case of Attorney-General v. Ashborne Recreation Ground Co., but, if necessary, I think a very strong argument in support of his judgment is found in section 107 of the Public Health Act, 1875. On the other point, upon which we are really not deciding this appeal, speaking for myself, I see no reason whatever to differ from the conclusion at which Joyce, J., arrived.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Cunliffes & Davenport, for A. B. Pilling, Devonport; Surr, Gribble, & Oliver, for J. Walter Wilson, Plymouth.

High Court of Justice.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 6, 7, 1903.

ROBINSON BROTHERS (Appellants) v. DIXON (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue — Grogging spirit casks — Extracting spirit from wood of casks—Spirit exuding from the wood—Liability—Finance Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 10), s. 4, sub-section 1 (b).

By the Finance Act, 1898, section 4, sub-section 1, it is provided that "a person shall not (a) subject any cask to any process for the purpose of extracting any spirits absorbed in the wood thereof; or (b) have on his premises any cask which is being subjected to any such process, or any spirits extracted from the wood of any cask."

Held, the words "process for the purpose of extracting" do not include a natural exudation, and that, therefore, the section does not include, as an offence, the innocent possession of spirits which have exuded without any active or permissive process to lead to such exudation.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by justices for the county of Durham.

An information was laid by the respondent under section 4 of the Finance Act, 1898, against the appellants charging that they on the 27th of May, 1902, at Houghton-le-Spring, had on their premises certain spirits extracted from the wood of certain casks in contravention of the statute. Section 4 (1) of the above Act provides that "A person shall not (a) subject any cask to any process for the purpose of extracting any spirits absorbed in the wood thereof; or (b) have on his premises any cask which is being subjected to any such process or any spirits extracted from the wood of any cask."

At the hearing of the information the following facts were proved. An Inland Revenue supervisor on the 27th of May, 1902, visited the premises of the appellants, who carry on business at Houghton-le-Spring as brewers and wine and spirit merchants; he there found two casks bunged and standing under a tree in the yard where they had been placed to be screened from the sun, but where it was admitted the sun might reach them during some part of the day. One of the casks which had originally contained 101·6 gallons of rum of the strength of 32·2 degrees over proof then contained a little over an imperial quart of rum 27·2 degrees over proof; the other cask which had originally contained 107·8 gallons of whiskey 22·9 degrees over proof then contained a little less than an imperial quart of spirit of the strength 9·0 degrees over proof. An Inland Revenue analyst analyzed the said spirits and found them to contain a greater amount of tannin than is found in ordinary commercial spirits, and also compound ethers which came from substances absorbed in the wood casks, and he had no doubt that the said spirits had been extracted from the wood of the casks. The two casks found by the inspector, after being pumped out and turn upside down to drain for a few minutes, had been placed where found in the ordinary course of business, and were intended to remain there until an opportunity arose for returning the cask which had contained whisky to the distillery from which it had been received, and until a customer was found to purchase the cask which had contained rum. The former cask had been where found for about three weeks, the latter for about six weeks, and they had not been subjected by the appellants to any process for the purpose of abstracting spirit from the wood thereof.

After consideration of the whole of the evidence the justices found as facts that the casks were placed where found to await removal or disposal as aforesaid, and that neither the appellants nor their servants or agents had subjected the casks or either of them to any process for the purpose of extracting spirits from the wood thereof; but having regard to the evidence of the inspector that the spirits found in the casks, or some part thereof, had come from the wood of the said casks, and to the fact that the said spirits had been found by the inspector in the two casks on the premises of the appellants, they convicted the appellants of the offence charged against them in the information.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the words "extracted from the wood of any cask" were meant to cover the accumulation in the cask of spirit which had exuded from the wood of such cask after the same had been emptied in the usual course, without active or permissive process on the part of the appellants.

Bruce Williamson (Danckwerts, K.C., with him), for the appellants.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (H. Sutton and S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The first point is the construction of the section itself. Now, the offence created by this section is a criminal offence, and a serious offence, of course, having regard to the fine inflicted of £50. The section deals in the first place with subjecting any cask to any process for the purpose of extracting any spirits absorbed in the wood. Extracting in its natural meaning I understand to mean drawing out, and not a natural exudation or sweating; it is a process for the purpose of extracting. Then the section goes on to say: "If a person has on his premises any cask which is being subjected to any such process, or any spirits extracted from the wood of any cask." It is contended by the learned Attorney-General that that means exuding in fact, or having exuded in fact by atmospheric or climatic influences whether subjected to a process or not. I think that is not so, and I further think that that proposition is negatived by the use of the same or corresponding language in sub-section 3: "All spirits extracted in contravention" — that means extracted by something which the section forbids—"shall be deemed to be spirits unlawfully kept or deposited within the meaning of the Spirits Act, 1880, and every cask which is being subjected to any such process, or which being upon premises upon which spirits so extracted"—that means extracted in contravention of this section—"are found has been subjected to any such process, shall be forfeited." I therefore come to the conclusion that the section did not mean to include as an offence the innocent possession of spirits which had exuded without any active or permissive process to lead to the extraction of the spirits.

Now when the case was before us in the first instance the fact that the appellants had not used an active or permissive process was negatived, but it was suggested very properly by the learned Attorney-General that their servants might have known all about it, and accordingly the case went back, and the further case finds two things which I think are very important—first, that the casks were placed to await removal or disposal; secondly, "That neither the appellants nor their servants or agents had subjected the said casks or either of them to any process for the purpose of extracting spirits from the wood thereof." I understand that to negative the suggestion with regard to the servants, and to put the servants in the same position as the appellants.

I only wish to add one further observation upon the facts as stated, which, I think, make the meaning clear. Everything in the case, I think, negatives any knowledge or process intentionally applied, or applied with knowledge to make the stuff exude, or to extract it. The casks are placed in a place screened from the sun, although it was admitted that sometimes the sun would reach them. They were there, one for the purpose of being delivered to the distillery, and the other for the purpose of being sold, and the spirits are not found to have been taken out of the casks. The case would be a very different case if the result had been that the spirit had been taken out and used, and I think there is a great deal in the argument used by counsel for the appellants, that if some limit is not to be put on the meaning of the word "extracted," a person who is in possession of a cask innocently, upon which the sun plays, which causes the stuff to exude from the wood, would be liable to a penalty under the section. I am of opinion that, adopting the construction which I put upon the word "extracted," which means not exuding, but extracting the spirit by some process, either a natural process or an artificial process, there was no offence committed here, and I think any inference of guilt from the fact that the spirits had come out of the wood and were in the cask is negatived by the finding of the magistrates both in the original case and in the present case. I think, therefore, this appeal should be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The case is not at all free from difficulty, and many suggestions may be made to show that either on the one hand or the other inconveniences or an injustice may follow upon whatever decision is given. The decision which we give here may possibly leave it open to people to put these things where they know the spirit will be extracted from the casks without it being possible to convict them of any offence under this section. On the other hand very great inconvenience, as has been pointed out by Mr. Williamson, would arise if a contrary meaning were given to the word "extract," and it would undoubtedly subject the carrier or a railway company to prosecutions, if these casks should remain in the warehouse of the carrier or on the premises of the railway company for a sufficient length of time for exudation to take place. Therefore it is not a case in which one can judge much what the construction should be with reference to the consequences of it. It seems to me the consequences are not unfairly balanced on the one side or the other, and, if that is so, there is no other ground than that the natural meaning of the language is the best guide, and the first guide that ought to be resorted to. Now "extract" in all ordinary understanding, I think, means something more than exude, and I think if it should be felt that there is any serious inconvenience to the Revenue in the construction which we are putting upon this section, the proper remedy is for the Government to go to Parliament and to get the word "exude," or some word of that kind, put into the Act, so that there may be no doubt about it. But I think it would be straining an enactment, which is a criminal enactment after all, to say that such a word as "extract" really covers that which is merely exudation, therefore I come to the same conclusion as my lord.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I confess, for myself, I think the words are quite clear. I do not think there is any difficulty about them. There is a little difficulty in this particular case in saying whether or not the facts bring the appellants within the statute, because I think there is no doubt that if somebody in the employment, for instance, of the appellants, without any knowledge on the part of the appellants at all, had put these casks in a place where they could get a little sun upon them instead of being entirely in the shade, knowing that the effect of that would bring out some of the spirits, that then the spirits would have been extracted and it would not signify under the words of this section whether they would have been extracted by the appellants — they would be extracted and not merely exuded, and consequently the appellants would be liable to be convicted. That is the point which we sent the case back upon. I do not know whether the magistrates heard any further evidence, or whether they have sent it back to us upon the former evidence; possibly they had not their attention directed very fully to this point, and they were unable to decide the object of the particular individual or person, or whoever it was on the premises who actually put the casks there; consequently they came to the conclusion that it was not done intentionally by anybody. That being so, it seems to me the statute does not apply. I should think our decision that it is not necessary that the persons in whose possession it was should themselves have been parties to the extraction would be enough to satisfy the purposes of the Crown in all ordinary cases, and that most likely when they are prosecuting in another case, and point out to the tribunal that a man who knows anything about these things must know the effect of putting a cask in the sun, they will be able to prove in point of fact that it was extracted, although they have not proved it in this.

Appeal allowed; conviction quashed.

Solicitors for appellants, Cunliffes & Davenport, for J. G. Wilson, Ornsby, & Cadle, Durham.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — May 20, 1903.

REX v. HIGH BAILIFF OF WESTMINSTER.
Ex parte LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts — Compensation — Sealed offer — Allegation that premises to be acquired were unsanitary —Jury discharged after giving verdict as to unsanitary condition of premises, but before they found as to the value of the premises—Right of claimant after verdict to accept "sum previously offered"—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 38, 51—London County Council (Improvement) Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. cclxvi.), s. 20.

A "sealed offer" for the purchase price of land to be acquired, made under section 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, is a continuing offer, which may be accepted at any time before the verdict of the jury assessing the amount of compensation has been given.

Cause shown against a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus commanding the high bailiff at Westminster to summon a special jury to settle the amount of money to be paid to the claimants in respect of their estate or interest in certain premises by reason of the taking of such premises by the London County Council under 62 & 63 Vict. c. cclxvi., an Act to empower the London County Council to make a new street from Holborn to the Strand and other street improvements.

On the 4th of March, 1902, the London County Council gave notice to the claimants, Elizabeth S. Burgis and Jane Croft, for the purchase of their estate and interest in 19, Vere-street, St. Clement Dane's, and they alleged that the premises were in an insanitary condition.

The claimants on the 27th of March, 1902, served on the council a notice of claim. The council on the 5th of November, 1902, delivered to the claimants an offer of £1,600 under seal, which was declined on the 18th of November.

The council, on the 22nd of November, 1902, issued their warrant to the high bailiff requiring him to summon a special jury to determine whether the premises were insanitary or not and what compensation should be paid by the council to the claimants.

On the 12th of December, 1902, the case was heard before the deputy high bailiff and a special jury. The question whether the premises were insanitary was first tried, and after hearing evidence on behalf of both sides the jury found that the property was insanitary. The claimants then stated they would accept the sealed offer, and withdrew the case from the jury and asked to have the jury discharged. The council objected, on the grounds that the case was in the hands of the jury and that the amount of compensation to be paid must be determined by them, and, further, that the claimants had by letter on the 18th of November, 1902, refused the sealed offer.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The deputy bailiff held that the claimants were then entitled to accept the offer made, and he discharged the jury without their giving a verdict as to the amount of compensation. No verdict or judgment was recorded.

The London County Council thereupon obtained the present rule.

Danckwerts, K.C. (R. C. Glen with him), for the claimants, showed cause against the rule.—It is open to the claimants to accept the offer at any time up to verdict. This has been the practice, and section 51 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, shows that such an offer under seal is a standing offer until the verdict of the jury has been given, because it is treated for the purposes of costs as a payment into court: Reg. v. Manley Smith, 32 W. R. 275, 12 Q. B. D. 481.

Dickens, K.C. (Corrie Grant with him), for the council, in support of the rule.—By the London County Council (Improvement) Act, 1899, s. 3, the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, is substantially incorporated, and by section 20 the council may claim in their notice to treat that the property to which the notice refers is unfit for human habitation or is insanitary. In that case "the court or person settling the same shall determine whether such lands fall wholly or in part within the above descriptions, and if they so decide, then, in assessing compensation payable" certain evidence is to be received. If the court or person be satisfied by such evidence, then the the purchase-money and compensation is to be determined and assessed according to the principles indicated in section 21 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. There is nothing which sets aside the provisions in section 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, that the offer must be accepted within ten days. The whole object of the legislation was to give the claimants an opportunity to accept an offer to save themselves from the expense of litigation. If the offer could be accepted up to verdict, the object of the provision would be rendered nugatory, for the promoters would be put to all the expense of the trial. In In re Heywood and Metropolitan Railway Co., 12 W. R. 577, 4 B. & S. 787, it was held that, the jury having given the same sum as the amount of the amended offer, the claimant was not entitled to costs under section 51. There, however, the amended offer was made within ten days of the date when the final offer was made and refused, and is therefore not applicable here on the question of time.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is obvious that if the view taken by the London County Council is the right one, a very large number of cases have been decided upon the contrary view, and if the offer does not bind the purchasing authority, so that it could be withdrawn in order that they might have to pay less than the sum offered, it is remarkable that nothing of the kind has been referred to in any of the decisions. Now what are the facts? The offer was made under section 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, which enacts that before the promoters of the undertaking shall issue their warrant for a jury they shall give not less than ten days' notice to the other party, and in such notice they shall state what sum they are willing to give in compensation. We were pressed by Mr. Dickens to say that the offer must be accepted within ten days, because, he said, if it was not accepted, the promoters would incur costs in getting the case ready for trial; but the necessity of his argument forced him to overlook the position of the vendor, who was not intended to be put in a worse position than the promoters. The vendor had to incur the costs of trial and knew that if he went to trial and the jury found a verdict for less than the amount of the offer he would not only have to bear his own costs, but some portion of what might be called the joint costs. That is quite clear from section 51. [His lordship read the section, and continuing said:] That was part of the burden that the vendor took upon himself. The dictum of Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., in Reg. v. Smith to the effect that he agreed with the expression of opinion by Blackburn, J., in Fitzhardinge v. Gloucester and Berkeley Canal Co., L. R. 7 Q. B., at p. 785, appears to me to be a correct enunciation of the law applicable to this particular point, although, as Mr. Dickens contended, it was a mere expression of opinion which did not bind us. Therefore, in my opinion, under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the offer was intended to stand as an offer down to the time when the verdict of the jury was given. The claimant therefore was entitled to say that he would accept that offer at any time subject to this, that he could not be in a better position than if the jury had given a verdict to the amount of the offer. That being so, the only question left to be determined is whether section 20 of the Act of 1899 has made any difference. I see some difficulty as to the way that section was to be worked out. There was to be a first issue tried as to whether the property in question was unfit for human habitation or was insanitary, and then whether such lands in the opinion of the court or "such person" fell wholly or in part within that description. The Act of 1899 incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts, and in my opinion the only difference that section 20 of the Act of 1899 makes is that it sets up two standards of compensation. The promoters here gave notice with their notice to treat that they would submit that the premises were insanitary, therefore the promoters had brought about a state of things that would entitle the owner, if they succeeded in showing that the premises were insanitary, to receive compensation only at the lower scale. It is impossible to suggest that they had a greater right to withdraw an offer under section 20 of the Act of 1899 than they had under the Act of 1845. Mr. Dickens said that it would be a hardship if this view were adopted, because in these offers there was a considerable margin allowed. In my opinion that argument applies just as strongly to the Lands Clauses Act as to the Act of 1899. For the purposes of section 51 of the Act of 1845 there would have to be a margin allowed, and therefore a margin would have to be allowed under one Act or the other. For these reasons I think the decision of the deputy bailiff was right and the rule must be discharged.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Rule discharged

Solicitors, Lewis & Lewis; W. A. Blaxland.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — May 6, 1903.

CRANE v. ORMEROD. (a.)

County Court—Distress—Sale—Power of bailiff to give title to goods—County Courts Act, 1888, s. 156.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A piano, the property of A., was seized by the bailiff of the county court in execution of a judgment against B., and was sold at auction to C. A. had no notice of, and made no claim to the goods prior to, the sale.

Held, that A. was entitled to recover the piano from C., as the bailiff of the county court could only give to C. by a sale made without any claim on the part of A., a title to the goods of the judgment debtor.

Goodlock v. Cousens, 45 W. R. 367, [1897] 1 Q. B. 508, distinguished.

Appeal from His Honour Judge Coventry, sitting at the Chorley County Court.

The facts of the case are as follows:

The plaintiff had deposited with a man called Woodward a piano on the hire system. In August, 1902, an action was brought against Woodward and judgment recovered against him. The piano in question was taken in execution by the bailiff. It was advertised, and was ultimately sold to the defendant. In December, 1902, the plaintiff heard of the sale, and brought this action against the defendant to recover the piano.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the sale by the bailiff gave no title to the defendant.

The defendant appealed.

Compton Smith, for the defendant.—I admit that if this piano had been sold by the sheriff the plaintiff would have been entitled to succeed in this action, but the case is different in the county court. The case of Goodlock v. Cousins, 45 W. R. 367, [1897] 1 Q. B. 348 and (C. A.) 508, decides that in a case where the bailiff has sold under section 156 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the purchaser gets a good title, and the principle of that case applies here.

Rigby Swift, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The proposition put forward in this case was an alarming one. Section 147 of the County Courts Act, 1888, directs the bailiff to seize the goods and chattels of the judgment debtor, and then follow a number of sections dealing with the goods seized. By section 156 it is provided that where a claim is made to goods taken in execution the claimant shall deposit their value or give security for their value, otherwise the bailiff shall sell such goods. It was held in Goodlock v. Cousins that the purchaser under such circumstances acquired a good title as against the real owner, but that case was dealing with the rights of the purchaser who purchased under section 156 where a claim had been made and the goods sold, and is no authority for the proposition that the bailiff can give a good title where no claim has been made. I think that the judgment of the county court judge was right and this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. There is no reason why sale by the bailiff of the county court should give a title when a sale by the sheriff would give none. No doubt in cases under section 156, where the claimant to the goods is unable to give security, there may be a sale by the plaintiff of goods which do not belong to the judgment debtor. In Goodlock v. Cousins the court of first instance and the Court of Appeal laid down that the unqualified direction to sell contained in section 156 gave the purchaser a good title as against the true owner. But that decision has no application to a case where the owner to whom the goods belonged has never made any claim.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot find any words in any section which give the bailiff an authority to sell goods which do not belong to him, except those contained in section 156, where a claim has been made to the goods seized. In cases under that section the purchaser gets a good title and the proceeds of the sale are paid into court, and by section 157 the judge is adjudicator between the parties—that is to say, the claimant and execution creditor. But a purchaser, where no claim has been made, does not come within these sections.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for defendants, E. C. Rawlings & Butt, for J. H. Neville, Chorley.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Norris, Allens, & Chapman, for J. M. Quiggin & Co., Liverpool.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — April 24, 1903.

LISTER v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway Company—Common carrier—Liability—Inherent unfitness of thing carried.

A railway company contracted with the plaintiff to carry an engine from the plaintiff's premises to a station on their line. The engine was on wheels and fitted with shafts, but one of the shafts contained a latent flaw. The railway company had it carried by horses, that being the mode of carriage contemplated by both parties. While the engine was on the road the shaft which contained the flaw broke, the horses bolted, and the engine was upset and damaged.

Held, that the railway were not liable for the damage caused, as it arose from an inherent vice in the thing contracted to be carried.

Appeal from county court of Bradford.

The following are the facts of the case: The defendants were employed by the plaintiff to carry an engine from his yard to a neighbouring yard on their line. The defendants sent two men, two boys, and two horses for that purpose. The engine was on wheels with shafts to draw it. The horses were harnessed to the engine, which was drawn out of the yard, and whilst proceeding along the road one of the shafts broke, the horses took fright, and the engine was upset and sustained damage. The breaking of the shaft was due to an inherent defect and would not have been discovered by any ordinary examination.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the rule which exonerates a common carrier from liability to damage if it be caused by the inherent vice of the thing carried, is limited to cases in which the inherent vice itself directly causes the damage and without any contributory act done by the carrier, and he accordingly held that as the shaft could not have broken but for the strain put upon it by the defendants' own act, its defective condition afforded no excuse to the defendants.

The defendants appealed.

Scott Fox, K.C., and R. Watson, for the defendants.—The county court judge limited the rule unduly. The carrier is bound to carry the thing in the ordinary way, but is not liable if an accident occurs through an inherent defect in the thing carried. It was intended here that the engine should be taken through in the way in which the defendants did take it—by harnessing the horses to the shafts, and therefore the inherent defect was the sole cause of the loss.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They cited Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. D. 423; Kendal v. London and North-Western Railway, 7 Exch.

Lush, K.C., and Edge, for the plaintiff.—The immediate cause of the loss here was not the act of the consigner or due to any default on his part, but was due to the act of the carrier. The loss was therefore not due to the well-known exception as laid down in Story on Bailment, s. 492.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion the county court judge has put a limitation on the rule which is not justified by any authority. The engine was being conveyed as the common carrier would naturally have carried it, and therefore it cannot be said that there was an alternative and safer way of carriage. Of course, if a common carrier having a safe mode of conveyance chooses to carry it in another, a different rule would apply. Here, however, all parties intended it should be conveyed to the station on wheels, as it in fact was. The limitation on the rule put by the learned county court judge to cases in which the damage would equally have occurred if the thing had not been carried at all is inconsistent with the rule as laid down in Nugent v. Smith. When once you arrive at the conclusion that the thing is being carried in the ordinary way, and that the common carrier has taken every reasonable precaution, and the accident happens from the unfitness of the thing for that mode of carriage, the carrier is not responsible.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I also agree. I think the proposition may be stated thus: The inherent unfitness for the carriage contemplated, although not known to either party, is inherent vice within the meaning of the exception that has been established by the decided cases.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Gordon, Hunter, & Macmaster, Bradford.

Solicitors for the defendants, C. Moorhouse, Manchester.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) April 23, 1903.

STOCKDALE v. ASCHERBERG. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Agreement—Covenant by tenant to pay "outgoings in respect of the premises"—Reconstruction of drains by order of sanitary authority—Liability of tenant.

By an agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff agreed to let and the defendant agreed to take certain premises for three years at an annual rent, and the defendant agreed, inter alia, to pay all rates, taxes, assessments, and outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises as they became due, except landlord's property tax. During the tenancy created by the agreement the sanitary authority for the district served a notice, under the Public Health Act, 1875, upon the plaintiff requiring the abatement of a nuisance, and for that purpose the reconstruction of the drains of the house. This work the plaintiff had carried out, and now sought to recover the cost of such work from the defendant under his agreement to pay outgoings of every description in respect of the premises.

Held, that the works executed by the plaintiff, as required by the sanitary authority, were outgoings within the meaning of the agreement entered into by the defendant, and that he was liable to re-pay the plaintiff the cost of such work.

Decision of Farwell, J., in Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf Co., 1 L. G. R. 305, not followed.

This was an action tried by Wright, J., without a jury.

In this case the landlord claimed to recover from his tenant, under an agreement by the latter to pay all outgoings in respect of the premises, a sum of money paid by the landlord in carrying out certain works required by the sanitary authority.

By an agreement in writing entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant the plaintiff agreed to let and the defendant agreed to take a certain house known as 52, Brondesbury-villas, Kilburn, for a term of three years from the 25th of March, 1902, and then from year to year, subject to six months' notice to quit by either party, at the rental of £55 per annum, payable quarterly on the usual quarter days, free of all deductions except landlord's property tax.

The defendant also agreed to pay all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises as they became due, landlord's property tax only excepted as aforesaid.

The tenant further agreed to keep and leave the premises in good condition, reasonable wear and tear excepted, and to keep, inter alia, the water-closets, cisterns, internal pipes and taps clean and in good repair.

During the occupancy by the defendant under the above agreement, the Willesden Urban District Council, being the sanitary authority, served a notice under the Public Health Act, 1875, upon the plaintiff requiring her to abate a nuisance arising upon the premises, and for that purpose to reconstruct the drains of the house.

The plaintiff in compliance with such notice had the necessary work executed at the cost of £83 10s., which sum she now sought to recover from the defendant under his agreement to pay all outgoings in respect of the premises.

The defendant refused to pay on the ground that it was never contemplated at the time the agreement was entered into that he should incur a liability of such a nature.

Hohler, for the plaintiff.—The expense of these repairs is an "outgoing" within the meaning of the covenant: Aldridge v. Ferne, 34 W. R. 578, 17 Q. B. D. 212. Further, these expenses were incurred "in respect of the premises": Butt v. Rogers, 45 W. R. 334, [1897] 1 Q. B. 525, and Farlow v. Stevenson, 48 W. R. 213, [1900] 1 Ch. 128.

Edgar Foa, for the defendant.—The effect of recent decisions is to establish the doctrine that in construing the meaning of such a word as "outgoings" in a lease all the surrounding circumstances are to be taken into consideration. The most recent decision is that in Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf Co., 1 L. G. R. 305. Previous decisions are Wilkinson v. Collyer, 32 W. R. 614, 13 Q. B. D. 1; Arding v. Economic Printing Co., 79 L. T. 622; Batchelor v. Bigyar, 60 L. T. 416; Crosse v. Raw, 23 W. R. 6, L. R. 9 Ex. 209; Gardner v. Furness Railway, 47 J. P. 232; In re Bettingham, 9 Times L. R. 48; Antil v. Godwin, 15 Times L. R. 462; Weld v. Clayton-le-Moors Urban Council, 86 L. T. 584; and Hill v. Edward, 1 Times L. R. 253. In Foulger v. Arding, 50 W. R. 417, [1902] 1 K. B. 700, Collins, M.R., states the principle for measuring the liability of the tenant as being what might reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties as being within the purview of the contract. In the present case the shortness of the term, the amount of the rent as compared with the required outlay, and the restricted nature of the repairing covenant all point to the conclusion that it was never contemplated by the parties at the time of the contract that the tenant should possibly be liable to execute these permanent improvements. In all these sort of cases the length of the term, the amount of rent, the nature of the premises, and the nature and cost of the work required must all be taken into consideration.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hohler did not reply.

WRIGHT, J.—Notwithstanding the argument of counsel for the defendant I am of opinion that I am bound by the decisions in Farlow v. Stevenson and Brett v. Rogers except as to two points—namely, as to the effect of the words "as they become due" as applied to outgoings, and as to the bearing of the facts that the rent is small and the term short.

As to the first point I am of opinion that the construction sought to be put on the words "as they become due" by counsel for the defendant cannot be supported. I think they merely mean "as they become payable and have to be met," and that the words "for the time being" do not carry the matter any further.

As regards the second point, which is the more serious, there has no doubt been for some years a tendency to qualify the operation of these covenants according to the circumstances of each particular case, but I agree with what was said by Kay, J., in the case of Batchelor v. Biggar, 60 L. T., at p. 418—namely, that "it is extremely difficult to say that a covenant, the words of which would, in the case of a term of twenty-one years, include a payment by the tenant, must be construed not to include it because the term is only for three years. I quite agree in thinking the length of the term is a thing which ought to be taken into consideration; but it would be rather a violent construction to say that in the one case it is included and not in the other." This doctrine has been carried further in the recent case of Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf Co., 1 L. G. R. 305. Farwell, J., there says at p. 309, "So far, therefore, as regards the paving of the back yard, I do not think it can be held to have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties to a tenancy from year to year, at £20 a year, that the tenant should pay for the paving of the yard. . . . Accordingly, on the view I take of the matter, I am of opinion that the paving of the back yard by the tenant was not within the reasonable contemplation of the parties, nor was the laying down of new drains by the tenant within their reasonable contemplation, for it cannot be reasonable that the tenant under this agreement should be at the expense of new drains." I do not think, however, that that case can be held to govern the present, as it does not lay down any grounds on which, on the facts of the present case, I can decide in favour of the defendant, though the principle is to be applied where it is applicable.

That principle is to be found in the case of Foulger v. Arding, [1902] 1 K. B. 760, where Collins, M.R., at p. 706, says: "If the matter were unincumbered by authority and could be looked at with clear eyes, regardless of the labyrinth of cases on the subject, I think that no one could doubt that an obligation such as that in the present case, imposed upon a landlord in respect of a structural defeat, which he was bound by statute to remedy or to pay the cost of remedying, might properly be described as an imposition charged or imposed upon the landlord in respect of the premises. It seems to me that, if the matter were clear of authority, the obligation imposed on the plaintiff in this case would come within the plain meaning of the words of the covenant. The only possible answer appears to me to be that which was indicated by an observation of my brother Romer during the argument. It may be asked, if so wide a meaning is to be given to the word 'imposition,' where is the line to be drawn? If it is to be construed as capable of covering this case, must it not be equally capable of covering such a case as one in which demised premises were built beyond the building line of a street, and there was a consequent obligation on the landlord to pull down part of the premises and rebuild in conformity with the building line? It is said that it could not possibly be contended that such an obligation was within the meaning of the term 'imposition' as used in a covenant of this kind. This argument may, as it seems to me, be met by pointing out that underlying the whole matter is the consideration that we are dealing with a contract of demise between landlord and tenant, and the covenant must be assumed to relate only to matters which may reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties as being within the purview of such a contract; and such an extreme case as that of an obligation to pull down and rebuild the premises is so far outside of anything that can possibly be conceived of as being within the contemplation of the parties that it is necessarily excluded from the meaning of the words which might otherwise have been wide enough to include it."

In my opinion the case of Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf does not govern this case, nor does the principle laid down in Foulger v. Arding apply to it. The possibility of owners or occupiers being called upon to reconstruct the drains of their premises cannot be said to be so far outside of anything that can be conceived of as being within the contemplation of the parties as to come within that principle. The natural meaning of the words used must be taken to have been intended by the parties, unless such construction would lead to an outrage on common sense, in which case the principle laid down by Collins, M.R., in Foulger v. Arding might apply; but if the parties when using the expression "outgoings" might have contemplated such outgoings as including the expenses of the reconstruction of drains, then that expression ought not to be construed in any different sense when it occurs in a lease of three years from the sense in which it is construed when it occurs in a lease of twenty-one years. In my opinion a possible liability in respect of drainage repairs may well have been within the contemplation of the parties when the agreement was signed, and there must therefore be judgment for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Henry Fielding, Canterbury.

Solicitors for the defendant, Potter & Heath.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) April 6, 1903.

COMMISSIONER OF POLICE FOR THE METROPOLIS v. DONOVAN. (a.)

Justices—Habitual drunkard—Proof of previous conviction—Register of convictions in court of summary jurisdiction—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 22—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 14—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 18—Jurisdiction —Consent of accused to being dealt with summarily—Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 60), s. 2, sub-section 1—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 6 (1).

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent was convicted at Bow-street police-court of one of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to the Inebriates Act, 1898, and the appellant requested the magistrate to make an order under section 6 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1902. The appellant tendered in evidence the register which was kept at the police-court, and called the gaoler for the purpose of proving that the respondent had been convicted of offences mentioned in the first schedule to the Inebriates Act, 1902, on three occasions within the preceding twelve months at that court.

Held, that the register of the minutes or memorandum of convictions of a court of summary jurisdiction, kept under section 22 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, by the clerk of the court, was sufficient evidence to enable the magistrate to be satisfied of the three previous convictions mentioned in the register.

Held, further, that the consent of the respondent to be tried summarily under section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, was necessary before the magistrate could make an order under section 6 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1902.

Case stated by Sir A. de Rutzen, chief magistrate of the police-courts of the Metropolis, raising two questions of law on the construction of section 6 of the Licensing Act, 1902, and section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898.

The Licensing Act, 1902, by section 6 (1) provides "that where upon the conviction of an offender, the court is satisfied that an order of detention could be made under section 1 or section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, then, whether an order of detention is made or not, the court shall order that notice of the conviction, with such particulars as may be prescribed by a Secretary of State, be sent to the police authority (within the meaning of the Police Act, 1890) for the police area in which the court is situated."

By section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 60), it is provided as follows:

"(1) Any person who commits any of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to this Act, and who within twelve months preceding the date of the commission of the offence has been convicted summarily at least three times of any offences so mentioned, and is a habitual drunkard, shall be liable upon conviction on indictment, or if he consents to be dealt with summarily on summary conviction, to be detained for a term not exceeding three years in any certified inebriate reformatory the managers of which are willing to receive him. (2) The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), shall apply to proceedings under this section as if the offences charged were specified in the second column of the first schedule to the said Act."

On the 7th of January, 1903, the respondent, Catherine Donovan, was charged by the Commissioner of Police with being guilty while drunk of riotous and disorderly behaviour in a highway on the 6th of January, 1903, one of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to the Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 60). The said charge was proved, and Catherine Donovan was convicted, but the learned magistrate postponed passing sentence in respect thereof. On the 22nd of January, 1903, the respondent appeared before the learned magistrate remanded on the said charge. The appellant thereupon requested the magistrate to make an order under section 6 (a) of the Licensing Act, 1902. The appellant tendered in evidence the register which is kept at Bow-street police-court for the purpose of proving that the respondent had been convicted of offences mentioned in the first schedule to the Inebriates Act, 1898, on three occasions within twelve months of the 3rd of January, it being proved that the respondent was the person referred to in the register.

It was contended by the appellant that the production of the register and the evidence of the assistant gaoler was sufficient evidence at common law, or under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 22, to enable a court of summary jurisdiction to be satisfied of the three convictions mentioned in such register, and of the fact that the respondent was an habitual drunkard within the meaning of section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, so that if the other requirements of the section were fulfilled an order of detention could be made under that section, and that therefore the learned magistrate could and ought to make an order under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1). It was also contended by the appellant that upon the language of the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1), formal and strict proof of the said convictions was unnecessary, and that the said register was admissible for the purpose of informing the mind of the court in exercising jurisdiction under the said section.

The appellant also contended that the consent of the respondent to be dealt with summarily by the magistrate was not necessary to the exercise of his jurisdiction under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1).

The magistrate was of opinion that before sending the notice of conviction to the police authority referred to in section 6 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1902, it was necessary that he should be satisfied of the following matters: (1) That the respondent was an habitual drunkard; (2) that the respondent within twelve months preceding the 6th of January, 1903, has been convicted at least three times or more of one of the offences mentioned in Schedule I. of the Inebriates Act, 1898.

Upon the material before him, and subject to the question of law hereinafter stated, he was in fact satisfied that these conditions had been fulfilled, and that an order of detention could be made under the Inebriates Act, 1898, s. 2 (1).

He was also of opinion that such convictions require to be formally proved and can only be proved (a) by production of the record of the conviction or an examined copy of it (see Hartley v. Hindmarsh, L. R. 1 C. P. 553), or (b) by a copy of the conviction signed as provided by section 18 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112).

He was further of the opinion that the respondent's consent to be dealt with summarily was a condition precedent to the exercise of his jurisdiction under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1), and therefore declined to make an order under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1), and postponed passing sentence upon the respondent pending the decision of this court on the question of law herein stated.

Danckwerts, K.C., and A. Gill, for the appellant.—Two questions are raised by this case—first, whether the previous convictions mentioned in section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, are to be proved strictly under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 6 (1), and, secondly, whether the magistrate can act summarily under section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, without the consent of the respondent. We submit that the previous convictions were sufficiently proved by reference to the court register, at any rate where offences are committed in the same jurisdiction: see Taylor on Evidence, p. 1571, and Starkie on Evidence (3rd ed.), vol. 1, 303. Rex. v. Hains, (1696)

Comb. 337, and R. v. Horne Tooke, (1794) St. Tr., vol. 25, 447, show that minutes of a previous conviction before the same tribunal are sufficient evidence of such conviction. That view is also supported by decisions given in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Yeovil, (1838) 8 A. & E. 806, Doe v. Mew, (1837) 7 A. & E. 240, and Reg. v. Newman, (1852) 2 Den. C. C. 390. There are also later authorities to the same effect. For instance, London School Board v. Harvey, 27 W. R. 786, 4 Q. B. D. 451, and Reg. v. Hutchins, 28 W. R. 595, 5 Q. B. D. 353. Those cases stand in just the same position with regard to proof as a criminal matter, and that was so held in Mellor v. Denham, 5 Q. B. D. 467, and the same rule was laid down in substance in Fisher v. Lane, (1772) 3 Wils. 297, and Dyson v. Wood, (1824) 3 B. & C. 449. The magistrate relied on Hartley v. Hindmarsh, 14 W. R. 862, L. R. 1 C. P. 553, but that case did not apply, because it could be distinguished on its facts from the present case. For the same reason Giles v. Siney, 13 W. R. 92, was not an authority against the appellant's contention. Therefore, the last two cases not applying, on the authority of the London School Board v. Harvey, which was a later decision than either, the magistrate was wrong in holding that he had no jurisdiction to make the order required without the consent of the respondent to be dealt with summarily.

H. Sutton (by leave), for the magistrate.—In Rex v. Smith, (1828) 8 B. & C. 341, an indictment for conspiracy alleged "at the court of quarter sessions . . . an indictment against A. B. was preferred and found by the grand jury that this allegation must be proved by a caption, regularly drawn up, of record, and that the minute book kept by the deputy clerk of the peace could not be received as evidence of the finding of the bill, although no record had in fact been drawn up."

He cited on the first point also rule 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, section 116 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and section 18 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. He also referred to Paley on Summary Convictions (7th ed.), p. 439.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Both points raised in this case are points of importance, though I am not sure that our decision upon the first point in favour of Mr. Danckwerts has any far-reaching effect, because my present opinion is that the use of the register to which I am about to refer must be confined to the same court. The point is whether the Bow-street magistrate, in dealing with a case under section 6 of the Licensing Act, is allowed to refer for the purpose of that section to, and to act upon, the minute and memorandum which is directed to be kept under section 14 of the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. Perhaps it may be put in another way, that he is also entitled to act upon the register of the minute or memorandum which has to be kept under section 22 of the 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49. Now it seems to me, to a large extent for the reasons urged by Mr. Danckwerts, that the magistrate, at any rate in the court in which he is sitting and with reference to the minute and memorandum kept in that court, and the register thereof, is entitled to act on the information contained therein. Section 14 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 provides that: "If he or they"—speaking of the justices—"convict or make an order against the defendant, a minute or memorandum thereof shall then be made, for which no fee shall be paid, and the conviction or order shall afterwards be drawn up by the said justice or justices in proper form, under his or their hand and seal or hands and seals, and he or they shall cause the same to be lodged with the clerk of the peace, to be by him filed." Now I have no doubt, for the reasons which Mr. Danckwerts mentioned, and possibly for other reasons, it was considered desirable that these convictions should go to quarter sessions and be filed there, and be on record for all future purposes and for Crown purposes; but I think that a minute or memorandum directed to be drawn up then and there, and apparently to be used by the party, because no fee is to be paid, is meant to be for that court in the nature of a formal record or minute of proceedings of what goes on in that court. The fact is that by section 22 of the 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, it is stated: "A register of the minutes or memorandums of all the convictions . . . shall be primâ facie evidence of the matters entered therein for the purpose of informing a court . . . acting for the same county borough or place as the court whose convictions, orders and proceedings are entered in the register." That is to say, there is a direct enactment that they shall be primâ facie evidence for the purpose of informing those courts, and this enactment would certainly tend in the direction that they are to have more effect than a mere record at the time which could not be used afterwards. I agree that there is a great deal in other statutes to which Mr. Danckwerts and Mr. Sutton have called attention. As, for instance, section 18 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), which shows that for the purpose of proving both a conviction on indictment and conviction on summary conviction where they have to be proved in other courts and for other purposes, more may be required to be done than to produce the register kept under the one Act and the minute or memorandum kept under the other. Then, as regards the information, it may be supplemented or added to by the rules made under the statute from time to time. It is to be said this register does contain the name of the complainant, the name and age of the defendant, the nature of the offence, the punishment, or, in other words, the date of the conviction. So that for the purpose which the magistrate has to consider it does contain the same information as would be supplied by the certified copy of the conviction or the minute or record which is mentioned in section 18 of the Act of 1871. Speaking for myself, I think the case of London School Board v. Harvey is an authority in favour of this view. There there had been an order on a summons ordering the attendance of the child in September, 1877; the order not being obeyed the man was summoned for non-compliance on the 27th of March, and fined 3s. and 2s. costs, or in default five days. He was summoned again on the 15th of June for a second non-compliance with the order, and it was in the third proceedings, to use that expression, they attempted to prove the conviction of disobedience of the first order, and the fine, by a minute which, for all substantial purposes, applies to the minute in this case, and was kept under an earlier statute which had the same provision as section 14. It was there held by Cockburn, L.C.J., and Lopes, J., acting, as I think Mr. Danckwerts has satisfied me, on the common law authorities, that in that proceeding those minutes could be referred to for the purpose of proving a previous conviction. I can see no mischief that follows from this decision; on the contrary, I think there will be very substantial gain. Mr. Sutton has said that on conviction in all cases of this kind the practice has not been to draw up these convictions, and though some statutory duty may have been neglected, yet it seems a grave thing to say in such a case as this before the court itself, they must hold their hand unless a certified copy of the conviction is obtained and put in evidence. I therefore come to the conclusion upon the point on which our guidance is asked, that the magistrate sitting in his court would be entitled to act upon the memorandum and minute of the conviction to which I have referred.

Then as to the point as to whether this order can be made without the consent to be dealt with summarily of the person charged. It has been strenuously urged upon us that the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 6 of the Licensing Act, 1902, "Where upon the conviction of an offender the court is satisfied," includes a conviction for any offence whatever which he was being tried for. The statute might have said that, and if it did we should have to give effect to it; but when you come to look at the words of the section and the previous legislation, it seems to me that that is not the object of the section or the legislation intended to be carried out by the enactment. The Inebriates Act, 1898, s. 1, provided for certain offences: "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment or penal servitude, if the court is satisfied from the evidence that the offence was committed under the influence of drink or that drunkenness was a contributing cause of the offence, and the offender admits that he is or is found by the jury to be an habitual drunkard" certain consequences follow. The second section of the Act provides: "Any person who commits any of the offences mentioned in the first schedule of this Act, and who within the twelve months preceding the date of the offence has been convicted summarily at least three times of any offences so mentioned, and who is an habitual drunkard, shall be liable upon conviction on indictment or if he consent to be dealt with summarily on summary conviction, to be detained for a term not exceeding three years." Now what is the practical operation of that section? A person is being summoned by summary process for one of the offences of the drunkenness which are specified in the schedule. There are some twelve or thirteen of them, all dealing with people who in liquor under certain circumstances do certain acts. That person being about to be summarily tried, it comes out in the course of the proceedings that the evidence shows, or it is suggested to show, he was one of the persons contemplated by section 2, who, in addition to being guilty of the offence in Schedule I., falls within the description I have read. He need not consent to be tried. He can say he will not be tried summarily, and then he will have to be tried on indictment, and will come under the category of persons already dealt with by the section.

Now, that being so, remember a person is being tried on indictment for certain classes of offences, or summarily for one of the offences mentioned in the schedule, and it is to that state of things that section 6 of the Licensing Act, 1902, relates. It says: "Where upon the conviction of an offender the court is satisfied that an order for detention could be made under section 1 or section 2 of the Inebriates Act, 1898, then whether an order for detention is made or not . . . ," &c. Now, we are pressed to say, having regard to the object of the section, it means that, assuming the circumstances are such that, if the proceedings had been under the Act of 1898, an order could with the consent of the defendant have been made summarily, the magistrate may make the order referred to in section 6 of the Act of 1902, whether the defendant consents or not. In my opinion that is not the meaning of the section. In my opinion, on the face of the section, it points to the court that has the jurisdiction to make the order, and it says whether the court thinks fit to make the order or not it shall send certain particulars to the police authorities with a view to the consequences mentioned in sub-sections 2 and 3 of section 6. Therefore the object of section 6 is plain, and evidently it means to say that in addition to making the order either under section 1 or section 2 of the Act of 1898 whether the court makes the order or not, these particulars at any rate shall go to the police with the consequences which follow from it. I think to say that the section means that whatever the man is being tried for, if in the course of that trial, whether he has given his consent or not, it turns out there are circumstances which, if he was being tried for some other offence—namely, under Schedule I.—that in such a case the magistrate would have the duty of sending particulars to the police authority, is reading into the section words the Legislature had not in view when they enacted it. In my opinion the magistrate was right in saying, no consent being given, he ought not to put in force the provisions of the Act.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., gave judgments to the same effect.

Danckwerts, K.C.—Does your lordship mean the same court within the meaning of the Act of 1879?

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Yes.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Wontner & Son.

Solicitor for the magistrate, Solicitor to the Treasury.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). May 11, 1903.

GARDNER v. HODGSON'S KINGSTON BREWERY CO. (a.)

Easement—Right of way—Annual payment—Uninterrupted enjoyment for forty years—Evidence of user—Lost grant—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 82.

Parol evidence is admissible in answer to an allegation of enjoyment of a way as of right, and a payment of an ambiguous character must be shown by a claimant not to be inconsistent with the claim.

Where, therefore, a right of way has been enjoyed openly for over forty years, but a payment annually made to the owners of the servient tenement, though whether for a licence or for what purpose was not determined by the evidence, the inference will be made that the annual payment was for a yearly licence, and the Prescription Act will consequently not apply.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, 49 W. R. 421, [1981] 2 Ch. 198, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ., Rigby, L.J., dissenting) (49 W. R. 421, [1901] 2 Ch. 198), reversing a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (48 W. R. 469).

The action was brought for a declaration that the appellant was entitled to a right of way through a gateway at the back of certain freehold hereditaments.

The facts are given in some of their lordships' judgments.

Coumbe and M. H. Robertson, for the appellant.

Macnaghten, K.C., and Cave, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The appellant in this case claimed a right to pass through premises belonging to the respondents. The only proof given in support of the right claimed was the fact that for many years the appellant and those who preceded her in the ownership of the premises had crossed the respondents' yard along the same way to get to her own yard with carts and horses; the respondents' premises were occupied as a public-house, and the appellant could not get to her own yard with carts and horses from her own premises. No evidence was given as to any change in the premises, or any definite evidence when what I will call the yard opening of the Red Lion was first made use of as a convenient access to the appellant's premises. But what is conclusive to my mind against the appellant is that during the whole period during which this convenient access was used, a sum of 15s. a year was regularly paid in respect of the user of the way. One of the most common modes of preventing such a user growing into a right is to insist upon small periodical payment; and if such evidence as we have here were permitted to be evidence of a right not only to the user upon terms of payment, but of a right to make the payment and continue the user in perpetuity, it would be a very formidable innovation indeed. Those who drafted the Prescription Act knew well what they were about when, in dealing with the consequences which have to follow from long-continued user, they used the words "as of right." I cannot help thinking there has been a certain play upon words in commenting upon them. In a certain sense a man has a right to enjoy what he has paid for; and, therefore, if the appellant here at any time during the year when she had paid for the right to use this way had been hindered, she would have a right to complaim that what I will call her contract had been broken, and that during the year she had a right to use the way. I do not think that this would have established a right in the proper sense, because, being but a parol licence, it might be withdrawn, and her action would be for damages, but she would have no right to the way. And in no sense could the right be the right contemplated by the Act. That right means a right to exercise the right claimed against the will of the person over whose property it is sought to be exercised. It does not and cannot mean a user enjoyed from time to time at the will and pleasure of the owner of the property over which the user is sought. At any time after the first year the owner of the Red Lion might refuse to renew the permission to use this way. I think, therefore, that there is no evidence whatever of a user as of right. Although I do not think much importance should be attached to the appellant's view of her own rights, it is not immaterial to see what she thought she was paying 15s. a year for, and she thought it was paid for, what I think, it manifestly was paid for—namely, the annual permission to use this access to her yard. If this was a permission paid for, it was not the less a permission, and a permission to use a way cannot establish a right. There was no pretence for suggesting a joint reparation of the road by the parties, and I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—The facts in this case are meagre and inconclusive. They can be very shortly stated.

For some seventy or eighty years the plaintiff's house has been occupied for business purposes with a yard and stables at its back. The only access to the yard and stables has been through a gateway from the plaintiff's yard opening into the Red Lion yard, and across that yard into High-street. During this period, at all events, the right of way has been openly, regularly, and uninterruptedly enjoyed. For the greater part of that time—it may possibly be for the entire period—the sum of 15s. a year has been paid by the plaintiff and her predecessors to the owner or occupier of the Red Lion. The payment has been proved to have been actually made since 1855. The plaintiff asserts that the payment has been made for the repair of the yard through which the way passed, but the evidence on the subject is very slender, indeed Cozens-Hardy, J., says, "there is nothing to support the assertion." The defendants, on the other hand, allege that this payment has been made by way of rent in respect of the right of way.

On the 31st of March, 1898, the defendants served notice in writing upon the plaintiff, requiring her to give up the use of the yard of the Red Lion, and to close the gate. After some correspondence, on which the defendants placed no undue or unfair reliance, on the 16th of February, 1899, the defendants served notice to quit and discontinue the user of the yard "on the expiration of the year of your tenancy, which shall expire next after the end of one half-year from the service of this notice."

The plaintiff, on the 11th of August, 1899, instituted this action, claiming a declaration that she is entitled to the right of way I have referred to.

The case would be perfectly clear in favour of the plaintiff but for the payment of the 15s. a year, and to my mind the whole question in the case turns upon the meaning and significance of this payment. The plaintiff claims that she is entitled to succeed under the Prescription Act, or to have a lost grant presumed, and a great number of authorities have been discussed here and in the courts below to suggest to your lordships how the facts of the case should be regarded. But everything turns on the one fact, what is the annual payment of 15s. to be ascribed to? But for this payment the case of the plaintiff would be clear. It now stands distinctly in her way. The onus of getting rid of its obvious significance rests on her. The view of the evidence taken by Cozens-Hardy, J., does not, I think, weaken or displace the obligation which rested on the plaintiff.

In the absence of direct evidence, all that can be said is that the payment is consistent with inferences which have been drawn by both sides. The defendants insist that the most obvious and natural inference is that it was made for rent, or for a series of annual licences, given possibly by implication. The plaintiff, on the other hand, urges that it was more probably a perpetual payment attached to some original grant of the right of way. Rigby, L.J., has speculated with persuasive force on the probability of such a hypothesis. If I felt free to speculate on the possible and probable origin of this payment, I would be glad to draw the same inference. The onus of explanation is, however, I think, on the plaintiff. Her counsel were asked what liability they admitted to the continued payment of the 15s. a year, and they did not give any direct answer. I would be disposed to think that their main argument would require them to contend that their obligation to make this annual payment was as strong as the plaintiff's claim against the defendants to enjoy the right of way. The case must be taken as a whole—a long used right of way with a long continued payment, both most probably to be referred to the same origin. If this be so there must be reciprocity. If the plaintiff is entitled to get the declaration she asks for, would the defendants not be entitled with the same force to insist on the continuance of this annual payment of 15s.? I am of opinion, however, that defendants would not succeed if they relied on any such contention, and that no court would presume in their favour a lost grant establishing their right to this yearly sum. I agree with Romer, L.J., on this important point.

I do not say that the case is free from difficulty, but I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiff has discharged the onus which lay upon her of satisfactorily explaining that this payment of 15s. a year was consistent with her claim. I therefore think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—If it had not been for the difference of opinion in the courts below I should have thought this an extremely simple case.

The appellant, Miss Gardner, who was plaintiff in the action, is the owner of certain premises in High-street, Sutton, consisting of a shop and a yard at the back. The respondents are owners of adjoining premises, also facing High-street, and known as the Red Lion Inn.

For forty years and more the appellant and her predecessors in title have used the yard of the Red Lion as the way to their back premises for carts and horses; at present there is no means of access to these premises for carts and horses except through the Red Lion yard. But there is nothing to show what was the condition of things when the way across the yard was first used by the then owner of the appellant's premises.

For forty years and more the appellant and her predecessors in title using the way through the Red Lion yard have regularly, year by year, and every year paid the sum of 15s. to the respondents and their predecessors in title. The evidence as to this payment does not go back so far as the evidence as to the use of the way. But there is nothing to show or suggest that the way was ever used without payment.

Those are the only materials upon which your lordships' decision must be founded. There is no other fact proved or admitted throwing light upon the question. The connection between a certain pump in one corner of the Red Lion yard and the alleged right of way across the yard on which so much stress was laid in argument, is, I think, purely imaginary. Why a person who has an admitted right to take water from his neighbour's well should found upon that right a claim to cross his neighbour's yard with carts and horses for purposes unconnected with the well is beyond my comprehension. Nor is there, I think, the slightest evidence to show that the payment of 15s. a year was merely a contribution towards the cost of repairing the way. The suggestion was rejected by Cozens-Hardy, J., who saw and heard the witnesses.

On the bare facts with which your lordships have to deal, there arise, as it seems to me, two questions: (1) What was the sum of 15s. a year which was paid regularly year by year paid for? Well, I think any layman and most lawyers would answer, "For the use of the way, of course." Then comes the only other question—(2) Can a person who uses a way across his neighbour's land and pays for the use of it year by year be said to use the way "as of right"? Again, I think every layman and most lawyers would answer "Certainly not."

If the way in question has not been used "as of right" there is nothing to attract the provisions of the Prescription Act. The case of the appellant, so far as it is founded on that Act, must fail. It was for the plaintiff to make out her case. If she cannot show that the user of the way was "as of right," the essential condition of success is wanting.

The suggestion of a lost grant burdening the respondents' property with a servitude which would so greatly diminish its value, and charging the appellant's property with a rent-charge in perpetuity is, I think, out of the question. It seems to me a most unlikely hypothesis. But it is enough to say that, apparently, no trace of such an arrangement can be found in any of the deeds of either party, and that nothing is known of the circumstances which existed when the premises which now belonged to the appellant, and the premises which now belong to the respondents, if they ever formed one property, became separated. There is certainly no need to resort to the presumption of a lost grant when the facts of the case, so far as they are known, suggest a much simpler and a more natural explanation.

I think the fallacy in the judgments of the learned judges who were in favour of the appellant comes from the manner in which they have looked at the facts of the case. I do not think that you can legitimately separate the use of the way from the payment made in respect of the way. The use of the way explains the payment. The payment explains and qualifies the use. But the learned judges appear to sever two things which seem to me to be inseparable. They first take the way. They say, "Here is a way which has been used for forty years without interruption. That gives an indefeasible right under the Prescription Act." Then they look at the payment and they ask, how is that to be explained, and various hypotheses are suggested which seem to me mere guess-work. Cozens-Hardy, J., goes further. He would hold that an annual licence (for such he takes it to be), coupled with an annual payment, if the arrangement originated more than forty years ago and is continued for forty years, confers an indefeasible right, provided there is no break or change or new departure, but things are just left to go on as they did before. This view seems to give the go-by to the words, "claiming right thereto," and "as of right," which are certainly not the least important words in the Prescription Act.

I do not think that the cases which were cited at some length, most of which are reviewed in the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J., throw any light upon this case, which must depend on its own circumstances, and I may add with all deference that I think the Prescription Act has very little to do with it. I rather doubt whether the scope and effect of the Prescription Act have been always rightly apprehended. The Act was passed, as its preamble declares, for the purpose of getting rid of the inconvenience and injustice arising from the meaning which the law of England attached to the expressions "time immemorial," and "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." The law as it stood put an intolerable strain on the consciences of judges and jurymen. The Act was an Act "for shortening the time of prescription in certain cases." And really it did nothing more. A person who claims a right of way and invokes the protection of the Act must claim "as of right." But when the way in question has been used without interruption as defined in the Act, for forty years, "as of right," whether the claimant is really entitled as of right or not, the claim cannot be defeated except by showing that the right claimed was enjoyed "by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing." No parol consent will do. I fail to understand how that provision helps the appellant. The respondents do not set up a parol consent given before the period of forty years. They rely on the acknowledgment and recognition of their dominion over the property—their right to grant or withhold the grant of the way in question—involved in and evidenced by the annual payment accompanying the use of the way, and they point out that no other reasonable explanation of that payment is forthcoming.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord DAVEY.—I must confess that at the conclusion of the argument I was disposed to agree in the opinion of Cozens-Hardy, J., and Rigby, L.J., but further reflection has satisfied me that I ought not to do so, and I will shortly state why. The bare facts of the case are that for more than forty years, and it is said from the beginning of the last century, the appellant and her predecessors in title have enjoyed a way over the inn yard, now vested in the respondent, and for more than forty years have paid an annual sum of 15s. to the owners for the time being of the inn yard. Nothing is known as to the origin of the enjoyment of the way or of the annual payment, but both parties are agreed in connecting the latter in some way with the enjoyment of the way. The appellant says that it was a payment by way of composition for the expense of keeping the way in repair. There is a scintilla of evidence in favour of this allegation, but nothing which approaches proof of it. The respondent, on the other hand, says that it is paid as an annual acknowledgment for the permission to use the way.

The second section of the Prescription Act, so far as material, is in the following words:

"Where such way as last hereinbefore mentioned" (i.e., a way to be enjoyed over the land of another) "shall have been so enjoyed as aforesaid" (i.e., by a person claiming right thereto without interruption) "for the full period of forty years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing."

From the language of this section it is plain that a person cannot claim to have his enjoyment of an easement protected against defeat otherwise than by an agreement in writing unless he can first prove that his enjoyment has been that of a person claiming as of right. The case of Tickell v. Brown, 4 Ad. & Ell. 369, referred to in the courts below, is an important decision on the fifth section of the Act. It was there held that evidence of the payment of 1d. a year within the period of forty years by the occupiers of the land in respect of which the way was claimed was admissible for the purpose of showing that the enjoyment was not as of right, although the matter had not been specially pleaded as required by the fifth section. No such difficulty of pleading occurs in the present case. But if authority be wanting, Tickell v. Brown is an authority which shows that parol evidence is admissible in answer to an allegation of enjoyment as of right.

What, then, is the effect of the annual payment of 15s.? Rigby, L.J., thought that to treat it as an acknowledgment de anno in annum of the respondent's right to stop the way was an arbitrary assumption. Admitting that to be so, it is at least equally an arbitrary assumption to treat it (as Cozens-Hardy, J., did) as evidence of a parol agreement antecedent to the period of forty years to grant a perpetual licence in consideration of the annual payment or (which appears to me a more plausible hypothesis) as evidence of a prior grant of the right of way in consideration of an annual rent issuing out of the land to which the right of way is claimed as appurtenant. To put the case most favourably for the appellant, the payment is of an ambiguous character, and capable of either explanation. But one explanation is inconsistent with an enjoyment as of right, while the other is not so, and it is for the appellant to make out that she and her predecessors in title have enjoyed as of right, and for that purpose to show which is the true explanation of the annual payment, and this she has not done.

To quote the well-known formula, an enjoyment as of right must be nec vi, nec clam, nec precario. The appellant shows that the enjoyment has not been either vi or clam, but she fails to prove that it has not been precario.

I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed. The alternative claim by a lost grant is really the same thing in another form.

Lord ROBERTSON.—As the House will have heard five reasoned judgments in this case, I shall not say more than that I entirely concur, and have never had any doubt in the matter.

Lord LINDLEY.—In this case the following facts are admitted or proved and are not now open to controversy, viz.:

1. The plaintiff and her predecessors in title have for over eighty years sent their horses and carts to and from the yard at the back of their house across the yard of the defendants from and into the public road called High-street.

2. During all that time there has been no other access to the plaintiff's yard for horses or carts.

3. The origin of this user of the defendants' yard is unknown, as is also the state of the land owned by the plaintiff and the defendants respectively at the time of such origin.

4. During the whole of these eighty years the defendants' yard has been used as above mentioned openly and continuously and without interruption.

5. During the last forty-four years an annual payment of 15s. has been made by the plaintiff and her predecessors in title to the defendants and their predecessors in title.

This sum has been paid in September or October, but its origin is unknown, and the consideration for it is also unknown.

6. In the defendants' yard is a pump which has been used for many years by the plaintiff and her predecessors in title. Her right of access to this pump and right to obtain water from it are not now denied. The history of the pump and the origin of the plaintiff's right to use it are not known. But for many years it has been repaired alternately by the owners of the plaintiff's property and the owners of the defendants' property. The origin of this arrangement is not known.

So far there is now no controversy.

In March, 1898, the defendants served the plaintiff with notice to discontinue the use of the yard, and some letters passed between them. Two letters, written by the plaintiff in April, 1898, and in January, 1899, refer to the 15s. as paid for the use of the yard. She says she always thought the payments were really for repairs of the yard, although called the right of way. It is plain, however, from the plaintiff's evidence that she did not know what the payments were for. Counsel for the defendants naturally relied on these expressions in their favour, but they are not entitled to much if any weight with your lordships.

Two witnesses for the defendants say the 15s. was paid as rent—one says rent of gateway, he thinks; but the receipts are not forthcoming, and this evidence is very unsatisfactory.

The plaintiff's brother stated that when he was a boy eight or nine years old he heard a conversation between the tenant of the Red Lion (i.e., the defendants' house) and his father about cutting up the ground in the defendants' yard, and his father said, "I pay for the repairs of the yard, you must repair it." The witness says the 15s. has been paid ever since by the owners of the plaintiff's property to the owners of the defendants' yard. The conversation, however, was with the tenant and judging from the witness's age must have taken place in 1854. But he said on cross-examination that he could not recollect so long ago as that, and he cannot say when the payment began. It is impossible to rely on this evidence.

So the case stands. The question for your lordships' decision now is, do the facts or do they not establish a right of way across the defendants' yard for horses and carts going to or from the yard of the plaintiff.

Cozens-Hardy, J., and Rigby, L.J., thought they did, but Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ. thought differently, and having carefully considered the evidence and the authorities, I have come to the conclusion that they are right.

The plaintiff's statement of claim is so drawn as to entitle her to succeed if she can bring herself within the Prescription Act, or, failing that, if the facts warrant the presumption of a lost grant. Cozens-Hardy, J., considered that she was entitled to succeed under the Prescription Act; but that if not, a lost grant in her favour ought to be presumed. It is necessary to consider both of these methods of establishing her right; for the Prescription Act has not taken away any of the modes of claiming easements which existed before that Act was passed: see Aynsley v. Glover, L. R. 10 Ch. 283.

I will take the Prescription Act first. Section 2 is the important section, and the last part of it is relied upon by the plaintiff. To bring herself within this enactment she must prove that she and her predecessors in title have enjoyed the way in question claiming right thereto without interruption for forty years. The difficulty is raised by the words "claiming right thereto," and by the payment of the 15s. a year.

The words "claiming right thereto" have been commented on in many cases, and especially in Tickell v. Brown, 4 A. & E. 369, and I understand those words, and the equivalent words "as of right" which occur in section 5, to have the same meaning as the older expression nec vi, nec clam, nec precario. A temporary permission, although often renewed, would prevent an enjoyment from being "as of right"; but a permanent irrevocable permission attributable to a lost grant would not have the same effect. The common law doctrine is that all prescription presupposes a grant. But if the grant is proved and its terms are known, prescription has no place.

A title by prescription can be established by long peaceable open enjoyment only: but in order that it may be so established the enjoyment must be inconsistent with any other reasonable inference than that it has been as of right in the sense above explained. This, I think, is the proper inference to be drawn from Campbell v. Wilson, 3 East 294, Tickell v. Brown, and Bright v. Walker. If the enjoyment is equally consistent with two reasonable inferences, enjoyment as of right is not established; and this, I think, is the real truth in the present case.

The enjoyment is equally open to explanation in one of two ways—viz., by a lost grant of a right of way in consideration of a rent-charge on the plaintiff's land of 15s. a year; or by a succession of yearly licences not, perhaps, expressed every year, but implied and assumed and paid for.

I do not think that the evidence about repairing the pump and repairing the yard justifies the conclusion that there was a right of way and that the 15s. a year was paid not for it but for repairs.

This conclusion also prevents the application to the present case of the doctrine of a lost grant. For that doctrine only applies where the enjoyment cannot be otherwise reasonably accounted for.

I wish to add that I do not concur in thinking that if the plaintiff had succeeded in establishing her claim the defendants could not have compelled her to pay the 15s. a year. I have no doubt myself that at common law a prescriptive payment could have been enforced by an action of debt, or, in early times, in some cases by assize (see Com. Dig., titles Dett and Rent).

For the reasons above stated, and after much consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court of Appeal is correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Solicitors, J. H. H. Kidgell; Lovell & White.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) — Oct. 28.

THE GOLDSMITHS' COMPANY v. THE WEST METROPOLITAN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Taking lands—Compulsory powers—Duration of—Computation of time—"Three years from the passing of this Act"—Exclusion of day of passing of Act—West Metropolitan Railway Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. ccl.), s. 29.

By section 29 of the West Metropolitan Railway Act, 1899, "the powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of this Act shall cease after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act."

The Act passed on the 9*th of August,* 1899, and notice to treat for part of the land was served on the 9*th of August,* 1902.

Held, that in computing the three years the day of the passing of the Act must be excluded, and that therefore the compulsory powers of the company did not cease until midnight of the 9*th of August,* 1902.

Appeal from an order of Walton, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs were the owners of land at Acton, and the defendants were a railway company incorporated under the West Metropolitan Railway Act, 1899.

This Act, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts, empowered the defendants to take compulsorily certain of the plaintiffs' land. The Act received the Royal Assent on the 9th of August, 1899.*

By section 29, "the powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of this Act shall cease after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act."

On the 9th of August, 1902, the defendants served on the plaintiffs a notice to treat for the purchase of part of the plaintiffs' land which they were authorized by the Act to acquire compulsorily.†

The plaintiffs brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from acting upon the

* By 33 Geo. 3, c. 13 the clerk of the Parliament shall endorse on every Act the date when it shall have passed and shall have received the Royal Assent, and such indorsement shall be taken to be part of the Act, and to be the date of its commencement, where no other commencement shall be therein provided.

† There was a dispute as to whether the notice to treat was duly served on the 9th of August, 1902, but for the purposes of the present question it was assumed that the notice was duly served on that day.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

notice alleged to have been so served, and for a declaration that the notice was not served in due time as required by the said Act, and that the compulsory powers of the Act had ceased in respect of the land referred to in the notice.

The plaintiffs applied at chambers for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from acting upon the notice to treat until the trial of the action, or in the alternative that the question of law whether the notice was served in due time, and whether the compulsory powers of the defendants under the Act had ceased in respect of the land referred to in the notice should be set down for hearing forthwith.

Upon the hearing of this application the parties consented to treat it as the hearing of the preliminary question of law whether the notice to treat, if served as alleged, was served in due time, and Walton, J., held that the notice was served in time.

The plaintiffs appealed.

S. A. T. Rowlatt (Micklethwait with him), for the plaintiffs.—The West Metropolitan Railway Act, 1899, was passed and came into operation on the 9th of August, 1899, and therefore must be deemed to have come into operation on the first moment of that day, as the law does not in such a case recognize fractions of a day. A term of three years was set running by section 29 of the Act on a particular day, and that particular day must be reckoned as the first day of the three years. It is like the case of a lease for a term commencing on a particular day, where the day of the commencement is always included in the term. It is not like the case of the limitation of a term, from a certain date, within which an act has to be done. In this latter case the date from which the term is to start is to be excluded. The distinction is pointed out in Lester v. Garland, 15 Ves. 248, and Russell v. Ledsam, 14 M. & W. 574. The defendant's compulsory powers of taking land were set running on the 9th of August, 1899, and consequently came to an end at midnight on the 8th of August, 1902. The notice to treat was not, therefore, served in time.

He also referred to In re North, Ex parte Hasluck, [1895] 2 Q. B. 264, 43 W. R. Dig. 10.

Mulligan, K.C. (A. F. C. Luxmoore with him), for the defendants.—The "passing of the Act" means the time when the Royal Assent is given to it: Ex parte Rashleigh, In re Dalzell, 24 W. R. 495, 2 Ch. D. 9. Therefore the term of three years did not begin until after that time. Section 29 gave the defendants compulsory powers for three years "from the passing of this Act." That section fixed a term of three years from an event or date within which the defendants were to have power to serve the notices to treat. The day of that event or date must be excluded from the computation of the three years: Williams v. Nash, 28 Beav. 93; South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, [1891] 1 Q. B. 402, 39 W. R. Dig. 10. If the Act had said that the compulsory powers were to cease at the expiration of one day from the passing of the Act, it could not be contended that the powers would cease at the expiration of the day on which the Act passed. That shows that the day on which the Act passed must be excluded. The cases were reviewed by Chitty, J., in In re Railway Sleepers Supply Co., 33 W. R. 595, 29 Ch. D. 204. Section 36 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, does not affect this question because that section only defines the "commencement" of an Act. The three years, therefore, did not expire until midnight of the 9th of August, 1902, and the notice was served in time.

S. A. T. Rowlatt replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal fails. There is no doubt that the distinction is a somewhat fine one between the limitation of the duration of a term which is to commence on a particular day so as to involve the inclusion of that day, and the limitation of a period from a certain day for doing an act, in which case the first day is excluded. The distinction, however, is a well-established one. It is well stated by Parke, B., in Russell v. Ledsam, 14 M. & W., at p. 581: "The next question arises on a point reserved at the trial, on the evidence in support of the seventh plea. That plea was that the second or renewed letters patent were granted after the expiration of the term of fourteen years granted by the first letters patent; the replication took issue on that allegation; and the proof was that the original letters patent were dated on the 26th of February, 1825, the second on the 26th of February, 1839; and the question is whether the day of the date of the first letters patent was inclusive or exclusive. The usual course in recent times has been to construe the day exclusively, whenever anything was to be done in a certain time after a given event or date; and consequently the time for enrolling a specification within the six months given by the proviso is reckoned exclusively of the day of the date; and many other instances are collected in the cases of Webb v. Fairmaner, 3 M. & W. 473, and Young v. Higgon, 6 M. & W. 49." In the present case section 29 of the West Metropolitan Railway Act, 1899, provides that "The powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of this Act shall cease after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act." That section fixes a certain time from the passing of the Act within which an act—namely, the service of the notice to treat for the land, has to be done. The passing of the Act was the event or date "from" which the time for the exercise of the compulsory powers of the company was to run. The Act was passed on the 9th of August, 1899, and the three years ran from the expiration of that day, as the law in such a case takes no notice of a fraction of a day. The company were entitled to three full years from that day, and therefore their compulsory powers did not expire until midnight of the 9th of August, 1902. The notice to treat was therefore served in time. I only wish, in conclusion, to refer to the observations of Rigby, L.J., in In re North, Ex parte Hasluck, where that learned judge takes a wider view—namely, that the question whether the day on which the act is done is to be included or excluded must depend upon whether it is to the benefit or disadvantage of the person primarily interested. Without expressing any opinion as to whether I should go that length, it is enough to say that the authorities support the conclusion to which we have come in this case. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The general rule has been laid down by Sir William Grant in Lester v. Garland, by Parke, B., who delivered the judgment of the court in Russell v. Ledsam, and by other judges in subsequent cases. The rule is that where the time within which an act is to be done is to run from a certain date or event, the day of the date or event must be excluded from the computation of the time. Here section 29 of the Act defines the time within which a notice to treat for the purchase of land is to be given. That is the act to be done, and it is to be done within three years "from the passing of this Act," namely, from the 9th of August, 1899. It is obvious that the intention of the Act is to allow three full years from the last moment of the 9th of August, 1899, during which the compulsory powers of the company for the purchase of lands are to be in existence.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Freshfields.

Solicitors for the defendants, Biggs-Roche, Sawyer, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) July 27, 1903.

MOLYNEUX v. HAWTREY. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Assignment of lease—Notice of unusual covenants—Constructive notice—Fair opportunity—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 3.

In the course of negotiations for the assignment of a lease by the plaintiff to the defendant the defendant's solicitor had an interview with the plaintiff's agent. The agent offered to show the solicitor a lease similar in terms to the lease proposed to be assigned. The solicitor being pressed with other business could not then examine the document. Without any further inquiries or any further information as to the terms of the lease, a contract for assignment was executed. The defendant, having subsequently discovered that the lease contained unusual covenants, repudiated the contract.

Held, in an action for breach of the contract, that the plaintiff had not discharged the onus which lay upon him of either disclosing or giving the defendant a fair opportunity of ascertaining the terms of the lease.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract to take an assignment of a lease.

The defence was that the lease was subject to unusual covenants, of which no notice was given to the defendant, and that therefore the contract was not binding on the defendant.

The plaintiff, being the lessee of a flat at 89, Ashley-gardens, for a term of seven years from the 25th of December, 1899, and being desirous of disposing thereof, instructed Messrs. Heron & Heron, a firm of house agents, to find a purchaser; and on the 9th of December, 1901, negotiations were commenced with the defendant, Mrs. Hawtrey, for an assignment of the lease to her.

On the 12th of December, the parties not having yet come to terms, Mr. Peckham, the defendant's solicitor, called at the office of Messrs. Heron & Heron and had an interview with Mr. Heron, a member of the firm.

In the course of conversation Mr. Peckham asked Mr. Heron to show him the lease. Mr. Heron said that it was impossible to show it then, as it was stored away elsewhere with a number of other things, but that he could procure it in a few days. Mr. Heron, however, produced a printed document, saying that it was the form of lease used for flats on the Ashley-gardens estate, and that its terms were similar to those of the lease which it was proposed to assign. Mr. Peckham thereupon said that he was pressed with other work, and that he could not look at the document then. Nothing more was said at the interview as to the terms of the lease.

Subsequently, without any further inquiries on the part of the defendant, and without any further information on the part of the plaintiff as to the terms of the lease, the contract sued upon was executed.

After the execution of the contract the defendant discovered that the lease contained unusual covenants, and she then repudiated the contract as not binding upon her.

The covenant on which the defendant mainly relied was a covenant by the lessee that he would not at any time during the term without the licence of the lessors make any objection on the ground of obstruction of light or for any other reason to the erection on the land situate in Ambrosden-avenue, on the side opposite to the premises known as blocks 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, Ashley-gardens, of any cathedral or other ecclesiastical building, whatever might be the height of such building, or the practice of cathedral services, including the ringing of bells at all reasonable times, in any cathedral or other ecclesiastical building which might thereafter be erected upon the said last-mentioned land, or any other land then or lately belonging to Henry Edward Cardinal Manning, Daniel Gilbert, and James Bamber, or take any legal proceedings whatsoever for the purpose of restraining the erection of any such building or the holding of any such services or ringing of bells, or for obtaining damages for any injury caused by such erection, or services, or ringing of bells.

Wright, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Germaine, K.C., and G. A. Scott, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff gave the defendant's solicitor a fair opportunity of ascertaining what the terms of the lease were. He thereby satisfied the obligation imposed on the seller of a lease with regard to giving notice of unusual covenants.

They cited the following cases: Cosser v. Collinge, 3 My. & K. 283; Hyde v. Warden, 26 W. R. 201, 3 Ex. D. 72; Reeve v. Berridge, 36 W. R. 517, 20 Q. B. D. 523; In re White and Smith's Contract, 44 W. R. 424, [1896] 1 Ch. 637.

G. Spencer Bower, K.C., and Rose-Innes, for the defendant.—The purchaser of a lease is not affected with constructive notice of the terms of the lease, unless by an act of gross or culpable negligence he has failed to avail himself of an opportunity of ascertaining them: Ware v. Lord Egmont, 3 W. R. 48, 4 De. G. M. & G. 460; Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25. The learned judge was justified in finding as a fact that the defendant's solicitor had no fair opportunity in that sense of learning what the terms of the lease were.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Wright, J., in favour of the defendant in an action brought by the lessee of a flat to recover damages for breach of a contract to take an assignment of the lease. There was no doubt a concluded contract by the defendant to take an assignment of the lease in question, and the lease was in fact subject to covenants of an unusual and onerous character. The burden is always on the vendor to make out his title, and as Stirling, J., held in the case of In re White and Smith's Contract, it is primâ facie the duty of the vendor to disclose all that is necessary to protect himself, and not the duty of the purchaser to make inquiry before entering into a contract, and this is so whether the sale be by public auction or private contract. The same thing was said by Byrne, J., in the case of In re Haedicke and Lipski's Contract, 50 W. R. 20, [1901] 2 Ch. 666—viz., that it is the duty of the vendor of a lease to disclose the existence of onerous and unusual covenants contained in the lease, or at least to afford the purchaser an opportunity of inspecting the lease. We begin the discussion, then, with the principle that the burden is on the vendor.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If the lease contains unusual covenants, it is the duty of the vendor to put the purchaser in possession of the fact that the covenants are unusual. [The learned Master of the Rolls then stated the facts of the case, and continued:] At the end of the interview of the 12th of December on whom did the onus rest? Had it been shifted from the vendor on to the purchaser? Had the vendor discharged it? The defendant's solicitor came away from the interview with the same information as he had when he went to it. Could the vendor say he had given the defendant's solicitor a fair opportunity of learning what the covenants were because he offered to show him a document containing similar covenants? The solicitor could not then avail himself of the offer, because he had no time to examine the document. The question is whether, under those circumstances, a fair and reasonable opportunity of ascertaining the existence of unusual covenants was given to the purchaser's solicitor. That question is a question of fact, and the learned judge has found that no opportunity was given such as would be sufficient to discharge the onus on the vendor.

The law as to "fair opportunity" is laid down in Reeve v. Berridge. There Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, referred to the previous case of Hyde v. Warden, and said: "In that case the question arose whether the taking possession of property agreed to be underleased, with notice of the existence of the lease, was a waiver of all objections based on the terms of the lease. The question, therefore, so far as regards the question of notice, was the same as in the present case, and the court was pressed to decide that notice of the lease was notice of its contents, and that on the authority of various cases including Cosser v. Collinge. The court rejected the argument, and said: 'We think it may be considered as settled that the principle of that case can only be applied where (as, indeed, was the case in Cosser v. Collinge) the defendant had a fair opportunity of ascertaining for himself the provisions of the original lease.' It was argued before us that the question in Hyde v. Warden arose on a contract for a sub-lease, while in the present instance the question arises with relation to a contract for the assignment of a lease. But we are of opinion that there is no substance in such a distinction, because in both cases alike the purchaser must know that his vendor can confer on him no interest except one subject to the covenants contained in the lease, and the effect of notice must therefore be alike in both cases." Section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, which was passed after the case of Hyde v. Warden, seems to me to leave the law substantially as it was. It provides as follows: "A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of any instrument, fact, or thing unless—(i) it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or (ii) in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel, as such, or of his solicitor or other agent, as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor or other agent, as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent."

The question, therefore, appears to me to be whether there was such a want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant's solicitor as to entitle the plaintiff to say that he gave the solicitor a fair opportunity. I have come to the conclusion that there was plenty of evidence to justify the finding of the learned judge that in this case there was no fair opportunity in that sense. The appeal therefore fails.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, A. J. Schweder.

Solicitors for the defendant, Valpy, Peckham & Chaplin.

From Chan. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, Romer, Stirling, Mathew, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — July 20, 1903.

WYNNE-FINCH v. CHAYTOR. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Court of Appeal—Official referee—Reference of Chancery action—Application to set aside judgment—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 19—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 5—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 40, r. 6.

Where an action in the Chancery Division is referred to an official referee, and judgment is entered by direction of the official referee, the proper course for the unsuccessful party is to apply in the Chancery Division to set aside the judgment, and not in the first instance to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

Serle v. Fardell, 38 W. R. 733, 44 Ch. D. 299, not followed.

Daglish v. Barton, 48 W. R. 50, [1900] 1 Q. B. 284, overruled.

Appeal from a judgment entered by the direction of an official referee.

The action was brought in the Chancery Division, and was assigned to Farwell, J.

The whole action was referred to an official referee.

At the trial the official referee directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendants gave notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal.

The grounds of the appeal were that the decision of the official referee was wrong both in law and as to the facts.

The question was whether the appeal was rightly brought to the Court of Appeal, or whether the defendants ought not to have applied in the High Court to set aside the judgment.

Warmington, K.C., Manisty, K.C., and Edward Morten, for the defendants.

Levett, K.C., Page, K.C., and Bryan Farrer, for the plaintiff.

The following cases were cited: Serle v. Fardell, 38 W. R. 733, 44 Ch. D. 299; Clark v. Sonnenschein, 38 W. R. 717, 743, 25 Q. B. D. 226, 464; Macalpine & Co. v. Calder & Co., [1893] 1 Q. B. 545; Daglish v. Barton, 48 W. R. 50, [1900] 1 Q. B. 284.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20.—STIRLING, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This action was commenced by a writ issued in the Chancery Division on the 28th of December, 1900, claiming damages for breach of covenants in a mining lease. The action was assigned to Farwell, J. On the 4th of March, 1901, an order was made on a summons for directions by which the whole action was referred to an official referee, who by the terms of the order was to have all the powers of certifying and amending of a judge of the High

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Justice, and was to direct judgment to be entered and otherwise deal with the whole action pursuant to Order 36 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. On the 18th of February, 1903, the official referee gave a direction in the following terms: "In pursuance of the order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Farwell, dated the 4th of March, 1901, this cause has been tried before me, and I hereby direct that judgment be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of £3,289 6s. 4d., including the sum of £500 paid into court." A summons was afterwards taken out for further directions, and was dealt with by the official referee on the 13th of March. The judgment was subsequently drawn up, and bears date the 13th of March, and is headed, "In the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, Mr. Justice Farwell." From this judgment an appeal has been brought to this court. The notice of appeal calls in question the decision of the referee both as to the law and as to the facts. The question has been argued before us whether the appeal lies direct to this court or whether the appellants ought not in the first instance to move the High Court to set aside the judgment.

Ord. 36, r. 55c, directs that the provisions of rules 48-55 of the same order shall apply where any cause or matter or any question or issue of fact is referred to an officer of the court or to a special referee or arbitrator. Rules 48-55 deal with the powers of official referees; and in particular rule 50 specifically provides that, subject to any order made by the court or judge ordering the same, "the referee shall have the same authority with respect to discovery and production of documents, and in the conduct of any reference or trial, and the same power to direct that judgment be entered for any or either party, as a judge of the High Court." Ord. 40, r. 2, provides that "every referee to whom a cause or matter shall be referred for trial shall direct how judgment shall be entered, and such judgment shall be entered accordingly by a master or registrar as the case may be." In the present case the official referee had by virtue of those orders full powers to do everything which a judge of the High Court could have done in the action. The judgment which has been entered pursuant to his direction appears to be as much a judgment of the High Court as if it had been made at the trial of the action by Farwell, J., whose name it bears.

Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, confers on the Court of Appeal "jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment . . . of her Majesty's High Court of Justice, or of any judges or judge thereof, subject to the provisions of this Act, and to such rules and orders of court for regulating the terms and conditions on which such appeals shall be allowed, as may be made pursuant to this Act." In the Act of 1873 itself there does not appear to be any provision which affects the point under consideration. Of the rules the most important to be considered is ord. 40, r. 6: "Where at a trial by a referee he has directed that any judgment be entered, any party may move to set aside such judgment, and to enter any other judgment, on the ground that upon the finding as entered the judgment so directed is wrong: Provided that in the Queen's Bench Division such motion shall be made to a Divisional Court." The first question which arises on this rule is—In what court is such a motion to be made? Now, rules 3 and 4 of the same order confer the power of making similar motions where the trial has taken place before a judge either with or without a jury; and rule 5 provides that an application under rules 3 and 4 shall be to the Court of Appeal. There is no such direction with respect to an application under rule 6; and the inference is that the motion must be made in the High Court. This is confirmed by the concluding words of rule 6, which plainly indicate that the motion may be made in the Queen's Bench Division of that court, and provide that in such case it shall be made to a Divisional Court. But how is the application to be made in an action in the Chancery Division, in which there is no Divisional Court? The proviso just referred to provides no more than this—that when an application under rule 6 has to be made in the Queen's Bench Division it shall be made to a Divisional Court. Applications in Chancery actions not being expressly provided for are, in our opinion, to be made in accordance with the general practice applicable to that Division. Ord. 5, r. 9, provides that every cause or matter in the Chancery Division is to be assigned to, and marked with, the name of one of the judges thereof, before whom (speaking generally) all subsequent proceedings take place. In the present case, therefore, an application under ord. 40, r. 6, ought to be made before Farwell, J. In terms that rule only authorizes an application to set aside the judgment and enter another on the ground that on the finding as entered the judgment as entered is wrong, and does not expressly permit the finding itself to be questioned. It has, however, been decided by the Court of Appeal that this rule is to be read along with ord. 36, r. 52, and that, although the operation of the latter rule might seem to be limited to cases where the referee has submitted a question to the court, the powers conferred by it may be exercised by the court on an application under ord. 40, r. 6: Clark v. Sonnenschein. In that state of things it appears to us that an application to set aside the judgment and the findings on which it is based might have been made in the Chancery Division.

Order 58 deals with appeals to the Court of Appeal. Rule 1 provides that all such appeals are to be by way of rehearing, and to be brought by notice of motion. Rule 17 is as follows: "Whenever under these rules an application may be made either to the court below or to the Court of Appeal, or to a judge of the court below or of the Court of Appeal, it shall be made in the first instance to the court or judge below." Assuming, therefore, that the judgment of the 13th of March, 1903, is a judgment of the High Court to which section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, applies, and from which an appeal might be brought under ord. 58, r. 1, still, inasmuch as the same application might be made to Farwell, J., in the Chancery Division, we are of opinion that under ord. 58, r. 17, it ought to have been made to him, and that this court is precluded from entertaining it until he has dealt with it.

It was, however, contended that the proceedings on such an appeal as this are now regulated by the Judicature Act, 1894, s. 1, sub-section 5: "In all cases where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court or person, the appeal shall be heard and determined by a Divisional Court constituted as may be prescribed by rules of court; and the determination thereof by the Divisional Court shall be final, unless leave to appeal is given by that court or by the Court of Appeal." In our opinion this clause of the Judicature Act, 1894, has reference to appeals from inferior courts, and does not apply to an appeal from a judgment or order of the High Court itself, as the judgment in this action appears to us to be.

There, is however, a decision of the Court of Appeal in Daglish v. Barton, which is inconsistent with this view. The court on that occasion consisted of the late A. L. Smith, L.J., and Vaughan Williams, L.J., the latter of whom expressed doubt as to the true meaning of the sub-section, and now agrees with this judgment. With the greatest respect we are unable to agree with Daglish v. Barton, and think that it ought not to be followed; and it is, therefore, overruled.

The present appeal to this court must, therefore, be dismissed, without prejudice to the making of a similar application to Farwell, J.; and, if necessary, the time for making such an application ought to be extended. The costs of the present appeal will follow the result of that application; and, in case none should be made, there will be liberty to apply to this court.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Nicholl, Manisty, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Turry, Sherlock, & King.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Farwell, J. — Oct. 27.

In re LANCASHIRE, DERBYSHIRE AND EAST COAST RAILWAY ACTS, 1891 TO 1895, AND In re LINCOLN AND EAST COAST RAILWAY AND DOCK ACTS, 1897 TO 1902. (a.)

Railway — Parliamentary deposit fund — Abandoned undertaking—Mortgage by sureties, owners of the fund —Payment out of court—Costs of owners having conduct of proceedings.

The sureties of a railway company, owners of the parliamentary fund deposited in court, mortgaged the fund. On the abandonment of the undertaking the usual inquiries were directed and the sureties had the conduct of the proceedings. On application for payment out,

Held they were not entitled to their costs incurred in the proceedings wherein the inquiries were directed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application for payment out of court of the Parliamentary deposit fund of the Lincoln & East Coast Railway Co., an undertaking which had been abandoned. The applicants, Messrs. H. T. Anstruther, W. B. Davenport, and S. H. Ward, were the sureties of the company, and were entitled to the fund subject to its statutory obligations and to a mortgage made by them to Messrs. Coutts & Co. The inquiries usual on an abandonment and winding-up had been directed, and the applicants had the conduct of the proceedings. The questions decided related solely to costs and the only point needing report was as to whether the applicants were entitled to be allowed their costs incurred throughout the course of the proceedings.

R. J. Parker urged that the applicants were entitled to their costs as costs of administering a fund in court. They had acted for the benefit of the whole body of persons interested in the fund.

He cited In re Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Co., 48 W. R. 311, [1900] 1 Ch. 261, and In re Fisher, 42 W. R. 241, [1894] 1 Ch. 450, and referred to the Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44, s. 5), and the company's special Acts, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. ccxxxiv.) s. 14, and 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. iii.), s. 6.

Upjohn, K.C. (Clauson with him), for a judgment creditor of the company, pointed out that the applicants were in the position, not of trustees or legal personal representatives having the conduct of proceedings, but of persons claiming an estate subject to incumbrances. Costs were never given in such a case.

Devonshire, for the two railway companies.

Bryan Farrer, for Messrs. Coutts & Co.

FARWELL, J.—This application is governed by the Lincoln and East Coast Railway Act of 1897 supplemented by that of 1902. The point raised is a curious one. Inquiries necessary to clear the fund in court were directed on the application of persons entitled to the deposit. They could only get this fund out when the claims of landowners and creditors had been cleared off, and possibly these might be reduced. Mr. Parker argues that the proceedings of which the applicants had the conduct were for the benefit of creditors, and that therefore the applicants ought to be allowed their costs before the fund is distributed.

Where you find a number of persons having similar interests and one of them does the work it may well be that he is entitled to his costs; but if such a party is a surety or a debtor he cannot require creditors to pay his costs. The true analogy is that of an incumbered fund where the person entitled comes to clear off the incumbrances before getting the residue. Mr. Parker relied on the Wrexham case, but that was decided on a different footing. There a receiver had been appointed under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), and the usual inquiries were directed. A contractor, who had an action pending against the company (which had been referred to arbitration) was given liberty to proceed, notwithstanding the receivership order, and the company had leave to continue to attend the arbitration proceedings an behalf of all parties interested in its assets. The result was a substantial reduction in the contractor's claim, and the Court of Appeal allowed the company the costs of defending the action on the ground that the costs ought to be treated as incurred in prosecuting the inquiries directed by the court and for the benefit of the debenture-holders and other creditors of the company. This can form no precedent for a surety or a mortgagor obtaining costs in priority to his creditor where, as is not denied to be the case, he has acted for his own benefit and not from motives of philanthropy. I must therefore refuse the application, though, as all parties consent, I allow the applicants their costs of the present summons.

Solicitors, Collyer-Bristow & Co.; Lowe & Co.; Devonshire & Macole; Farrer & Co.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Aug. 12, 1903.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. (LIMITED) v. MAYOR, &c., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Solicitor and client—Action against public authority—Action in respect of construction of contract—Act done in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or of public duty or authority—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

By an agreement a public authority had, in pursuance of statutory authority, given to the plaintiffs certain powers, reserving to itself the right, by duly giving notice, to determine those powers. The public authority gave notice to the plaintiffs to determine the powers. In an action by the plaintiffs against the public authority, seeking declarations that the notice to determine had not been duly given, and that, by reason of the subsequent passing of an Act of Parliament, the public authority had become incapacitated from determining the powers, the plaintiffs were unsuccessful.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the act done by the public authority which gave rise to the action was not done in pursuance of an Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authortiy, and that the plaintiffs were liable to pay to the public authority costs taxed as between party and party only, and not as between solicitor and client.

Motion.

This was a motion on the part of the plaintiffs that the minutes of the judgment in this action as given out by the registrar might be varied by ordering that the costs of the defendants might be taxed as between party and party, instead of as between solicitor and client.

In their statement of claim the plaintiffs claimed (1) a declaration that they had by an agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, acquired powers to lay underground pipes in Hull within the meaning of the Telegraph Act, 1899, s. 3 (1), and that such powers were by virtue of that section continued and were in operation until a certain date; (2) a declaration that a certain notice given by the defendants to the plaintiffs purporting to determine the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, was invalid and inoperative; and (3) an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing the plaintiffs' underground pipes.

The action (which is reported 51 W. R. 617, where the facts are fully stated) was dismissed with costs.

Astbury, K.C., and H. H. Gaine, for the plaintiffs.—The present case is not within the words of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, under which it is sought to make the plaintiffs liable to pay the costs of the defendants as between solicitor and client. The plaintiffs did not sue the defendants in respect of "any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority." All the acts of the defendants of which the plaintiffs complained were done by them in purported exercise of their powers under the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899. The action is, therefore, one to determine the construction of a contract, and in such a case the Act does not apply: Milford Docks Co. v. Milford Haven Urban District Council, 65 J. P. 483; Clarke v. Lewisham District Council, 19 Times L. R. 82.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—Neither of the cases cited applies, because the action was brought, not on the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, but to obtain a declaration that by virtue of the Telephone Act, 1899, the authority given to the corporation by that agreement to determine the powers of the plaintiffs in regard to underground pipes had automatically ceased. It was in pursuance of an Act of Parliament and of a public duty or authority that the defendants had given the plaintiffs an authority to lay down underground pipes, and the same was the case in respect of the determination of that authority.

BUCKLEY, J.—In my opinion the Public Authorities Protection Act does not apply to this case. There had been executed on the 18th of March, 1899, an agreement between the corporation and the company, which in article 20 contained a provision enabling the corporation, after fulfilling certain formalities, in certain events, to determine the agreement on giving six months' notice. On the 28th of July, 1899, they gave a notice to the company. There were two questions to be determined in the action—first, whether effectual notice had been given, having regard to the formalities which were prescribed by the agreement; and, secondly, assuming the notice to have been good, whether the effect of section 3 (1) of the Telegraph Act, 1899, was to continue the powers possessed by the company? I held that good notice to determine the agreement had been given, and, secondly, that the powers of the company were not continued by the Act. That was all that was determined at the trial of the action.

Now, the Public Authorities Protection Act, s. 1, contains no words applicable to such a case, unless it be within the words "any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority." In a sense any act done by a corporation in respect of statutory powers is in pursuance of a public authority; but not everything done by a corporation is to be so treated for the purposes of the section. There was no duty imposed on the corporation to determine, under the power contained in article 20, the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899. In so determining it they were acting, not in execution of any public authority, but merely because they thought they ought to determine the particular contract under the clause by which they had reserved a power of revocation. The words of the Act of 1893 are "act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament"—the act of the corporation was not that—"or of any public duty or authority" it was not that. It was simply that there being a power of revocation contained in a contract, the corporation thought it expedient to exercise it. The other words in the section, as to neglect or default of the local authority, are not material to the present case. I do not think that the Act applies to a case where the action is merely on the construction of a contract and the effect of acts done under that contract, so as to extend, in the case of such an action, the protection given to public authorities in respect of actions brought against them for acts done "in the execution of statutory and other public duties." I therefore allow the motion.

Solicitors, W. E. L. Gaine; Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for E. Laverack, Hull.

Chan. Div. } June 20, 30; Aug. 6, 1903.
Swinfen Eady, J. }

In re FLETCHER AND DYSON, SOLICITORS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Lease by vicar and others acting by different solicitors—Lessee's liability—Error in taxation—Disallowed costs of additional solicitors excluded from one-sixth—Objections—Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 39, 41—Costs of taxation.

Where a lessor can only grant a lease with the consent of third parties, and such parties act by different solicitors, the lessee is not, in the absence of agreement express or implied, liable to pay more than one set of costs. In taxing a solicitor's bill of costs, some of the items in which represent payments made by him to other solicitors, which the client is liable to pay and would have been entitled to tax if sent in to him direct by such other solicitors, any sums taxed off such items are, no less than sums taxed off the solicitor's own charges, to be reckoned as taxed off his bill for the purpose of ascertaining who is to pay the costs of taxation.

Ord. 65, r. 27 (sub-rules 39, 41), which requires objections to be carried in before the taxing-master, does not apply to objections raised against the principle adopted by the master in the taxation.

In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, distinguished.

This was a summons to review the taxation of the bill of costs of a lessor's solicitors, the question being whether the lessee was bound to pay the costs of certain concurring parties acting by separate solicitors; and, if so, whether those costs were properly included as disbursements in such bill.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows:

On the 30th of January, 1903, George Lindley obtained an order to tax certain costs relating to the grant to himself in the year 1902 of a mineral lease by the vicar of Kirkburton, with the concurrence of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Bishop of Wakefield, the patron of the benefice, under the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts—a previous lease dated the 1st of October, 1892, being surrendered as part of the transaction. Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson, of Huddersfield (now practising as Laycock, Dyson, & Laycock), acted as solicitors for the vicar, and their costs amounted to £22 2s. 1d.; Messrs. Milles, Jennings-White, & Foster, of Whitehall-place, acted as solicitors for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and their costs amounted to £23 1s. 6d.; Messrs. Dixons & Horne acted as solicitors for the bishop, and their costs amounted to £7 7s.; the charges of Messrs. Abbey & Hanson, surveyors, were £14 3s. 6d., making a total of £66 14s. 1d. Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson sent in their bill of costs to the lessee at this entire sum of £66 14s. 1d., and they made it out as follows:

				£	s.	d.
Their own profit charges, of which detailed items were given in the usual way				17	17	8
Outpayments.	£	s.	d.
Printers' charges	3	10	7
Messrs. Dixons & Horne's charges	7	7	0
Stamp and stamping and telegram	0	13	10
Messrs. Milles & Co.'s charges ...	23	1	6
Messrs. Abbey & Hanson's charges	14	3	6
				48	16	5
				66	14	1

The order to tax was obtained under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, upon a petition of course.

The result of the taxation by the master was as follows: Taxed off Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson's costs, £1 15s. 8d., reducing the amount to £20 6s. 5d. Taxed off Messrs. Milles & Co.'s costs, £11 0s. 10d., reducing the amount to £12 0s. 8d. Nothing was taxed off Messrs. Dixons & Horne's charges of £7 7s., but £10 10s. was disallowed off the charges of Messrs. Abbey & Hanson, surveyors, reducing their fees to £3 13s. 6d. The entire bill of costs of £66 14s. 1d. was thus reduced to £43 7s. 7d.

The taxing-master, however, held that the applicant, George Lindley, must pay the costs of the taxation, as less than one-sixth had been taxed off Messrs. Fletcher and Dyson's own charges. The taxing-master treated the charges of Messrs. Dixons & Horne, Milles & Co., and Abbey & Hanson, as struck out of the bill, and as if included in a cash account. The result of this was that the disallowances from the costs of Messrs. Milles & Co. were not included in the calculation of the one-sixth. If the £11 0s. 10d. disallowed off such costs were added to the £1 15s. 8d. disallowed off Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson's costs, the sum of the disallowances—namely, £12 16s. 6d., would be more than one-sixth of £66 14s. 1d.

The summons was heard on the 20th and 30th of June, 1903, when judgment was reserved.

Rowland Rowlands, for the applicant.—By custom the lessee pays the lessor's costs of granting the lease, but the custom has never been shown to extend to the costs of third parties joining for the purpose of making a good title. For these the lessee cannot be liable in the absence of a special contract to pay them. A custom would be unreasonable which bound a lessee to pay the costs of five or six parties acting by different solicitors. If the lessor's position is such that he cannot grant the lease without their concurrence he must pay their costs. As to the costs of taxation the order provides that if more than one-sixth be taxed off the bill the respondents shall pay the costs, and the question is whether the master was right in refusing to take into account, for the purpose of calculating the one-sixth, the amounts he taxed off what he calls cash account, but what I call disbursements. The order was to tax the bill as a whole, including these disbursements; they cannot therefore be treated as cash items. The respondents having entered them as disbursements are estopped from calling them cash items for the purpose of evading their liability to pay the costs of taxation. The respondents take the technical objection that I cannot now object, not having done so before the master; but the rule on which he relies (ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 22, 39, 41) refers only to items, and has no application to any decision of the master in putting into effect the order under which he taxes. As to the surveyors' charges, they have not been sufficiently reduced. It may be that Messrs. Abbey & Hanson put the plan on the lease, and for this we do not object to pay their charge of £1 11s. 6d.; but there can be nothing else for which the lessee is liable, and there is therefore an excess of £2 2s., on the sum allowed by the master on that bill.

He cited: Grissell v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C. 10; In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, 243; In re Heather, 18 W. R. 1079, L. R. 5 Ch. 694; In re Castle, 35 W. R. 621, 36 Ch. D. 194; Cordery on Solicitors, p. 70 (3rd ed.); Law Journal for 1883, p. 127.

E. P. Hewitt, for respondents.—The concurring parties were necessary parties. The statute (5 & 6 Vict. c. 108) requires their consent to be given and to be testified by their being made parties; but it makes no provision for payment of their costs. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners stipulated that the lessee should pay their costs, and the lessee knew what he would have to pay, for he had taken a previous lease from the vicar. It is true there is no evidence of this, but these facts were stated before the taxing-master and were not contradicted. We applied in chambers for leave to file evidence, but were told by the master that the proper time for the application would be before your lordship. I admit that no important case can be found, throwing on the lessee the liability to pay costs of third parties, in the absence of an agreement to do so. As to the costs of taxation the objection should have been made before the taxing-master; it cannot be raised now. The master has not taxed one-sixth off the bill so as to make the respondents liable to pay; he took each bill separately and "moderated" it—the effect being that the amounts which he disallowed were struck out as sums which should not have been in the bill at all. As to the surveyors' charges, the £2 2s. was no doubt a fee for checking the plan drawn by their clerks on the lease.

He cited Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Pinney, 47 W. R. 136, [1899] 1 Ch. 99; In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, 244; and In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603.

Rowlands replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 6, 1903.—SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts as above set forth, said: The applicant seeks to review the taxation on several grounds. The first ground is that, as lessee, he is only liable to pay the costs of the lessor acting by one solicitor, and that if the concurrence of two other parties, acting by separate solicitors, is necessary, there is not any custom which compels him, as lessee, to pay these additional costs. In the leading case of Grissell v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C. 10, Tindal, C.J., said: "The evidence shows that it is the custom for the landlord's attorney to draw the lease, and that it is paid for by the lessee," but in that case there was only one bill of costs in question, the lease being drawn by Mr. Taylor, the attorney for the executors of Mr. Peto. In the recent case of In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, in which Cozens-Hardy, J., as he then was, had to consider the question of the lessee's liability, under a third-party order to tax the lessor's solicitor's costs, he said (p. 244): "On principle the lessee must be held to have implicitly contracted to indemnify the lessor against expenses properly incurred in preparing the lease." But the judge was there considering whether the fees of counsel for settling a draft lease might be properly allowed as part of the costs, and not whether, if there were several lessors, acting by different solicitors, the lessee was to pay several sets of costs. I have communicated with the taxing-master as to whether there is any settled practice in the taxing office on the subject, and he reports to me as follows: "None of my colleagues have ever had to consider the question, and consequently it cannot be said that there is any settled practice." In Cordery on Solicitors (3rd ed.), p. 70, the practice where there are several lessors is stated as follows: "In taking a lease from two or more persons who employ different solicitors, as, e.g., mortgagor and mortgagee, tenant for life and remainderman, or tenants in common, in the absence of agreement the lessee pays one set of costs only," and this statement appears to be based upon an opinion of the Council of the Law Society as to the practice of solicitors and the understanding of the profession. Under these circumstances, I am unable to assume, in the absence of any evidence on the subject, that there is any general custom binding a lessee to pay several sets of costs, where there are several lessors represented by different solicitors. In all such cases the question must be considered whether there is any contract by the lessee to pay, either express or to be implied from the nature of the circumstances under which the arrangement for the new lease was arrived at. In the present case, having regard to the fact that it was part of the arrangement for the new lease that a subsisting lease between the same parties should be surrendered, and to the course of the negotiations, and to the letter of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of the 11th of July, 1902—which (if necessary) can be strictly proved—there would probably be little difficulty in establishing such an agreement by the lessee; the question has not yet been raised in this form before the master, as the applicant applied to tax the whole bill delivered on or about the 11th of December, 1902, on the footing that he was liable to pay the same subject to taxation; but, if the applicant desires it, the matter must be referred back to the master to inquire whether there was any contract by the applicant, express or implied, to pay the three sets of lessors' costs.

The next ground for reviewing the taxation put forward by the applicant is that more than one-sixth has been taxed off, and so the costs of taxation should be borne by the respondents, and not by the applicant. It was not disputed that the costs of Messrs. Milles & Co. were properly subject to taxation, and were duly and regularly taxed by the master, and that more than one-sixth of the whole bill as delivered has been taxed off; but reliance was placed upon In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, as deciding that a professional payment by one solicitor to another was properly included in a cash account, and ought not to be taken into account for the purpose of calculating the one-sixth. I am of opinion that the costs of Messrs. Dixons & Horne, and Messrs. Milles & Co. do not come within this rule. In the first place, these costs are taxable items. In the next place, they are not disbursements made by Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson as agents on the order of the applicant; the payments were not made by them at the request of the applicant. Strictly speaking, Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson were under no liability to make the payments, and had no right to make them, so as to charge the applicant with the amount. If Messrs. Dixons & Horne and Milles & Co. had delivered their costs directly to the applicant, then (assuming that he was liable to pay them) he would have had the same right to tax them, and upon the same terms, as in the case of Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson's costs, and with the same consequences in the event of a sixth being taxed off; and his right cannot be prejudicially affected by Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson including the costs of these solicitors in their bill. For these reasons I am of opinion that the costs of taxation must be borne by the respondents, Messrs. Fletcher & Dyson, who have chosen to include other costs in their costs, as more than a sixth of the whole costs having been taxed off. It was urged by Mr. Hewitt that the question of the costs of the taxation was not open to the applicant, as it was not the subject of any objection; but ord. 65, r. 27 (sub-rules 39-41), only applies where particular items are objected to (In re Castle, 35 W. R. 621, 36 Ch. D. 194); but there is no rule which necessitates an objection being carried in, in such a case as the present, where more than a sixth of the bill of costs has been disallowed, but where, nevertheless, the master proceeds to tax and allow the costs of the respondents. In so doing he has acted on a wrong principle and not in obedience to the order, which in the event which has happened directed him to tax the costs of the applicant, and not the costs of the solicitors.

The remaining objection is to the allowance of £3 13s. 6d. for the charges of Messrs. Abbey & Hanson, surveyors. It was decided in In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, by Cozens-Hardy, J., that the lessee is not liable to pay the fees of a mining expert employed by the lessor, and I cannot gather from the materials before me that the surveyors did any work, after the agreement for a lease had been arrived at, which the lessors are entitled to charge against the lessee. The taxing-master states in his answers to objections that he has disallowed all charges, whether of surveyors or solicitors, leading up to the agreement to take the lease; but I cannot find from the particulars of the surveyors' charges that they did any work after the agreement was arrived at for which the lessee is liable. The surveyors charged for "negotiating new lease, instructing solicitors, and generally engaged in this matter." The master has allowed an apportioned part of the amount charged. I have no particulars whatever of any work done by the surveyors for which the lessee ought to pay; the surveyors did not even put the plan on the lease; a tracing, coloured green, of the land to be let is referred to in the letter of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of the 11th of July, 1902, before the agreement was come to, and the bill of costs of the solicitors contains in the item "printers' charges," the amount charged for placing the plan on the lease. Under these circumstances, the £3 13s. 6d, surveyors' charges, must be disallowed. The matter must go back to the taxing-master to review his taxation accordingly. The costs of this application will be costs in the taxation.

Solicitors, Joe Woodhouse; Iliffe, Henley, & Sweet.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 14, 1903.

WEST HAM UNION v. HOLBEACH UNION. (a.)

Poor law — Settlement — Illegitimate child — Mother's settlement acquired by three years' residence—Child born in another union — Acquiring a settlement — Derivative settlement—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 35.

A woman, who was herself illegitimate and was born in the Wisbech Union Workhouse in 1879, resided with her mother at West Ham, in the appellant union from the 27*th of June,* 1890, to the 7*th of September,* 1893. After 1893 the woman went into service away from West Ham, and has had since no settled residence. On the 25*th of October,* 1899, she gave birth to an illegitimate child in the Holbeach Union Workhouse in the respondent union. The justices made an order that the appellant union should receive and maintain the child.

Held, that the mother between 1890 and 1893 had acquired a legal settlement within the appellant union, because Reg. v. Elvet, 8 W. R. 523, 2 E. & E. 266, was an authority upon which they could decide that an effective settlement could be acquired by a person under the age of sixteen; and consequently that the order of the justices was right.

The decision in Manchester Overseers v. Ormskirk Union, 38 W. R. 778, 24 Q. B. D. 678, not followed.

Case stated for the opinion of the court pursuant to the provisions of section 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45.

On the 3rd of December, 1901, the respondents obtained an order from two justices of the peace for the county of the parts of Holland, Lincolnshire, whereby it was adjudged that the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, in the county of Essex, was the last legal settlement of George Ernest Neep, aged about two years, a pauper, and ordering that the appellants should receive and provide for the said pauper according to law. The appellants appealed to quarter sessions and the following special case was stated by agreement.

The case set out that George Ernest Neep, the pauper, was the illegitimate child of Emma Neep, and was born in the Holbeach Union Workhouse on the 25th of October, 1899.

Emma Neep, the mother of the pauper, was the illegitimate child of Mary Ann Neep, and was born in the parish of Tilney St. Lawrence, in the Wisbech Union, on the 11th of April, 1879.

Mary Ann Neep married Alfred Frederick Chapman at Tilney St. Lawrence on the 23rd of December, 1881.

From the 27th of June, 1890, to the 7th of September, 1893, Chapman resided in the parish of West Ham with his wife for a term of three years in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes on that behalf render him irremovable therefrom and settled therein.

From the 7th of September, 1893, Chapman continued to reside in the parish of West Ham, and was in receipt of relief from that union until his death on the 8th of September, 1894. His wife, the said Mary Ann Chapman, resided with him until his death.

From the 8th of September, 1894, Mary Ann Chapman (the widow of Alfred Chapman and mother of Emma Neep) continued to reside in the parish of West Ham, receiving relief from the union from that date until the 28th of November, 1895, when she ceased to reside there. She died in the Poplar Union Infirmary on the 14th of October, 1896.

From the 27th of June, 1890, to the 28th of July, 1893, Emma Neep (the mother of the pauper) resided with Chapman and her mother, Mary Ann Chapman, at West Ham. On the latter date she went into service in the Poplar Union, and has since had no settled residence.

The appellants affirmed that the settlement of Emma Neep could not be ascertained without inquiry into the derivative settlement of her parent, Mary Ann Chapman, and that Emma must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Tilney St. Lawrence, where she was born.

The respondents affirmed that the said Emma Neep acquired a legal settlement in the parish of West Ham by reason of the residence therein of Chapman and his wife, or by reason of the residence of Emma Neep for upwards of three years prior to the 28th of July, 1893, in such manner and under such circumstances as rendered her irremovable therefrom.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts above stated the said Emma Neep acquired a settlement available for the pauper under sections 34 and 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61 in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union.

Montague Lush, K.C. (M. J. Grubbe with him), for the appellants, West Ham Union.—The justices were wrong in making an order that the appellant union should receive and maintain this pauper child, for their order is contrary to the provisions of sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. Section 35 contains three separate clauses, the first of which abolishes derivative settlement subject to certain exceptions that do not apply here. It therefore being impossible for an illegitimate pauper to obtain a derivative settlement from a derivative settlement, this pauper must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Holbeach, in which union he was born: Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465, per Lord Watson, at p. 481; Hollingbourn Union v. West Ham Union, 29 W. R. 629, 6 Q. B. D. 580; Reg. v. Leeds Union, 27 W. R. 708, 4 Q. B. B. 323; West Ham Union v. Bethnal Green Churchwardens, 42 W. R. 573, [1894] A. C. 230.

C. B. Marriott, for the respondents, the Holbeach Union.—Under section 34 Emma Neep, the mother of the pauper, acquired a status of irremovability in the West Ham Union, and that was so found as a fact by the case. Her child, being under the age of sixteen, would take her settlement in accordance with the provisions of section 35, and therefore the order was right: Reg. v. Elvet, Inhabitants of, 8 W. R. 523, 2 E. & E. 266.

M. J Grubbe, in reply, cited Manchester Overseers v. Ormskirk Union, 38 W. R. 778, 24 Q. B. D. 678, where it was laid down that an illegitimate, like a legitimate child under sixteen years of age, cannot acquire a settlement for itself, but must follow its parentage settlement.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The conclusion I have come to on the authorities that have been cited to us is that the order made by the justices here was right. If Mr. Lush could have shown us that this case fell under the last paragraph of section 35, which provides that "if any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself . . . and it cannot be shown what settlement such child . . . derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born," then I think his argument would have been well founded. If the settlement of Emma Neep, the mother, is a derivative one, then the Reigate Union case is an authority for us to say that you may not inquire into what that derivative settlement is and that the settlement of the child must be determined by its birth settlement, notwithstanding that drastic results might follow, such as the separating of a child from its mother or a wife from her husband. If the facts brought the case within that section, I see no answer to the appellants' contention. But it was said that that argument overlooked the principle laid down in Reg. v. Elvet Inhabitants, that if the mother of a pauper had acquired a settlement of her own, then, as it would not be necessary to inquire into her derivative settlement, the order of the justices would be right. Section 34 enacts that "where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such a manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise." Therefore, if the principle stated by Lord Coleridge in Manchester Overseers v. Ormskirk Union to the effect that a child under sixteen cannot acquire a settlement is right, then the case becomes easy. But in Reg. v. Elvet Inhabitants the language of the judges point to that principle having been too widely stated by Lord Coleridge, for in that case it was held that a child under sixteen had acquired a settlement. That is the view I take of the language of sections 34 and 35 of the Act, particularly from the last clause of section 35, which I have already read. The case of Reg. v. Elvet Inhabitants having decided that a child under sixteen could acquire a settlement, Mr. Lush's attempt to draw a distinction as to that part of the period of residence that was before the age of sixteen and a part after, does not appear to be well founded although it is supported by the Manchester case He had, then, to press us to say that the case fell within the statement of law made by Lord Watson in the Reigate case, who said that in all cases where the parent's settlement was itself derivative the effect of section 35 was to throw children as soon as they attained the age of sixteen upon their own birth settlement until they acquired another. Does that exclude the justices from inquiring into what the settlement of the parent was if there were grounds for contending it was not derivative. In my opinion that is not the effect of the section, and therefore, in the circumstances of the present case, it was open for the justices to come to the conclusion that Emma Neep by reason of her residence in the appellants' union had become irremovable. That being so, section 34 applies. Under that section it is clear that she must be deemed as being settled in the appellants' union, and her child would, taking her settlement, be rightly made by the order chargeable to the appellants' union. For these reasons I think the justices came to a right decision and their order must be upheld.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS, J., agreed.

CHANNELL, J., in concurring, said: I think that Reg. v. Elvet Inhabitants, approved as that decision was by the House of Lords, must be taken as an authority governing the present case, and consequently the mother's settlement, not being a derivative one, but one which her own residence within the union gave her in her own right, the magistrates here came to a correct conclusion. I agree that this appeal fails.

Solicitor for the appellants, Fred E. Hilleary.

Solicitors for the respondents, Callard & Vulliamy, for Richard P. Mossop, Holbeach.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — May 15, 1903.

REX v. CORNWALL JUSTICES. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Rating appeals—Appeal to quarter sessions—Parochial Assessments Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 6.

In an appeal to quarter sessions under the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, the court has power to give to the successful party the costs incurred in the court below as well as the costs of the appeal.

Rule nisi calling on the justices at quarter sessions to show cause why they should not hear and determine according to law the application of the assessment committee for an order adjudging that one Jane Sandercock should pay to the committee their costs at the proceedings at special sessions.

The following are the facts of the case:

Jane Sandercock appealed to special sessions against an assessment of poor rate made by the assessment committee of the poor law union.

The special sessions allowed the appeal with costs and reduced the assessment.

The assessment committee then appealed to quarter sessions, who restored the original assessment with costs, but refused to give to the committee their costs of the appeal to special sessions or to vary the order of the special sessions, on the ground that they had no power to do so.

The assessment committee then obtained this rule.

Section 6 of the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, which provides for appeals against assessments being made to quarter sessions, gives the justices the following power with regard to costs: ". . . And such justices upon hearing and finally determining such appeal shall and may according to their discretion award such costs to the party or parties appealing or appealed against as they shall think proper. . . ."

Foote, K.C., and Lawrance showed cause against the rule.—The only power given to the justices to deal with costs is the power conferred by section 6 of the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836. The words in that section do not give power to the quarter sessions to make the order as to costs that the special sessions should have made.

Ryde, in support.—If this section does not give power to the magistrates to vary the order of special sessions the result follows that an appellant who is successful has to pay the costs of his opponent in the court below.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case a rule was moved by Mr. Ryde asking that the court of quarter sessions should entertain and decide according to law an application for an order as to costs of certain proceedings at special sessions which had been appealed to them. The point raised is one which has not been decided before apparently.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question is whether or not the court of quarter sessions, which has an undoubted right to deal (and this is not disputed) with the costs of the appeal to them, have also a right to make an order respecting the costs of the hearing before the special sessions, or, to put it more correctly, in this particular case to make an order varying the order as to costs which the court of special sessions has made. That depends upon the language of section 6 of the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, which established the quarter sessions to be held four times in the year, and allowed appeals to those sessions on the ground of inequality, unfairness, or incorrectness in the valuation; and the decision of the special sessions was to be binding on the parties unless the person or persons impugning such decision should within fourteen days after the same shall been given cause notice to be given in writing of his, her, or their intention of appealing against such decision, and of the matter or cause of such appeal to the person or persons in whose favour such decision shall have been made, and within five days after giving such notice enter into a recognizance before some justice of the peace with sufficient securities conditioned to try such appeal at the then next general sessions or quarter sessions of the peace, which shall first happen, and to abide the order of and pay such costs as should be awarded by the justices at such quarter sessions or an adjournment thereof, and such justices after hearing and finally determining such matter of appeal should and might according to their discretion award such costs to the party or parties appealing or appealed against as they should think proper, and their determination in or concerning the premises should be conclusive and binding on all parties to all intents and purposes whatsoever. Of course the section refers to costs and refers to appeals, and it is easy to suggest many forms of expression which would have made the case clear one way or other. For instance, had the Legislature been proposing to deal only with the costs of the appeal, they might have put in such words as these and said "the costs of the appeal," and had they been proposing to make it quite clear that the court of quarter sessions should have power to deal with the costs of the special sessions, they might have inserted words which suggested or gave the court power to make such order as to the appeal or costs as the court below might have made. Either of these expressions would have resolved the doubt on one side or the other.

It seems to me that we have here an expression which does not give a direct guide, but which I think has been adopted in order to give as large a discretion as possible in the matter which is before them, to the court of quarter sessions. If we look back at the questions which were coming before them, it is not like a decision on a different matter; it is an appeal from a previous decision of the special sessions on the ground of "inequality, unfairness, or incorrectness," and it would seem to be in accordance with justice, if the words of the section do not prohibit such a construction being put upon them, that the justices should have power to make an order in respect of costs which would in effect put the parties in the position they ought to be in, having regard to the litigation; and I certainly think that unless they have power to make some such order it would seem that they could not make an order varying the order of special sessions in the matter of costs; and therefore, taking this case merely as an example, the order directing the unsuccessful respondent to receive his costs, which the successful appellant apparently had been ordered to pay him, could not be varied and must stand. And I also think there is weight—only as giving a guide to the general construction—in the last part of section 7, which says that no order of the justices in special sessions shall be of any force pending any appeal touching the same subject-matter in the court of general or quarter sessions of the peace having jurisdiction to try such appeal or in opposition to the order of any such court upon such appeal. I therefore come to the conclusion that under this statute the court of quarter sessions, dealing with an appeal on the same subject-matter, were intended to be given, and have been given, power to deal with the costs in the court below, as well as the costs of the appeal. The language of section 6, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, is very different from that in the section we have to construe, and seems to me not to be any guide to us in the particular matter.

The only other point that arises is this. It is suggested that the counsel for the appellant indicated that he would be satisfied with the lesser of the two remedies—that is to say, that he was not forced to pay the costs of Miss Sandercock in the court below, but got off with paying his own costs. I do not think that that is a matter as to which anything has happened to prevent counsel from asking the court for what he asked for here. He asked that the court should hear and determine according to their jurisdiction what it thought ought to be done in the matter of costs, and he has moved his rule asking for an order that they should hear and determine the application that Miss Sandercock should pay the costs. That, in my opinion, clearly involves the minor or consequential result that the order which made the assessment committee pay Miss Sandercock's costs at any rate should be reviewed by the court of quarter sessions. I think the greater includes the lesser, and had it been necessary we should have marked the rule. I think the right form of order is that the court of quarter sessions should be directed to hear and determine the application made by counsel for the appellant to vary the order of special sessions in the matter of the costs, and then they can give such relief as they think fit, and if the appellants think fit to waive any part of their claim, that is a matter we have nothing to do with. I am of opinion that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction, and they have said on the face of their judgment that they would have entertained the matter but for the fact that they thought they had not jurisdiction.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the matter of form I think this is perfectly right, because what took place in the court below amounted to this: The appellants asked for exactly the order they ask for now—that is to say, they asked the court of quarter sessions to give them the costs before the special sessions, but then their counsel added: "If you make the smaller order—namely, that I should be relieved from these costs which I have been compelled to pay, I make no request at all." The court did not accept that, and therefore I think the appellants are remitted to their original demand to the quarter sessions—namely, to hear and determine their application for their costs in the court below.

Then as to the important matter of substance my view, shortly put, is this: That the language of the section here is not sufficiently definite to enable me to say with absolute certainty, looking at the mere words which are used, whether it should be read so as to include power to deal with the costs below or not, and I think either construction might be adopted without doing violence to the language. When that is the case, it is legitimate, I think, to look at the consequences which would happen in either the one view or the other. If the view which has been pronounced by my lord, and in which I entirely agree, is accepted, it enables the court of quarter sessions to do complete justice between the parties. If the contrary view prevail, and if the power to quarter sessions is limited to dealing with the question of amount, it seems to me that the greatest injustice might follow. With the reasons which my lord has given I beg to express my entire agreement.

CHANNELL, J.—I entirely agree that as these words are capable of bearing the meaning contended for by the assessment committee, and as there would be very great inconvenience, and possibly injustice, if we did not so hold, we are justified in holding the view expressed by my lord and my brother Wills. Upon the question of form I should like to say a word. The point is relied upon that there has been no distinct demand for the performance of what the mandamus is to go for. A demand is necessary in order to make a refusal a ground for mandamus in most cases, and a refusal to do the duty is that which gives the jurisdiction to the court to issue a mandamus, and the duty here is to hear and determine an application which, according to the view we take of the sections, the court had power to entertain, and which they refused to entertain, on the ground that in their view they had no such power. The mandamus goes to them not to make any particular order, but to hear and determine the matter, and make such order as they in their discretion think fit and right.

If the order as to costs made by the special sessions were to stand as a separate thing with which the quarter sessions had no power to deal, of course the greatest injustice would result, and this case is an exact illustration of it. The party who had been successful on the appeal, and who ought to have been successful before the special sessions, would remain liable still to pay the costs which were ordered to be paid by him when it was supposed that he was not successful. Of course that is a great injustice. On the other hand, if the order as to costs fail and there is no order as to costs before the special sessions, almost equal injustice in certain cases might be done.

Supposing, for instance, that originally the appeal had been against an assessment of £100, and supposing that that had been reduced, and that then the council for the committee asked for another if there had been any chance of getting it. That is the substance, I think, of what he says, but it is quite unimportant what he asked the quarter sessions to do, provided it is clear he did ask them to exercise jurisdiction and they erroneously held that they had not that jurisdiction. This is quite enough to enable us to grant the mandamus in the form in which it is here—namely, to hear and determine according to law the matter of an application and although he has put his application apparently in terms which are not exactly correct, that is the effect of what is asked.

Rule absolute.

Solicitors, Carthew & Wheeler, for Graham & Graham, Fowey; Bell, Stuart, May, & Horne, for John Stephens (Carlyon & Stephens), St. Austell.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — June 22, 23; July 30, 1903.

SANDERSON v. BLYTH THEATRE CO. (LIMITED) AND HOPE. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Defendant joined in the alternative—Liability of unsuccessful co-defendant to pay costs of successful co-defendant—Judicature Act, 1890, s. 5—Rules of Supreme Court, ord. 16, r. 4; ord. 65, r. 1.

In an action brought against two defendants in the alternative, and tried with a jury, the judge held that there was not good cause to deprive one of the defendants of costs as against the plaintiff, but yet was of opinion that the costs so occasioned ought properly to be borne by the other defendant. He accordingly ordered the plaintiff to pay these costs in the first instance and then to add them to his own, and to have them paid to him by the other defendant.

Held, that the judge had jurisdiction to make such an order.

Appeal by the defendant company from Grantham, J.

The facts were thus stated in the written judgment of Stirling, L.J.:

This action was brought originally against the Blyth Theatre Co. alone, to recover a sum of £189 11s 6d. for work done and materials supplied in connection with the defendants' theatre at Blyth. The statement of claim alleged that the work was done and the materials supplied at the request of the company by their agents, Messrs. Hope & Maxwell, the architects employed by the defendants in building the theatre. By their defence the company denied (amongst other things) that they or their agents requested the plaintiff to supply materials or do work as alleged in the statement of claim, and also set up other defences immaterial to be stated in detail. Thereupon the plaintiff took out a summons for leave to add William Hope, the architect of the company, as a defendant to the action, and an order was made, dated the 29th of January, 1902, giving the plaintiff liberty to amend the writ by adding the name of Hope as a defendant to the action, and to amend the statement of claim by claiming in the alternative against Hope the same sum as that claimed against the company, and in further alternative claiming the same sum against Hope by way of damages for breach of warranty of authority to order the work and materials, and the question of costs of and incident to the application was reserved. The writ and statement of claim were amended accordingly. The company put in an amended defence, alleging that Hope had no authority to employ the plaintiff. The defendant Hope, by his defence, denied that he was the agent of the company, and set up other defences identical with those set up by the company. At the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff against the defendant company; and thereupon the judge ordered that judgment be entered for the plaintiff against the company and for the defendant Hope, and also ordered that the defendant Hope should recover against the plaintiff costs, to be ascertained, and that the plaintiff should recover costs against the defendant company, to be taxed, and also the plaintiff's taxed costs occasioned by joining the defendant Hope, including the costs which the plaintiff was adjudged to pay to the defendant Hope.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge gave leave to the company to appeal from so much of the judgment as directed them to pay to the plaintiff costs incurred by joining the defendant Hope, including the costs which the plaintiff was ordered to pay to the defendant Hope. An appeal was accordingly brought, but to it the defendant Hope was not a party.

Ord. 65, r. 1, so far as material, is as follows: "Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or a judge . . . provided . . . that when any action . . . is tried with a jury the costs shall follow the event unless the judge by whom such action . . . is tried or the court shall for good cause otherwise order."

The Judicature Act of 1890, s. 5, provides as follows: "Subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts and the Rules of Court made thereunder . . . the costs of and incident to all proceedings of the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, and the court or judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid."

Ord. 16, r. 7, provides that "where a plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to redress he may . . . join two or more defendants to the intent that the question as to which (if any) of the two defendants is liable and to what extent may be determined as between all parties."

Manisty, K.C., and Shortt, for the appellants.—No doubt ord. 65, r. 1, gives the court a wide discretion as to costs, but this is not a case where a defendant was added to enable the court to do justice between the parties. Hope was merely added for the convenience of the plaintiff, in order that she might have two strings to her bow. If she had brought her action against Hope alone she could not have succeeded, and it is not just that she should be able to cast these costs upon the company. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—As to Hope being a proper party, ord. 16, r. 4, enables one to join as defendants all persons against whom a right to relief is alleged to exist in the alternative. A claim against an agent and a claim against a principal are quite inconsistent one with the other, but are they not both proper parties? Before the Judicature Act there was no power to try alternative causes of action—at least at common law. The result of order 16 is that you get power in one writ to insert two or more inconsistent alternative causes of action against two or more different persons, the object being to save expense. The term "proper party" is used in ord. 11, r. 1 (g), under which a person in England may be liable and also another person out of the jurisdiction, both being "proper parties."] [ROMER, L.J.—How can you say Hope was not a proper party in view of ord. 16, r. 7?] Absolute justice could have been done as between the plaintiff and the defendant company without joining Hope. Costs of this kind have always been recovered as damages, and if the plaintiff reclaims payment of Hope's costs as damages it must be on the ground that they were reasonably incurred by reason of the representation of the agent. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. D. 79, 36 W. R. Dig. 65.] These are not costs incurred by the plaintiff, but they are costs which the plaintiff has been ordered to pay. [ROMER, L.J.—If the plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs, are not the costs so paid costs incurred by her, the plaintiff?] The order joining Hope as defendant expressly provides for the costs being reserved. Green & Burbey v. Goodyear, reported in a note to The River Lagan, 6 Asp. M. L. C. 281, 36 W. R. Dig. 54, was the first case in which an unsuccessful defendant was ordered to pay a successful co-defendant's costs. [STIRLING, L.J., referred to Rudow v. Great Britain, &c., Assurance Co., 29 W. R. 585, 17 Ch. D. 600.] Unless there is a question to be decided as between two defendants there is no jurisdiction to make one pay the costs of the other.

They also cited the following cases: Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 Ex. D. 647; Child v. Stanning, 27 W. R. 462, 11 Ch. D. 82; The Mystery, 5 W. R. 414, [1902] P. 115; Shaw v. Smith, 35 W. R. 188, 18 Q. B. D. 193; In re Fisher, 42 W. R. 241, [1894] 1 Ch. 450; McCheane v. Gyles, [1902] 1 Ch. 911.

Scott-Fox, K.C., and Woodcock, for the plaintiff, the respondent.—Any person liable to be sued can be ordered to pay any other party's costs. Although the plaintiff might have applied under ord. 21, r. 9, that Hope should pay the costs, yet the plaintiff's only relevant allegation against him failed. He had not ordered the goods for himself. There is here one essential cause of action, which can be tried between all three parties. Hope was therefore a proper party to the action. If the appellants had objected, they might have appealed at the time. The judge had jurisdiction to order costs as to all parties.

They cited: Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway Co. v. Lefevre, 25 W. R. 310, 2 Ex. D. 301; Massey v. Heynes & Co., 36 W. R. 834, (1888) 21 Q. B. D. 330; Bostock v. Ramsay Urban District Council, 48 W. R. 254, [1900] 2 Q. B. 616; Bennetts & Co. v. McIlwraith & Co., 45 W. R. 17, [1896] 2 Q. B. 464.

Manisty, K.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30.—ROMER, L.J.—This action, seeking relief in the alternative against the two defendants, was rightly brought under ord. 16, r. 4—see Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway Co. v. Lefevre, and Bennetts & Co. v. McIlwraith & Co. The rule is a beneficial one, and a plaintiff who rightly brings such an action as the present ought not to be mulcted in costs by reason of his taking advantage of the rule in a proper case. Under the Judicature Act, 1890, s. 5, and ord. 65, r. 1, the court has full power over the costs of all parties of such an action. And, in my opinion, it has jurisdiction to order the plaintiff to pay the costs of the defendant against whom the action fails, and to add those costs to his own to be paid by the defendant against whom the action has succeeded, and whose conduct has necessitated the action. This jurisdiction has been frequently exercised in Chancery in proper cases, and can, of course, be exercised in the King's Bench Division. The costs so recovered over by the plaintiff are in no true sense damages, but are ordered to be paid by the unsuccessful defendant on the ground that in such an action as I am considering those costs have been reasonably and properly incurred by the plaintiff as between him and the last-named defendant. See, by way of illustration, Child v. Stenning, where it will be seen, on looking into the facts of that case, that Sir George Jessel, M.R., at p. 87 (11 Ch. D.), made exactly such an order as I have been indicating. The modern practice, in order to avoid circuity, has been, in such cases where there has been no jury, to order the unsuccessful defendant to pay directly to the successful defendant his costs—see Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society. But, of course, a judge has jurisdiction to follow the old practice if he thinks fit to do so, and ought to do so when necessary, as, for example, when, having regard to ord. 65, r. 1, difficulties would otherwise arise by reason of the trial being with a jury. I think, therefore, that in the present case Grantham, J., had jurisdiction to make the order he did. O:

course, in exercising the jurisdiction, a judge should have regard to the circumstances of the case, and be satisfied that it is just that the unsuccessful defendant should, either directly or indirectly, have to pay the costs of the successful defendant. In the present case I do not think that I myself should have given to the defendant Hope, having regard to his defences and conduct, any costs whatever, either as against the plaintiff or co-defendant. But I do not think it is open to the appellant on this appeal to go into the question whether the defendant Hope should have been paid his costs, for the following reasons: No doubt at the trial the plaintiff did not question Hope's right to costs. But the question as to costs was adjourned. At the adjournment Hope was not present, but the appellant company was present. If the company had taken the point that Hope ought not to have had his costs, Hope could have been brought before the court again and the matter been fully argued and decided. But the company did not raise the point, and I think the company and the plaintiff must be taken to have agreed that there was no "good cause" shown for depriving Hope of costs under ord. 65, r. 1. The only point argued by the company was that the court had no jurisdiction to add Hope's costs to the plaintiff's, and in that way order the company to pay them, and I think it is too late now for the company to argue that the defendant Hope never ought to have had his costs provided for as they have been. I think, moreover, that the leave to appeal was given on the question of jurisdiction only, and this view is borne out by the notice of appeal and by the fact that the defendant Hope is not before this court. And, lastly, with regard to the suggestion that the costs of Hope have been made to include costs of the issues on which he failed, I need only say that the taxation of those costs was in the presence of the company, and that it is too late now to question the amount taxed.

STIRLING, L.J., after stating the facts as above, continued: The first and most important question to be considered is whether the learned judge had jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. If the action had been tried by a judge without a jury the costs would have been entirely in the discretion of the judge, and he would have had power, in the exercise of his discretion, to order the defendant company first to pay to the plaintiff the costs occasioned to the plaintiff by joining Hope as a defendant, and secondly to pay to the defendant Hope his costs of the action. Inasmuch as the action was tried by a jury the costs of the defendant Hope had to follow the event, and the plaintiff having failed as against Hope, was bound to pay his costs unless the judge for good cause otherwise ordered. As the learned judge did not otherwise order it must be taken for the purpose of dealing with the question of jurisdiction that good cause did not exist. It must also be taken that the learned judge was of opinion that as between Hope and the defendant company the costs of the former ought to be borne by the latter, and the question is whether he had jurisdiction to give effect to this opinion by making the order which he did.

The defendant, Hope, was made a defendant under the powers conferred by ord. 16, rr. 7 and 11. Previously to the Judicature Act, 1873, there was no power to join two persons as defendants in this way either at law or in equity; but under the present rules it has been held that an action in such a form as the present is one capable of being maintained, and that any defendant to such an action is a proper party to it: see Honduras Co. v. Lefevre; Massey v. Haynes. Questions, however, of a similar kind to that now under consideration arose and had to be dealt with by the Court of Chancery prior to the Judicature Act, 1873; for it was the rule of that court that all persons materially interested in the subject-matter of the suit ought generally to be made parties as plaintiffs or defendants so that the court might be enabled to do complete justice by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested: see Mitford on Pleading, p. 164. Ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 37, directs that the rules, orders, and practice of any court whose jurisdiction has been transferred to the High Court of Justice relating to costs existing prior to the commencement of the Judicature Act, 1873, shall, so far as not inconsistent with the principal Act and the rules, remain in force and be applicable to costs of the same or analogous proceedings. The mode, therefore, in which the Court of Chancery dealt with the costs of defendants to chancery suits affords an analogy which, in my opinion, ought to guide the court on the present occasion.

Now, in suits where persons were made defendants for the purpose of complying with the rule just stated, the Court of Chancery had full jurisdiction when disposing of a suit on its merits to deal with the costs of such parties and to decide by whom they should be borne. If the court was of opinion that their costs ought to be borne by a co-defendant, the regular practice was to direct the plaintiff to pay them in the first instance and then to add them to his own and to have them over against the defendant who was to bear them: see for example Blenkinsop v. B., 12 Beav. 588. When, however, a suit was instituted by the Attorney-General ex officio the practice was different; for, as the Attorney-General could not be ordered to pay costs, costs were ordered to be paid directly by one defendant to another: see Attorney-General v. Corporation of Chester, 14 Beav. 338. After the Judicature Acts came into operation this practice was altered by the Court of Appeal in Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society, and it was laid down that the proper form of order was to order the defendant liable to costs as between himself and his co-defendant to pay them to the co-defendant. Sir G. Jessel, M.R., said that the machinery which had been adopted by the Court of Chancery was no longer either necessary or useful, but was mischievous. I understand this to mean that it was no longer necessary, because under the Judicature Acts and Rules the court had full power to order one defendant to pay costs to another, and that it was mischievous because the plaintiff, who was ordered to pay costs in the first instance and then to have them over against a defendant, ran the risk of losing them if the defendant proved to be insolvent. The change of practice appears to me, if I may be allowed to say so, to be perfectly proper, and I think that the new practice ought to be adhered to wherever it is practicable to do so.

It appears to me that this practice is not applicable to a case in which a judge holds that there is not good cause to deprive one defendant of costs against the plaintiff under the last clause of ord. 65, r. 1, and yet is of opinion that the costs so occasioned ought properly to be borne by another defendant. In that state of things it seems to me that for the attainment of justice recourse may and ought to be had to the old practice.

It is to be observed that when the Court of Chancery ordered the costs of one defendant to be paid by the plaintiff and added to his own, and the whole to be borne by another defendant, the court was not giving substantive relief by way of indemnity or damages or otherwise, but was simply exercising its jurisdiction over the costs of a pending suit. This particular form of order was, as Sir G. Jessel calls it, "machinery" for properly disposing of the costs, and this is shown by the change in the form of order when, as in the case of the Attorney-General being plaintiff, the plaintiff could not be ordered to pay costs. Having regard to this, and to the express directions of ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 37, I think that the term costs in section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, ought to be read as including costs which a particular party may be ordered to pay in the first instance and then to have over against another.

For these reasons I think that the learned judge had jurisdiction to make such an order as he has made.

It is said, however, that the learned judge did not properly exercise the jurisdiction. To this there appear to me to be two answers. In the first place it is well settled that the Court of Appeal will not review the discretion of the judge of first instance, even although he has given leave to appeal, unless there has been a disregard of principle or a misapprehension of facts: see In re Gilbert, 33 W. R. 832, 28 Ch. D. 549; Young v. Thomas, 40 W. R. 468, [1892] 2 Ch. 134. In the present case I am not satisfied of the existence of either. Secondly, the defendant Hope has not been made a party to the present appeal, and in his absence it appears to me to be impossible to do complete justice.

For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I concur in the judgment of my learned brethren because I think there is jurisdiction under the old Chancery practice for ordering recoupment of costs directed to be paid by another litigant. It may be necessary to exercise this jurisdiction in a case like the present, where there are claims against alternative defendants, and the issues are tried by a jury. But generally I think that under the Judicature Act this jurisdiction should only be exercised in exceptional cases; and in the present case I cannot help doubting whether the learned judge had present to his mind either the question whether he ought to deprive Hope of costs, or whether, as between Hope and the theatre company, the company ought to pay Hope's costs, or whether the defence and conduct of the company was not reasonable and proper having regard to the statements made to the company by Hope, their architect. The result does not seem to me very satisfactory, but I suppose it cannot be helped.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, J. E. & H. Scott, for W. Charton, Blyth; Gibson & Weldon, for Hannay & Hannay, South Shields.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — July 21, 23, 1903.

DE HART v. COMPANIA ANONIMA DE SEGUROS AURORA. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Time policy—General average—Contract of affreightment—Foreign statement—Belgian law.

A shipowner effected with underwriters a time policy of insurance on his ship containing the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment." The shipowner sub-chartered the ship to third parties, and by the terms of that charter-party it was provided that the ship might carry a deck-load of timber, and that "in case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, except that jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average." The ship sailed for Antwerp, and in the course of the voyage it became necessary for the steamer's safety to jettison part of the deck cargo. The average statement was made up at Antwerp, and included jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon. The shipowner paid the ship's contribution to general average. In an action by the shipowner to recover from the underwriters the amount of his contribution,

Held, applying the principle laid down in Harris v. Scaramanga, 20 W. R. 777, that the parties having agreed that general average should be payable according to the foreign statement if so made up, and the terms of the contract of affreightment not being of a special and unusual character, which could not have been contemplated by the parties to the policy of insurance, the underwriters were liable to pay the shipowner the amount of his contribution, notwithstanding that, apart from the express agreement in the contract of affreightment, the Belgian law would not recognize jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon as being the subject of a claim for general average.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (51 W. R. 318, [1901] 1 K. B. 109), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kennedy, J. (reported 51 W. R. 318, [1903] 1 K. B. 109).

The action was brought by shipowners against underwriters on two policies of insurance on the steamship Henriette H.

The two policies were dated the 31st of August, 1900, and the 28th of September, 1900, respectively. They were for twelve months, and both contained the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment."

Attached to the policies were the Institute Time Clauses, 1900, including the following clause: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment."

By a charter-party dated the 11th of October, 1900, made between the plaintiff as shipowner and Bears, Dunwody, & Co. as charterers, it was agreed that the Henriette H. should carry a cargo of wood, and if the master required it a deck-load from Pensacola to Antwerp.

The charter-party contained the following clause: "In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1900, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average."

The vessel sailed from Pensacola with a deck-load of timber, which was customary. During the voyage part of the deck-load was jettisoned for the safety of ship and cargo.

The vessel reached Antwerp and there delivered the remaining cargo. An average adjustment made at that port included the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon as the subject of general average. The plaintiff, having paid the ship's contribution to general average, claimed to be indemnified by the underwriters. It was admitted that by the Belgian law the jettison of the deck cargo and the freight thereon would not give rise to a claim for general average apart from express provision in the charter-party.

Kennedy, J., held that the underwriters were liable.

The defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following is a translation of the material articles of the Belgian Code of Maritime Commerce:

Art. 100.—Failing special agreements between all parties concerned, average losses are settled according to the following regulations.

Art. 109.—Goods carried on the ship's upper deck contribute if saved. If they are jettisoned or damaged by jettisoning, the owner has no claim to contribution. He can only make use of his rights against the master.

Art. 118.—The statement of losses and damages is made up by experts (average staters) in the place where the ship is discharged at the instigation of the commander. The experts are nominated by the Tribunal of Commerce if the discharge takes place in a Belgian port.

Art. 119.—The specialists nominated in accordance with the preceding article apportion the losses and damages. The apportionment becomes legally binding on approval by the tribunal.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the appellants.—The foreign law is that which governs the general law of average, and the adjustment is not intended to be conclusive unless made in conformity with the foreign law. In the present case the foreign statement was to be binding on the defendants in accordance with the Belgian code, the provisions of which the defendants could ascertain. But they ought not to be made liable under special provisions contained in a contract to which they were not parties.

They referred to Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 758, L. R. 10 C. P. 414; Hendricks v. Australasian Insurance Co., 22 W. R. 947, L. R. 9 C. P. 460; Harris v. Scaramanga, 20 W. R. 777, L. R. 7 C. P. 481; The Brigella, [1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 192; Dickenson v. Jardine, 16 W. R. 1169, L. R. 3 C. P. 639; and Montgomery & Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Co. (Limited), 50 W. R. 440, [1902] 1 K. B. 734.

Carver, K.C., and De Hart, for the respondent, referred to Strang, Steel, & Co. v. A. Scott & Co., 38 W. R. 452, 14 A. C. 801, and Harris v. Scaramanga. [They were stopped by the Court.]

Atkin replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff, who is a shipowner, effected with the defendant company, who are underwriters, a time policy of insurance upon his ship containing the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment." The plaintiff sub-chartered the ship to third persons, and by the terms of that charter-party it was provided that the ship might carry a deck-load of timber; and that "in case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, except that jettison of deck cargo (and the freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average." The ship sailed for Antwerp with a deck-load, and in the course of the voyage and during the currency of the policy she suffered damage, so that it became necessary for the steamer's safety, in consequence of perils insured against, to jettison part of the deck cargo. On her arrival at Antwerp an average statement was then made up, and the average stater, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, included the jettison of deck cargo in general average. Then there were some admissions between the parties, and there were also letters which passed between the solicitors as to the Belgian law. I may as well read one letter in full, as it is very short: "We are in receipt your letter, dated the 24th inst., and are prepared to admit that a foreign general average statement was prepared, and that by it the deck cargo jettisoned and the freight thereon were, as required by the contract of affreightment, treated as general average subject to your admitting that, apart from the condition in the charter-party, such loss would not have been so treated, as it is not, in accordance either with York-Antwerp Rules or Belgian law, the subject of general average." Now, that being the nature of the action, what Kennedy, J., decided was this: He decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the average statement as made up was in accordance with the Belgian law, because the Belgian law recognizes in regard to general average the terms of any special contract of affreightment that the parties—meaning there the parties to the sub-charter, the contract of affreightment referred to really in the policy—may have chosen to make. Kennedy, J., takes notice also of another contention that had been made on behalf of the plaintiff, which contention was to the effect that, having regard to the judgment of Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., in Harris v. Scaramanga, these words in the policy of insurance, "general average payable according to foreign statement if so made up," were words which bound the underwriters, whether the foreign statement was made in accordance with the Belgian law as proved, or whether it was not. But, having noticed it, Kennedy, J., says that it is unnecessary for him to decide whether or not that assumption or that statement of law by Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., was correctly made or not. Now, that being the state of things, we have to consider whether the judgment of Kennedy, J., is right. I am not at all prepared to say that Kennedy, J.'s, judgment may not be supported upon the ground upon which he has put it himself. A passage from the foreign code was read to us, and it would appear from that passage that, according to Belgian law, if there is a special contract as between the parties who are primarily interested in the law of contribution—that is, the shipowner and the cargo owner—effect is given to that special bargain in making up the foreign statement. It is also said, with regard to the particular provision of Belgian law that a deck cargo does not come within the rules as to contribution, that that rule is subject to the special agreement of the parties to the contract of affreightment. Speaking for myself, I always have some doubt as to whether foreign codes are by themselves admissible as evidence of foreign law. I have always thought that the practice was not to give effect to a foreign code unless the court had a foreign expert present to construe the foreign code and to inform the court, or to assist the court, not so much in construing the foreign code, but in the conclusion of fact that would have to be arrived at in the English courts as to what was the foreign law. That would be done by informing the court what has been recognized by the law in the foreign country. I do not think that it is part of the duty of English judges to take a foreign code and, unassisted by a foreign expert, to construe that foreign code, because that is to make the question of the foreign law a question of law and not a question of fact. I always understood that it was a question of fact and not a question of law, and for that, amongst other reasons, I prefer myself to look and to inquire and see whether the judgment of Kennedy, J., can be supported upon other grounds. Now, in the first place, I am myself disposed to support it upon the passage in the judgments of Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., in Harris v. Scaramanga. In Harris v. Scaramanga the statement, so far as it is material to the particular part of this paragraph in the policy that I am referring to, was almost identical with the paragraph here, because the paragraph in Harris v. Scaramanga was "to pay general average as per foreign statement, if so made up," and upon p. 489 of L. R. 7 C. P., Bovill, C.J., first says this: "It seems to me that the general effect of the memorandum is to make the underwriters liable as for general average for whatever the owners of the goods might be called upon to pay on that account by the foreign statement of adjustment. This memorandum"—that is, the memorandum of the foreign statement, if so made up—"was probably introduced in order to avoid all questions, not only as to the propriety of particular items being treated as the subjects of general average, but also as to the correctness of the apportionment; and I find it difficult to place any other reasonable construction upon the terms of the policy and memorandum." Then he deals with the question of the law of England and the law of Bremen, and goes on: "It seems to me, however, that under the terms of this policy the underwriters and the assured have both agreed to accept the adjustment and statement of the average stater in the foreign port, if and when made, as conclusive between them, both in principle and in details, as to the loss which the underwriters are to take in respect of general average, subject to the exception of any matters, such as capture or seizure, which are excluded by the express terms of the policy." And then, on the top of p. 490, he says: "It seems to me that, by the express agreement of the parties contained in the memorandum, it is not open to us to determine it"—that is, the question whether the claim was to be determined by the English court or by the statement of the foreign average stater at Bremen—"and that we have only to see whether the foreign adjustment which gives rise to this claim has been in fact made or not. Has there, then, been such a statement of general average made in Bremen with respect to the amount now claimed? And how does the matter stand upon the facts as stated in the special case?" I think myself that, so far from there being anything inconsistent with mercantile usage and mercantile convenience in so reading this statement appearing in this policy, and which has appeared in hundreds of policies before, being a very usual clause, I think it is in accordance with mercantile convenience. The parties primarily interested in the adjustment for the purpose of carrying into effect the rights to contribution based upon the law of general average may conveniently be left to deal with questions of contribution both in their contracts of affreightment and in other respects. If adjustment has to be effected in a foreign port, it seems to me obviously convenient that there should be an express provision that the underwriters in such a case shall stand in the shoes of the parties primarily liable. In my view of the law it is perfectly plain that in the absence of any special provision such would be the law. You would not require any special clause to say this; it would be the law without a special clause. Then in this particular clause are the words following: "If so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment." It is said that the effect of those latter words is that the only case in which the shipowner is to be entitled to affect the matter of contribution by the contract of affreightment is in case he adopts the York-Antwerp Rules without any qualifications. And it is said that the result of that is that in this case the court ought to apply the Belgian law here, and to give no effect whatsoever to the York-Antwerp Rules as qualified by the words of exception; and that that means that the court ought to go back to the simple Belgian law unqualified by this special bargain. I cannot so read these words. I think that there is nothing—at all events in these words—which in the slightest degree prevents us from applying the rule laid down by Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., in Harris v. Scaramanga. Taking this view of the case, it seems to me unnecessary to consider the other questions that have been raised in this case. The ground of my decision is simply that I apply here the rule laid down by Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., in Harris v. Scaramanga; and, applying that rule, I think that the underwriters here are bound by the foreign statement so made up. It was said in this case, in addition, that we ought not to come to this conclusion for the reason of several passages which were read to us, one from the case of Mavro v. Ocean Marine Insurance Co. in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., where he says: "The only sensible construction appears to be this: the underwriter is only to be liable for a general average, but what is general average is to be determined by the law of the foreign place to which the ship is bound." I quite agree, but that only means in the absence of a special bargain; and in my judgment in this particular case there was a special bargain, if this contract is properly construed, whereby the underwriters agreed to accept the average statement abroad, if so made up, as binding upon all parties. I think, therefore, the judgment of Kennedy, J., must be affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. It is admitted by the appellants' counsel in the case before us that with regard to the clauses of the policy of insurance which are material, the general average was not to be made up according to the York-Antwerp Rules inasmuch, as having regard to the special terms of the contract of affreightment here, which purported to incorporate these clauses with some exceptions, it could not be said that in the meaning of this policy of insurance the general average could be provided by the contract of affreightment to be per York-Antwerp Rules; the appellants' counsel rested their contention accordingly on this: They said that the general average ought to have been made payable according to foreign statement, whatever that term "foreign statement" may have meant in this policy of insurance. Now, there are two clauses in the policy of insurance dealing with the same subject-matter. They only differ in this, that in the clause in the body of the policy the words are "general average payable according to foreign statement if so made up," and the words "if so made up" are omitted from the corresponding clause in what are called the Institute Time Clauses, 1900. But it is clear to my mind that the two clauses must be read together; and I have no hesitation, therefore, in coming to the conclusion that in this policy the foreign statement which is meant is the foreign statement if so made up. Now, I think that, by agreeing that general average shall be payable according to foreign statement if so made up, the parties have in effect agreed to be bound by the foreign statement if so made up as it exists in fact, only subject to two observations which I am about to make. In the first place, I think in order to bind the parties that the statement so made up must have been made up in good faith. It is not challenged here by the appellants that the statement has not been made up in good faith. Moreover, I should like to make a reservation for further consideration if the case I am about to mention should hereafter arise—that is to say, if the statement be made up according, say, to the law of the port which recognised the special terms of the contract of affreightment. I doubt if the parties to the policy of insurance in a case like the present would be bound by the statement if the contract of affreightment imported terms as to general average of a special and unusual character, which could not reasonably have been contemplated by the parties to the policy of insurance. If such a case arises I should like to further consider it; but such a case does not arise here. I may point out that jettison of deck cargoes is in many cases allowable as general average—for example, by English law in the case of voyages where deck cargo is permitted by the established custom of navigation. And I may point out that in the present case the voyage was one where deck cargo was so permitted, and in the present case, therefore, it could not be said that the contract of affreightment so far as it referred to deck cargoes was of so special or unusual a character as to be outside the reasonable contemplation of the parties to the policy of insurance. In the present case, therefore, I have no hesitation in saying for myself that I think the parties are bound by the statement, which was, in fact, made up at Antwerp, and which decides to my mind the rights of the parties. I agree, therefore, in thinking that the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. For myself I agree with the reasoning of Kennedy, J. The appellants invite us to deal with the present case reading as applicable thereto the words "general average payable according to foreign statement if so made up" as meaning a statement made up in conformity with foreign law. Now, the statement was made up at Antwerp, which was the proper place for making it up, and what is sued for in the present case is the contribution as defined by that foreign statement. But it is said that that statement was not in accordance with the general law of Belgium, and that these words which I have already read ought to be treated as meaning that the general average is to be payable according to the general law of the country where it is made up, and not in accordance with any specific agreement which may be made between the parties, even if such could be recognized by the law. Now, I am unable for myself to construe these words as referring to the general law of the country. It seems to me that to do so is to give no effect to the words "if so made up." By those words I think the parties meant in some sense or other to bind themselves to a statement actually made up in the foreign country. And the utmost, it seems to me, that could be introduced as qualification would be that, if it is not the actual statement made up by the average adjuster holding the official position there, it should be in accordance with the law of that country, so as to be valid and binding in that country when made. Now, I understand it to be conceded by both the learned counsel for the appellants that, in point of fact, the law of Belgium did recognize the existence of special agreements, and did give effect to them in respect of any contract which they might contain with respect to general average. For these reasons, which are those of Kennedy, J., I should be prepared to follow his decision. I also agree with the view which has been expressed by my brethren, if that be not the case, as to the effect which ought to be given to the clause.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the respondent, Stibbard, Gibson, & Co., for Gibson, Pybus, & Pybus, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) July 21, 1901.

CUNARD STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. MARTEN. (a.)

Marine insurance—Subject-matter of insurance—Shipowner's liability to cargo-owner—Suing and labouring clause—Applicability.

A shipowner agreed to convey to South Africa a number of mules, valued at £40,000. There was no clause in the contract exempting him from liability for loss occasioned by the negligence of his servants. He accordingly effected an insurance with an underwriter at Lloyd's to protect himself against "liability of any kind" to the owners of the mules up to £20,000. The policy was in the printed form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy, and contained the usual suing and labouring clause. During the voyage the vessel stranded through the negligence of the shipowner's servants, and expenses were incurred by the shipowner in salving the mules. The shipowner therefore sought to recover the expenses thus incurred under the suing and labouring clause.

Held, that the suing and labouring clause was inapplicable, and was never intended to apply.

Judgment of Walton, J. (reported [1902] 2 K. B. 624), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Walton, J. (reported [1902] 2 K. B. 624).

The facts were as follows; In 1900 the Cunard Steamship Co., the plaintiffs in this action, entered into a contract with the Admiralty Director of Transports for the conveyance of mules from New Orleans to Cape Town. The contract contained no negligence clause—that is to say, no clause exempting the company from liability for loss of the mules by the negligence of their servants. Accordingly the plaintiffs effected an insurance with the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, to protect them against "liability of any kind" to the owners of the mules up to £20,000. The policy was in the printed form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy, and contained the usual suing and labouring clause—viz., "and in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandizes and ship, &c., or any part thereof, without prejudice to this assurance; to the charges whereof we, the assurers, will contribute each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured."

The ship Carinthia sailed from New Orleans on the 11th of May, 1900, with the mules (about 1,500) on board. The value of the mules was about £40,000.

On the 15th of May, through the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants navigating the vessel, The Carinthia stranded near Gravois Point, in Hayti. Efforts were made to tow the vessel off the rocks, but were unsuccessful, and she eventually broke up. Between 900 and 1,000 of the mules were saved and sent on to Cape Town.

The plaintiffs thereupon sought to recover the expenses incurred in saving some of the mules and in attempting to save the others which were lost, not as a direct loss under the policy, but under the suing and labouring clause as expenses incurred to avert or reduce the amount of the loss. The amount claimed was £7,744.

Walton, J., held that the suing and labouring clause was inapplicable, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. In concluding his judgment the learned judge said: "I fully recognize that a suing and labouring clause might be framed which would be appropriate to such an insurance as was effected in the present case. But, in my judgment, any attempt to apply to the insurance in question a clause which was framed and intended to apply to an insurance of a different kind would work injustice. . . . I think that the suing and labouring clause in this policy, like many other parts of the policy, is inapplicable to the insurance actually effected, and was no part of the contract."

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Pickford, K.C., and Loehnis, for the appellants.—If no steps had been taken to save the mules, and they had all been lost, the defendants would have had to pay £20,000. The suing and labouring clause, the intention of which is to provide for the taking of extraordinary steps by the shipowner, has always been deemed most applicable to cases of negligence. Here the appellants have sued and laboured for the purpose of warding off a loss which must otherwise have fallen on the respondents.

They referred to Xenas v. Fox, (1869) L. R. 4 C. P. 665; Cary v. Burr, 8 App. Cas. 393; Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Co., L. R. 1 C. P. 535; Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 354, 2 B. & S. 814.

Carver, K.C., and F. D. Mackinnon, for the respondents, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must fail, and that the judgment of Walton, J., was right. Now I start with one common proposition in this case, and that is this—that everyone is agreed that whatever is the subject of this policy it is quite plain that the mules are not. When we look to see what the subject of the policy is, we find it is "To cover shipowner's liability of any kind to owners of mules and for cargo up to £20,000 owing to the omission of the negligence clause in contract and for charter-party and for bill of lading." I understand that it is because the appellants feel the impossibility of recovering the expenses which were incurred in salving these mules as a direct loss under this policy that they are obliged to have recourse to the suing and labouring clause. That clause runs as follows: [His lordship read the clause.] Now, as is pointed out by Walton, J., in his judgment, primâ facie those words "said goods and merchandizes" have no application to the subject-matter of this policy. It cannot be contended that they have. But, it is said, although the mules are not the subject-matter of this policy, yet if you salve the mules you really avert a liability to the owner of the mules, and, as that is so, the suing and labouring clause does apply. I do not think myself that one ought to strain the words of this policy in this case to make them apply to this subject-matter. My own view is that the parties really never could have intended it. In this particular case the value of the mules was £40,000 and the amount insured to cover this liability was £20,000, and in case the expenses thus incurred had amounted to the whole £20 000 the assured would have been entitled, if this argument is right, to recover in respect of the whole of this loss although his insurance was an insurance for only half the value of the mules. Really, although in this case both sides are agreed this is not an insurance on the mules, we are being invited to apply the suing and labouring clause just as if it was. I think that it is unnecessary to go any further into the matter. I can only say that I adopt in full the reasoning of Walton, J., and I feel that he has put it in a way that it is quite impossible for me to improve upon.

ROMER, L.J.—I also do not see my way to differ in his case from Walton, J. The point involved is a very short one, and I can state my reasons for my opinion very shortly too. It is insisted on behalf of the appellants, and it is part of their case, that this policy of insurance is not one upon mules or goods or ship at all. It is what it purports to be, solely an insurance to cover shipowners' liability of any kind, mules or cargo, up to £20,000 owing to the omission of the negligence clause. Now, that is the only subject of insurance, and it is put on a policy which in the printed part applies to a policy of insurance on ship and goods and cargo. Naturally enough you find that most, if not all, of the printed matter has little or no application to the precise risk insured against, but it is said that one of the printed clauses can be pulled out as it were from the others and made applicable, and that clause is what is commonly called the suing and labouring clause. How does it run? [His lordship read the clause.] It refers to "said goods and merchandizes and ship," and admittedly to my mind this is a policy of insurance not on any goods or merchandizes or ship at all. Of course I should apply that clause if I could do so reasonably to the present case, but it simply appears to me, putting it shortly, that you cannot reasonably apply it. The clause never was intended to apply to any such subject of insurance; it was intended to apply, on the very face of it, to my mind, to an insurance on goods, merchandizes, and ship.

STIRLING, L.J.—I concur, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, & Co., Liverpool; Parker, Garrett, & Co

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — July 15, 1903.

"THE TORBRYAN." (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading — Charter-party — Exceptions — Accident caused by negligence of servants of shipowner —Use of reckless means of unloading by stevedore's men.

A cargo of sugar in bags was shipped under a bill of lading which incorporated a charter-party containing, inter alia, the following exceptions—viz., perils of the seas, barratry, collisions, stranding, and all other accidents, even though caused by the negligence of the shipowners' servants. The cargo was discharged into lighters by stevedores employed by the ship. The stevedores' men, in order to facilitate the unloading, recklessly made use of large hooks, whereby some of the bags were torn and sugar was spilt and lost.

Held, that the loss of the sugar was due to an accident within the meaning of the exemption clause.

Judgment of Phillimore, J., [1903] P. 35, affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Phillimore, J., on the trial of an action in the Admiralty Division, reported [1903] P. 35, 51 W. R. Dig. 147.

The action was brought by shippers of goods under a bill of lading against shipowners for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs shipped on board the defendants' steamship The Torbryan, at Dunkirk, 796 tons of sugar in bags for delivery in London. The bill of lading under which the sugar was shipped incorporated a charter-party in the French language which contained a negligence clause of which the following was an agreed translation: "Act of God, fire, perils of the seas, barratry on the part of the captain or crew, enemies, pirates or robbers, strikes, arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples, collisions, stranding, and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors or other servants of the owner, in the management or navigation of the vessel or otherwise."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vessel proceeded to the port of London, where her cargo was discharged into lighters by stevedores employed by the ship.

The plaintiffs complained that in the course of being discharged the cargo was roughly handled, and in particular that by the reckless use of large "can" hooks the bags were so torn that quantities of sugar were spilt and lost, and that a further spilling of sugar was caused by the bags being cut by the slings, and by the bursting of the seams of the bags in consequence of their being struck against the hatch-coamings in the process of being lifted out of the hold. They further complained that the stevedores persisted in the improper use of hooks after being warned by the agents of the consignees.

The plaintiffs claimed £158 2s. 8d. in respect of sugar lost, and £7 19s. 5d. the cost of repairing the bags.

The defendants contended that the loss in respect of which the plaintiffs sued was due to accident caused by the negligence of the owners' servants otherwise than in the management or navigation of the vessel, and that they were therefore relieved from liability by the negligence clause.

At the trial Phillimore, J., held that the damage was due to accident caused by the negligence of the owners' servants, and that the word "otherwise" in the negligence clause referred to the receiving and delivery of the cargo. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Scrutton, K.C., and Balloch, for the appellants.—The use of the large "can" hooks was wrongful, and it was persisted in after warning. The damage was the inevitable consequence of the wrongful act, and was not accidental. "Accident" involves the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected: Hamilton v. Pandorf, 36 W. R. 369, 12 App. Cas. 518; Fenwick v. Schmalz, L. R. 3 C. P. 313.

Carver, K.C., and A. E. Nelson, for the respondents.—This was an accidental loss. The hooks were used, not with the intention of tearing the bags, but for the purpose of effecting quick despatch. In each case in which a bag was torn it was an accident.

They referred to Baerselman v. Bailey, 43 W. R. 593, [1895] 2 Q. B. 301; The Cressington, [1891] P. 152; and The Xantho, 36 W. R. 353, 12 App. Cas. 503.

COLLINS, M.R.—The point in this case is whether in the circumstances shipowners are protected from liability by a clause in a charter-party which runs as follows: "Act of God, fire, perils of the seas, barratry on the part of the captain or crew, enemies, pirates or robbers, strikes, arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples, collisions, stranding, and all other accidents excepted, even though caused by negligence, fault or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owner in the management or navigation of the vessel or otherwise." What happened was that, in the process of unloading a cargo of sugar in bags, the stevedores' men recklessly used large hooks, called can hooks, for the purpose of facilitating the discharge. It was probable that this would result in some of the bags giving way and in damage being done to the sugar. The cargo owners made remonstrances, but the stevedores' men persisted in using the hooks, and damage in fact resulted. The point is whether damage so arising is damage covered by the clause which I have read. I agree with Phillimore, J., in thinking that it does come within that part of the clause which begins "all other accidents excepted." I can only arrive at the meaning of the word "accidents" by looking at the context. This is a contract between a shipowner and a cargo owner, and it provides that the shipowner is to be excused from liability in the event of any of a number of possible occurrences, including barratry, all of which are swept into the category of "accidents." Looking at the matter from this point of view, it was an accident to the shipowner, a fortuitous and unexpected occurrence, that the persons engaged in unloading the cargo should use reckless means for carrying out their work, though from another point of view it may not have been an accident. Even if there had been something more than recklessness, I think that from this point of view it might have been an accident. I am therefore of opinion that the case comes within the clause and that the judgment of the learned judge was right.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lowless & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. — June 12, 17, 1903.

PUNT v. SYMONS & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Articles of association—Contract by company not to alter articles of association—Shares issued not bonâ fide*—Control of voting—Companies Act,* 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 50.

A company cannot validly by contract deprive itself of its statutory right under section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), to alter its articles of association.

Where directors issue shares not bonâ fide for the advantage of the company, but for the purpose of altering the voting power of the company and of controlling the holders of the greater number of shares, an injunction will be granted for the purpose of restraining them from employing the votes of the shareholders so created for such purpose.

The principle in Fraser v. Whalley, 2 H. & M. 10, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42, applied.

Motion.

This was a motion for an injunction by the executors and trustees of the will of G. G. Symons, deceased, for an injunction to restrain the defendant company, its directors, secretary, and agents from convening and holding an extraordinary meeting intended to be held with a view of altering certain of the company's articles of association.

The facts of the case were as follow: The company was incorporated on the 17th of October, 1898, for the purpose of taking over a business previously carried on by the said G. G. Symons.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By clauses A and B of the memorandum of association it was stated that the company was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring and taking over as a going concern the said business; and, secondly, "To adopt and carry into effect, with or without modifications, the agreements referred to in clause 3 of the company's articles of association."

On the 27th of October, 1898, an agreement was entered into under which the company acquired the business, and by clause 6 of that agreement it was provided: "The company shall not at any time alter or attempt to alter the clause relating to the appointment of the vendor as governing director as originally framed, or do or suffer anything to be done in contravention of the powers contained in these clauses."

Article 94 provided that "Symons should be the governing director until he resigned office or died, and that while he retained the said office he should have authority to exercise all the powers and authorities vested in the directors, and that the other directors should conform to his directions."

Article 95 provided that he might at any time appoint, limit the powers of, and remove any directors.

Article 96 provided that if Symons should resign his governing directorship he should become an ordinary director.

Article 97 provided: "If the said G. G. Symons dies whilst he holds the office of governing director the trustees for the time being of his will, so long as £2,000 of the share capital stands in his name, or in the name of such trustees, may execute the powers vested in the said G. G. Symons by clause 95 hereof."

The capital of the company was £11,000, of which £8,300 in shares was held by Symons.

Symons died on the 10th of November, 1900, having by his will, dated the 21st of March, 1894, appointed the applicants, Punt and Robertson, executors and trustees thereof, and having given £6,300 of his share capital to his said trustees upon certain trusts for his wife and children as therein mentioned.

During all this time there were only seven shareholders, and four of these held only one share each.

During the testator's life the business was prosperous, but after his death it declined, and friction arose between the trustees of the will and some other members of the company.

On the 7th of May, 1903, the directors of the company issued eleven shares to five new shareholders, and passed a special resolution so as to alter the articles for the purpose of depriving the applicants of the powers vested in them as Symons' trustees.

The directors then caused an extraordinary general meeting to be summoned for the purpose of confirming the resolution, whereupon the trustees of Symons' will commenced the present proceedings.

The applicants, in their affidavit, declared that in their opinion the new shareholders had been created to pass the resolution. The circumstances of the company are more fully explained in the judgment.

Levett, K.C., and J. B. Matthews, for the applicants.—If the special resolution is carried it will be in contravention of the contract with Symons. A company cannot alter its articles when the effect of so doing will be to break its contract. The adoption of the agreement was an essential part of the object of the company as contemplated by Symons, and as defined in the memorandum of association. Its alteration is therefore ultra vires. The directors had no right to issue fresh shares to increase their voting power or for other private reasons.

They referred to Walker v. London Tramways Co., 28 W. R. 163, 12 Ch. D. 705; Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., 45 W. R. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 361; Greenwood v. Leather Shod Wheel Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 421, 48 W. R. Ch. Dig. 35.

Norton, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the company.—The company has no power to contract itself out of section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862. To hold to the contrary would be to increase the evils of one-man companies. Clause 6 came to an end with Symons' death. In Walker v. London Tramways Co. it was never suggested that a company can contract not to alter its articles. The directors have a control over the issue and transfer of shares, and no injunction can be granted against them in respect thereto.

They referred to Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa (Limited), 48 W. R. 452, [1900] 1 Ch. 656; and In re The Ladies Dress' Association (Limited) (an unreported case summarized in the judgment).

Levett, K.C., in reply.—Symons' estate is as much entitled to the benefit of clause 6 as himself.

BYRNE, J.—This is a motion in effect to restrain the holding of a confirmatory meeting for the purpose of passing a special resolution for altering the articles of association.

The short facts are as follows: In October, 1898, the company was incorporated for the purpose of carrying on a business formerly carried on by Mr. Symons, who is dead, and by clauses A and B of the memorandum of association it is stated that the objects for which the company was established are to acquire and take over as a going concern and to carry on a certain business; and, secondly, "to adopt and carry into effect, with or without modifications, the agreement referred to in clause 3 of the company's articles of association." On the 29th of October, 1898, an agreement was entered into under which the company acquired the business, and by that agreement by clause 6 it was provided that "the company shall not at any time alter or attempt to alter the clauses of the articles of association relating to the appointment of the vendor as governing director as originally framed, or do or suffer anything to be done in contravention of the powers contained in those clauses." Those clauses I shall have to refer to later on. Now during the lifetime of the testator the share-holding was in this way: The testator himself held 8,300 shares out of 9,377. Mr. G. R. Symons held 536, and Mr. John Jay 537. There were four other shareholders holding one share each, so that the total share-holding was in the hands of seven members. The business was carried on, and carried on successfully, till the testator died in November, 1900, shortly after making his will. As a result of the effect of his will the share-holding in the company came to be as follows: Robert Robertson and John Punt, the plaintiff, as executors and trustees of the testator, became the holders of 6,300 shares, G. R. Symons continued the holder of 536 shares, J. Jay became the holder, partly in consequence of the testator's will, of 2,537 shares, and the remaining four shares remained as they were, J. Punt holding one share in his own right, Mr. Marshall one and Mr. Chapman one, P. Phass one share—total holding 9,377 shares. In that state of circumstances the business during the last year, the year ending, I think, last December, ceased to be profitable—that is to say, during this year only £2 was left to be carried over by way of profit after satisfying the remuneration of Symons and Jay, who are directors of the company, and who are appointed by the trustees of the testator's will under their powers managing directors of the company under an agreement for five years, subject to determination at six months' notice. Now, the way they were remunerated was by a commission on sales, moneys raised for customers, and by a certain salary; the sales in the last year were for as large an amount as in the previous year, but the profits made by the company were not as large in consequence of circumstances as to which I will only say at present that the charge of fraudulent dealing on the part of the managing director is not made out. It would be wrong to say anything more than that on the present occasion except that it is rather an unfortunate way of remunerating managing directors that they get their commission on given sales irrespective of the profits.

That being the state of circumstances, and very considerable friction having arisen between the trustees of the will, particularly Mr. Punt, who is a son-in-law of the testator, and Mr. G. R. Symons, one of the managing directors, disputes arose and a correspondence took place which I will not go into. The correspondence was very properly not referred to, although there was a correspondence between the solicitors, and while that correspondence was going on on the 7th of May the directors issued eleven shares in the company. I may say that under the articles they had power to issue the remaining shares of the company and there was no express limitation of their power with reference to such issue. They issued five shares to Mrs. Emily J. Symons, who is the wife of Mr. G. R. Symons, the managing director; to Mr. R. H. Symons, one share; to Mr. Guntway two shares; Mr. Gladstone Hammond two shares; and Mr. T. W. Rose one share; making altogether eleven shares and five new shareholders. Now, under the powers of the articles a poll cannot be demanded except by five members, and it is obvious when the share-holding is in the hands of the seven shareholders, there being one adherent to the plaintiffs, Mr. Punt holding one share in his own right, there were three persons in the one camp, while there were four persons in the other camp. Now the result of the issue of these additional shares was to make the number of shareholders such as that a majority for the purpose of passing a special resolution could be obtained by the adherence of the majority holding shares in the company, and accordingly, after the issue of these shares—that was on the 7th of May—on the 12th of May notice of a meeting was sent out for the purpose of altering the articles of association; and without going through all the alterations that were proposed to be effected, I will refer to the substantial articles, as to which the complaint really arises. Under article 94 it was provided that "George Green Symons," he was the founder of the company, the testator, "shall be the governing director of the company until he resigns the office or dies, and whilst he retains the said office he shall have authority to exercise all the powers, authorities, and discretions by these presents expressed to be vested in the directors generally, and all the other directors, if any, for the time being of the company shall be under his control and shall be bound to conform to his decisions in regard to the company's business, and the said G. G. Symons shall be paid out of the funds of the company as remuneration for his services as managing director the sum of £300 per annum." Then 95 is "The said G. G. Symons whilst he holds the office of governing director may from time to time and at any time appoint any other persons to be directors of the company, and may define, limit, and restrict their powers and may fix and determine their remuneration and duties and may at any time remove any director however appointed, and may at any time convene a general meeting of the company. Every such appointment or removal must be in writing under the hand of the person making the same." Then 96 is "If the said G. G. Symons shall resign the office of governing director he shall become an ordinary director." Then 97 runs "If the said G. G. Symons dies whilst he holds the office of governing director, the trustees for the time being of his will so long as £2,000 of the share capital stands in his name or in the names of such trustees may exercise the powers vested in the said G. G. Symons by clause 95 hereof." Now, G. G. Symons being dead, of course the powers, so far as he is concerned, are gone, and the real materiality of the proposed alteration is that the powers given by article 97 to the trustees for the time being holding £2,000 of the share capital would be done away with. What the result of doing away with them would be is another question. At all events, what was proposed to be done was to take away from the trustees of the testator's will a power which, on the face of the article, they possessed.

Now, the meeting was accordingly held, and, as might be expected, nine voted in favour of the resolution—namely, the managing director and the new shareholders to whom a few days before shares had been issued. These were thus against the old party, whose forces had not been augmented by the directors in the exercise of their powers. The old party being only three shareholders, notwithstanding they had very much the largest holding of shares in the company, could not demand a poll. The result was that at that meeting there was the exact statutory majority required, neither more nor less, and the directors appear to have been careful not recklessly to have increased the number of single holdings of shareholders beyond what was absolutely necessary for their purpose, and notice is given of a confirmation meeting to be held; whereupon the trustees holding the 6,300 shares, and Mr. J. Punt also holding one share, commence this action, and they sue in a double position. First in respect of their position as trustees of the testator, with whom the company had entered into an agreement containing the stipulation to which I have referred; and, secondly, in the position of shareholders complaining of a misuse of the power of the directors with the purpose and object of enabling a minority of the shareholders to control the majority, speaking of shareholder as meaning the holder of the greater number of shares. There is one other circumstance I ought to mention because it has a bearing on the case. Under the testator's will shares are settled, and some of the persons to whom shares are given are persons having life interests or limited interests under it; for instance, Mr. G. R. Symons has himself a limited life interest, I think his wife has an interest, and there are other interests. But I need not say more than this, that the trustees of the will had duties to perform to all their cestuis que trust, and there is no reason for saying that they ought not to have the powers which are by the articles conferred upon them, and to be exercised for the benefit of their cestuis que trust.

Now, the first point taken is this. It is said that the resolution would be a breach of the contract which was entered into with the testator; and that the plaintiffs would be entitled to enforce the terms of this agreement by restraining any alteration of the articles. I think that the answer to this argument is that the company cannot contract itself out of the right to alter its articles; though it cannot by altering its articles commit a breach of contract. It is well established as between a company and a shareholder not depending upon a special contract outside the articles that this is the case. It has not been, so far as I know, the precise subject of a reported decision as between a contractor and company when the contract is independent of and outside the articles; but in the case of Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa (Limited), [1900] 1 Ch., at p. 671, Lord Lindley, M.R., says: "The articles of a company prescribe the regulations binding on its members (Companies Act, 1862, s. 14). They have the effect of a contract (section 16), but the exact nature of the contract is even now very difficult to define. Be its nature what it may, the company is empowered by the statute to alter the regulations contained in its articles from time to time by special resolution (articles 50, 51), and any regulation or article purporting to deprive the company of this power is invalid on the ground that it is contrary to statute: Walker v. London Tramways Co. The power thus conferred on companies to alter the regulations contained in their articles is limited only by the provision contained in the statute and the conditions contained in the company's memorandum of association. Wide, however, as the language of section 50 is, the power conferred by it must, like all other powers, be exercised subject to those general principles of law and equity which are applicable to all powers conferred on majorities and enabling them to bind minorities. It must be exercised not only in the manner required by law, but also bonâ fide for the benefit of the company as a whole, and it must not be exceeded. Those conditions are always implied and are seldom, if ever, expressed." Then his lordship, at p. 673, says: "Although the regulations contained in a company's articles of association are revocable by special resolution, a special contract may be made with the company in the terms of or embodying one or more of the articles, and the question will arise whether an alteration of the articles so embodied is consistent with the real bargain between the parties. A company cannot break its contracts by altering its articles, but when dealing with contracts referring to revocable articles, and especially with contracts between a member of the company and the company respecting his share, care must be taken not to assume that the contract involves as one of its terms an article which is not to be altered." And at p. 679 Romer, L.J., after dealing with the particular case, says: "Of course by the above observation I have not been dealing with exceptional cases. I can imagine a case, for example, where by the memorandum of association certain provisions as to the lien are made part of the constitution of the company which could not be affected by any alteration of the articles. And special contracts might be made by particular classes of shareholders or individuals, or special obligations to them might be incurred by the company, and that even by virtue of the original articles alone, which would prevent the articles being altered as against them, or prevent the alterations being enforceable against them."

Now, Mr. Coldridge was good enough to refer to a case in which he had been counsel before the Court of Appeal, and Mr. Registrar Carrington was good enough to get for me the registrar's book containing the registrar's note of what took place in the Court of Appeal with reference to it. The case was In the Matter of the Ladies' Dress Association (Limited). It was a case as to the effect really of certain founder's certificates that had been given. Founder's certificates had been issued to a Mr. Pulbrook, who was the founder, who had certain rights conferred on him by the articles of association. These founder's certificates were in these terms: "This certificate is one of the ten founder's certificates issued in pursuance of the articles of association of the company." Then it states certain rights that the holder of the certificate is to have—a certain commission on gross sales, as provided by section 113 of the articles, and states that he "is entitled to all the further rights and subject to the provisions expressed and contained in sections 112, 113, 114, 115, and 116 of the articles of association, copies of which several sections are endorsed hereon, and the said association (limited) for itself and its successors hereby covenants with the holder of this certificate that it will not alter or vary any or either of the above-mentioned sections of the articles of association without the written consent of the holder of the certificate. The holder is entitled to transfer the certificate; and it is given under the common seal of the company." Now, from the registrar's note it appears the argument was, "the counsel for the appellant"—and Mr. Coldridge had very good reason for recollecting this case, as he was counsel for the appellant—"submitted that a company can by contract bind itself not to alter"—that means to alter articles—"as regards an outsider." Wright, J., dismissed the application, whatever form it took, and it came before the Court of Appeal. The Master of the Rolls makes an interlocutory observation which I will pass by, and then the note is, "Coldridge submits he can ratify the contract." Then the Master of the Rolls: "There is no legal covenant. Let me see a contract between you and the company." Then Mr. Coldridge submits he has a contract in the founder's certificates and in the covenant mentioned in article 117. Then the argument goes on "The company can bind itself not to avail itself of its statutory powers." Then the note of the judgment is: "The Master of the Rolls.—I think this case ought to be disposed of in a summary way. The covenant cannot be sued upon. The covenant is by the company that it should not alter any article. Order below affirmed; appeal dismissed with costs." That appears, so far as I can judge, to be a direct decision upon the present point. Whether that be so or not, I am prepared to hold that in the circumstances of the present case the contract could not operate to prevent the articles being altered under the provisions of section 50, whatever the result of that alteration may be. It may be the effect of an alteration after a contract is retrospective. It may be the remedy is in damages only, or it may be that the stipulations of the contract can be enforced notwithstanding the alteration of the articles. It appears to me that the effect of the alteration depends upon the special circumstances in each case, but, speaking generally, and without saying that there may not be some exceptions, an illustration of which does not at present occur to me, I think that the principle in Allen v. The Gold Reefs of West Africa (Limited) applies in a case between the company and an outside person on a separate contract, as well as in a case between a company and a shareholder on the contract contained in the articles, and that it applies in the present case.

The second point taken is this: It is said that the memorandum binds the company to adopt and carry out the agreement which, once adopted, cannot be modified against the wish of the contractor with the company. I think it is a sufficient answer in the present case that the proposed alteration is not in contravention of the contract except in respect of a matter which has ceased to be effective. It appears to me that clause 6 of the agreement refers to those articles giving personal power to the deceased testator, and if you were to read it as though clause 6 were actually inserted in the memorandum, still the stipulation being in favour of a dead person, if that were the only point in the case I should not interfere to restrain the doing away with articles which have ceased to be effective. But of course that is not the substance of the present case.

I now come to the last, and to my mind the most important point of the case. It is argued on the evidence that but for the issue by the directors of the shares in the way in which they did issue them—viz., in their fiduciary capacity, exercising their general powers to issue shares, it would be impossible to pass the resolution proposed; and it is said that the shares were not issued bonâ fide, but with the sole object and intention of creating voting power to carry out the proposed alteration in the articles. On the evidence I am quite clear that these shares were not issued bonâ fide for the general advantage of the company, but that they were issued for the immediate object of controlling the holders of the greater number of shares in the company, and of getting the necessary statutory majority for passing the resolution, while not at the same time conferring upon the minority the power to demand a poll. I need not go through the affidavits. It is really immaterial to me whether a new shareholder is described as a puppet or not. I am quite satisfied that the meaning, object, and intention of the issue of the shares was to enable the shareholders holding the smaller amount of such shares to control the holders of a very considerable majority of such shares. A power such as that which was exercised by the directors in this case is a power which must be exercised, as I have said, for the benefit of the company. Primâ facie it is given them, or rather I should say primarily it is given them, for the purpose of enabling them to raise capital when required for the purposes of the company. In saying that I do not at all mean to say there were not any other occasions when they might not fairly and properly exercise these powers, when a company is constituted like the present. I do not say it would be at all an unreasonable thing to create a sufficient number of shareholders in order to enable statutory powers to be exercised; but when I find persons named, all of whom, if not puppets, are persons whom it is obvious are meant and intended to secure the necessary statutory majority in a particular interest, I do not think that that is a fair and bonâ fide exercise of the power. I think that they were issued to the nominees for the express purpose, amongst other purposes probably, of passing the present resolution. The real difficulty in the case on this head to my mind consists in this, that unless and until the issue of these shares shall be set aside these persons are shareholders in the company, and I must take care that any injunction I grant shall be an injunction that will not interfere with the exercise of these powers generally. I may refer on this ground to a case of Fraser v. Whalley, which is reported in 2 H. & M. 10. Of course the circumstances of that case were not like the present case, but the principle I find in it I think justifies me in the injunction I propose to grant. In that case, which did not arise under the Companies Act, the directors of a railway company acted on an old resolution which authorized the issue of shares for a particular purpose. The particular purpose had ceased and the directors being afraid that at a general meeting they would be removed were attempting, under an entirely different state of circumstances, to issue shares so as to enable them to be supported and kept in office. At p. 28 Page-Wood, V.C., says: "Then the directors of the Oswestry Co. think it advisable if possible to advance money to Mid Wales Co. to assist them in this undertaking. Under the circumstances it would have been wise had the directors called a meeting of the shareholders and put the case to them, and if they had obtained the requisite consent of a general meeting it might have been a very arguable question whether they were or not now legally disabled from acting upon that assent either singly or coupled with the former unused resolution. Yet nothing of the kind is done, and accordingly, putting Savin out of the question, the point is reduced to this: The directors are informed that at the next general meeting they are likely to be removed, and therefore on the very verge of a general meeting they, without giving notice to any one, with this indecent haste and scramble which is shewn by the times at which the meetings were held, resolve that shares are, on the faith of this obsolete power entrusted to them for a different purpose, to be issued for the very purpose of controlling the ensuing general meeting. I have no doubt that the court will interfere to prevent so gross a breach of trust. I say nothing on the question whether the policy advocated by the directors, or that which I am told is to be pursued by Savin, is the more for the interest of the company. That is a matter wholly for the shareholders. I fully concur in the principle laid down in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461, as to that; but if the directors can clandestinely and at the last moment use a stale resolution for the express purpose of preventing the free action of the shareholders, this court will take care that when the company cannot interfere the court will do so." It is true that is a case relating to railway companies and not to companies under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and it is also true that there the plaintiffs were in time to prevent the issue of the shares in question, but the principle appears to me to be the same. If I find, as I do, that shares have been issued under the general and fiduciary powers of the directors for the express purposes of acquiring an unfair and undue majority for the purpose of altering the rights of parties under the articles, I think I ought to interfere. I propose to grant an injunction to restrain the holding of this confirmatory meeting for the passing of this resolution, and to leave it there. The costs will be costs in the action.

Let me, however, say, now I have said so much, that I know in these cases where there are family disputes it is extremely difficult to bring parties to any sort of reason, but in this case, so far as I can see, here is a business which might be in the future, as it has been in the past, eminently successful, and if the parties can come to some sort of agreement or truce between themselves they may go on well. If they do not and unless the intervention of the court is sought in some other way, in an administration action or otherwise, I am very much afraid the result will be that between them they will destroy the goose that lays the golden eggs. I must grant the injunction to prevent the defendants holding the confirmatory meeting for the purpose of passing this resolution.

Motion granted.

Solicitors, H. C. Barker & Son; H. Savidge.

Chan. Div. }
Joyce, J. } May 4, 1903.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS CO. (a.)

Statute—Interpretation—"Daily"—Inclusion of Sunday—Gas Light and Coke and other Gas Companies Acts Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 181), s. 7.

By the South Metropolitan Gas Co.'s Special Acts of 1869 and 1876 provision was made for the public testing of the quality of the gas supplied by them to consumers. The mode of testing and the locus and number of testing- places which were to be provided by the company, and to be under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, were to be prescribed by gas referees appointed by the Board of Trade, and daily testings were to be made by gas examiners appointed by the Metropolitan Board. Similar provisions were contained in the Special Acts of the other metropolitan gas companies. By an Act of 1880, which was applicable to all the metropolitan gas companies, the provisions as to daily testing were (in effect) re enacted by a section providing that a gas examiner should at each testing-place make daily such number of testings as the gas referees should prescribe.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There was also a provision in the Special Act of 1869 which was to be read with the Act of 1880 defining "day" as twenty-four hours beginning at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day and ending at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next. Under these Acts the practice had been to test on week-days only.

Held, that the literal meaning of "daily" in the Act of 1880, read with the Act of 1869, with reference to the South Metropolitan Gas Co. was "every day," including Sundays, taking the day as commencing at 9 o'clock in the forenoon, and that the practice prevailing under similar provisions in previous Acts of Parliament from 1869 to 1880 was not sufficient to justify the court in construing the Act of 1880 with reference to that practice under the principle suggested by Lord Macnaghten in Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, 591.

Held, therefore, that gas examiners appointed by the London County Council, as successors of the Metropolitan Board, were entitled to test the gas on Sundays.

The plaintiffs sought a declaration that their duly-appointed gas examiners were entitled on Sundays as well as week-days to make tests of the gas supplied to customers by the defendants and an injunction restraining interference with the making of such tests on Sundays.

By the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 130), s. 3, the term "day" (subject to an exception not in this case material) was defined to mean "twenty-four hours reckoned from 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day to 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next following day, so much of each day as is before 9 o'clock in the forenoon being reckoned as part of the immediately preceding day of the month or week."

The Act provided for the appointment by the Board of Trade of officials called "gas referees," who were to prescribe the mode and times for testing the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied by the company, and also what testing places and apparatus should be furnished by the company, which testing places and apparatus were to be under the control and management of the Metropolitan Board of Works (hereinafter called the plaintiffs' predecessors). The Act further provided for the appointment by the plaintiffs' predecessors of gas examiners whose duty it was at each testing-place daily to test the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied.

By the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co's Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 229), the provisions of the Act of 1869 as to testing and the appointment of gas examiners were repealed and re-enacted with modifications. By this Act it was provided that the gas referees should from time to time prescribe the situation and number of the testing-places and the apparatus therein for testing the quality of the gas to be supplied by the company, and that the company should provide and maintain such testing-places and apparatus, and that they should be under the control of the plaintiffs' predecessors; and the Act also provided for the appointment by the plaintiffs' predecessors of gas examiners for the several testing-places within their jurisdiction; the Act also provided for daily testings by the examiners. Between 1869 and 1876 similar provisions were enacted with respect to the other metropolitan gas companies.

In 1879 the defendants changed their name from the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co. to the South Metropolitan Gas Co. By the Gas Light and Coke and other Gas Companies Acts Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 181), it was provided (section 4) that the Act should apply to the metropolitan gas companies therein enumerated (including the defendants) and throughout the districts of the said companies, and that for the purposes of its application throughout any one of such districts the expression "the company" should be construed to mean such one of the said companies as was for the time being authorized to supply gas in such district, and that the expressions "gas referees" and "gas examiner" should respectively have the meanings assigned to them in the special Act of such company, and that the special Act of such company as amended by the Act now stating and the latter Act should be construed together as one Act. Section 4 provided as follows: "A gas examiner shall at each testing-place make daily such number of tests as the gas referees may prescribe for ascertaining whether during the whole of each day the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied at such testing-place by the company are such as are respectively prescribed under the special Act, provided that the tests for illuminating power shall be taken at intervals of not less than one hour."

The plaintiffs duly appointed gas examiners for the several testing-places of the defendants as prescribed by the gas referees. One of such examiners, by the direction of the plaintiffs, attended at each of the defendants' testing-places on several Sundays in November and December, 1902, but on each occasion was refused admission by the defendants' caretakers. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action.

By their defence the defendants alleged that ever since 1869 gas referees appointed by the Board of Trade had periodically issued notifications prescribing daily testing of the gas supplied by the defendants and the other companies for the time being under their jurisdiction, and duly appointed gas examiners had tested the gas supplied by such companies in accordance with the Acts and notifications for the time being in force; that all that period such tests (to the knowledge of the gas referees and other public authorities) had been made on week-days only, and never on Sundays, and that the obligation of daily testing had been treated by the gas examiners and public authorities as applying to week-days alone. This was not disputed. It further appeared that since 1872 the metropolitan gas companies had suspended work on Sundays from 6 a.m. to 6 and in some cases 10 p.m., and that the gas used on Sundays was for the most part made during the week and accumulated in the gas-holders.

Hughes, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the plaintiffs.—In an Act of Parliament, unless there is express provision to the contrary, Sunday is included as a day: Peacock v. R., (1858) 4 C. B. N. S. 264; Ex parte Simpkin, (1859) 2 E. & E. 392; Rawlins v. West Derby Overseers, (1846) 2 C. B. 72; Calder and Hebble Navigation Co. v. Pilling, (1845) 14 M. & W. 76.

Warmington, K.C., Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., and L. Rostron, for the defendants.—The practice from the beginning until 1880, and since 1880 until now, has been to test only on week-days. No one suggests that the Act of 1880 intended to start a new practice, and it is to be construed by reference to the practice subsisting in 1880, and continued ever since, and dealing as it does with a special trade, with reference to the practice in that trade. The question whether "day" includes Sunday depends on circumstances; generally, if work is directed to be done, day means work-a-day or week-day. We rely on the Sunday Observance Act, 1676, and the following cases: River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson, 2 A. C. 743, 26 W. R. Dig 222; Hawkins v. Gathercole, 3 W. R. 194, 6 D. M. & G. 1, 20; Eastman, &c., Co. v. Comptroller-General of Patents, &c., 47 W. R 152, [1898] A. C. 571; Fewens v. Noakes, 28 W. R. 562, 50 L. J. Q. B. 132; Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, 40 W. R. Dig. 217, and Lord Macnaghten's opinion in that case; and also Commercial Steamship Co. v. Boulton, 23 W. R. 854, L. R. 10 Q. B. 346.

JOYCE, J.—The question in this case, as has been truly said by Lord Robert Cecil, is, What is the meaning of the word "daily" in the 7th section of the Act of 1880. I think, without looking at the dictionary, one may venture to say that the primâ facie meaning of "daily" is "every day," although we have in this case the peculiar provision with reference to days which is contained in the 3rd section of the Act of 1869, which says that "the term 'day'" (subject to the exception therein mentioned) "means twenty-four hours, reckoned from 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day to 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next following day, so much of each day as is before 9 o'clock in the forenoon being reckoned as part of the immediately preceding day of the month or week." Therefore it appears to me that primâ facie the effect of this 7th section of the Act of 1880 with reference to the company in question is that the gas is to be tested as thereby prescribed on every day, beginning at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day and ending at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next day. Now, if that be so, two of these days would include parts of Sunday, which, as I understand, begins at 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and ends at 12 o'clock on Sunday night. It is said that, from the provisions of this section, the twenty-four hours from midnight on Saturday to midnight on Sunday must be altogether excluded. Upon that I observe that as I understand there is not a word or an expression of any sort or kind in any of these Acts of Parliament to suggest that that is to be the case, or that that is the intention of the Legislature. Primâ facie I should suppose that where, as here, the gas is to be supplied at all times on every day and at every hour of the day the testing ought to take place on every day of the week.

Now, what is the argument which the defendants urge against this construction? How and where do they get any particular intent, so to speak—as it is called in one of the cases—at variance with or contrary to the literal words of the Act? Well, many not altogether relevant topics, as I consider, have been urged upon me, but the principal point is this. The defendants say that the practice from the passing of the Act of 1869 down to the passing of the Act of 1880 has been not to test on Sundays; that is to say, in other words, that the practice has been not to comply with the literal terms of the Act of Parliament applying to the case. Can that alter the meaning of the word "daily" in the Act of 1880? It is said that this can be done by the principle enunciated by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax v. Pemsel, where undoubtedly it is suggested "that when you find legislation following a continuous practice and repeating the very words on which that practice was founded, it may perhaps fairly be inferred that the Legislature in re-enacting the statute intended those words to be understood in their received meaning." However, he expresses no opinion upon it. My opinion is that, if that is a sound principle upon which the court can act in construing an Act of Parliament, the practice in this case, assuming it to be established, has not been nearly sufficient for the purpose of founding upon it any really serious argument to the effect desired by the defendants. In my opinion the words are plain. I am asked to say upon the construction of the statute that there is something intended or to be inferred contrary to the words of the Act—a construction, by the way, which, as it appears to me, would lead to the greatest possible difficulty in working the Act with reference to the days of the rest of the week. I do not know why that is to be inferred. I have no reason to suspect that it was brought to the attention of the Legislature when the Act of 1880 was passed that there was any such practice as is alleged before me. The result of the whole argument upon my mind is that I do not even suspect that the Legislature did not intend that which is provided in the 7th section of the Act of 1880—namely, that the testing should be daily and should be every day, without excepting Sunday in any way whatever. There will be a declaration as claimed, with liberty to apply for an injunction.

Solicitors, W. A. Blaxland; Hicklin, Washington, & Pasmore.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } June 17, 18, 1903.

In re MILES. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Winding up of estate—Costs special to particular beneficiaries—Costs in anticipation—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 39.

In the taxation, under section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, of the bill of costs of the solicitor of trustees engaged in dividing an estate between beneficiaries, the special costs incurred with respect to the share of one of the beneficiaries are chargeable against the estate as a whole.

In the final settlement of an estate between the beneficiaries, the trustees are entitled to include by anticipation such reasonable charges as will be incurred in carrying out the final division.

Summons to review taxation.

On the death of a tenant for life an estate became divisible among three beneficiaries equally, two of whom wished to receive transfers of their shares in specie, whilst the third wished his share to be realized and the mortgage on it paid off.

On the presentation of his bill by the solicitor of the trustees who wound up the estate, two of the beneficiaries issued an originating summons for its taxation under the provisions of section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.

An order for taxation was thereupon made on the 29th of January, 1903.

On taxation the taxing-master disallowed certain items connected with the transference to two of the beneficiaries of their shares in specie, and with the payment off of the mortgage on the third share, on the ground that each beneficiary should bear his own share of the costs and that these items should not be charged on the estate as a whole. He also disallowed certain items charged for expenses in anticipation.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present summons was thereupon issued by the solicitor to review the master's decision on these two points.

A. J. Chitty, for the summons.—It is impossible to dissect every item of expense for taxation under section 39 and to allocate it to separate beneficiaries. The case of In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, does not apply to this section: In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895] 1 Ch. 73.

Ashton Cross against the summons.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In my opinion it is not the practice, when trustees are dividing an estate among beneficiaries, to have the bill of costs of their solicitor dissected in the manner that has been suggested, in order that every item referring to separate shares may be extracted from it and treated as chargeable only against the share of each beneficiary.

The trustees are proposing to divide an estate not yet divided, and their reasonable and proper costs in so doing are properly chargeable against the estate as a whole. I am further of opinion that the question whether any particular items properly chargeable by the trustees ought ultimately to be charged against any particular beneficiary does not arise on the present summons, because under section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, this taxation must be treated as being a taxation between the trustees and their solicitors of the items properly chargeable by the trustees and properly payable by them to their solicitors; and every proper and reasonable item must be allowed, irrespective of whether it is ultimately to be charged on the final distribution against the share of a particular beneficiary.

As to costs allowed by anticipation, if the division be the division of the whole balance remaining in the hands of the trustees, and a final settlement of the whole estate, then I am of opinion that the trustees are entitled to include by anticipation such reasonable and proper charges as will be incurred in carrying out the final division, although the final division be not actually made at the moment. If, however, it be merely an interim division, still leaving a further balance to be divided, then the costs should include only the costs actually incurred up to date, leaving any further costs to be settled and adjusted in the final division. The better plan will be, accordingly, to allow the objection generally and to refer the bill back to the taxing-master to review his taxation upon the footing indicated.

Solicitors, J. W. T. Miles; W. A. S. Hellyar & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 10, 1903.

LOCKWOOD v. COOPER. (a.)

Licensing law—Offences—"Gaming"—Game of skill played with cards for prizes given by persons not competitors—"Whist drive"—Suffering gaming on licensed premises—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 17, sub-section 1.

The appellant, a licensed victualler, suffered a game of skill, called a "whist drive," to be played by members of a club in a room on his licensed premises, for prizes only given by their friends.

Held, that he could not properly be convicted of suffering gaming under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 17, sub-section 1.

This was an appeal by Dennis Arnold Lockwood, the proprietor of the Crescent Hotel, Filey, who had been summoned before certain justices of the peace for the East Riding of Yorkshire and convicted of suffering gaming on his licensed premises contrary to section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872. The justices at the instance of the appellant stated the following case:

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved or admitted before us:

(a) A large room in the Crescent Hotel was engaged by a party of ladies and gentlemen of good social position in the neighbourhood of Filey, calling themselves the Filey Indoor Games Club. The members of this club and their friends met in this room for the purpose of playing a whist drive, and had the exclusive use of the room, for which they paid so much a week. A fee of five shillings was paid for membership of the club, and each person paid 1s. 6d. a night when playing towards the cost of the room, refreshments (which were supplied by the appellant in another room, but no intoxicants were supplied), and other incidental expenses. Any member could introduce a friend by submitting the person's name for approval and paying 1s. 6d. for the person introduced.

(b) On the night of the 24th of February, 1903, forty or fifty ladies and gentlemen, the majority of whom were members, met to play a game of cards commonly known as a whist drive for prizes which when won were taken by the winners of the game. There were eight prizes of varying value, one of which, a clock, was worth about £1 11s. 6d. This prize was won by a player who stated on oath that he would not have gone if the prizes had not been worth playing for.

(c) The prizes were not subscribed for by the players, but were given by some members of the club or by their friends who were not members, and it was a rule that no person should win the prize which he or she had given.

(d) The appellant knew that a whist drive was being played—he let the room for the purpose. He stated to a witness for the respondent that he did not know that there was anything wrong. When the parties went to him to take the room they said they would not play either for money or money's worth, and he let the room on the distinct understanding that the players should not stake money on the game. He knew, however, that there were prizes. Neither the appellant nor his staff had entered the room during the time of the play, nor was the room used as a public room after it was engaged by the club.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that he could not be said to have suffered the gaming, if gaming there was, to be carried on, as the players had the exclusive use of the room; that the playing in question was not gaming within the meaning of section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872; that in order to constitute such gaming there must be something staked by each party playing to be lost or won by them according to the success or failure of the person who had staked; and that from the fact that the players were playing for prizes given by someone else they (the players) had nothing to lose and could not be said to be gaming.

On behalf of the respondent, it was submitted that he was not bound to prove that the appellant had knowingly suffered the gaming to take place; that the appellant did suffer gaming within the meaning of the section; and, further, that the playing for money's worth—namely, the prizes, constituted gaming within the meaning of the section.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices found, as a fact, that the appellant did know that the players were playing a whist drive for prizes—money's worth. In their opinion the playing for prizes constituted gaming within the meaning of the section, and they convicted the appellant and fined him £1, including 6s. costs.

Before the justices the following cases were cited: Somerset v. Hart, 32 W. R. 594, 12 Q. B. D. 360; Reg. v. Ashton, 22 L. J. 1; Bew v. Harston, 3 Q. B. D. 454, 47 L. J. 27; Redgate v. Haynes, 1 Q. B. D. 89; Bond v. Evans, 36 W. R. 767, 21 Q. B. D. 249; Danford v. Taylor, 33 J. P. 277; Luff v. Leaper, 36 J. P. 54.

The question for the court was whether the justices had come to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and if not what should be done in the premises.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Stutfield with him), for the appellant.—The conviction cannot stand, because the circumstances under which the whist drive was played do not amount to the offence with which the appellant has been charged—namely, gaming. To constitute that offence either the game must be per se illegal or else it must be played for money, or there must be some circumstances attached to it which make it illegal. In this case there is no such element. The mere playing of a legitimate game for prizes is not illegal merely because it is played on licensed premises.

Queen v. Ashton, 22 L. J. M. C. 1; Dyson v. Mason 22 Q. B. D. 351, 37 W. R. Dig. 108; Jenks v. Turpin, 13 Q. B. D. 505, 32 W. R. Dig. 84, were cited.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Cautley, in support of the conviction.—If a game of skill for prizes given by persons not playing were played on licensed premises it might very well be apart from special circumstances that the game even on licensed premises would not be a contravention of the statute. Chess, for instance, in which it is generally said that no element of chance exists. But here the game was one of cards, and necessarily chance as well as skill comes in. The question has never been raised before, but I submit that on the finding of the justices this conviction should stand.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—If there was any ground here for suggesting that this was in fact a gambling arrangement by which the players one after another staked all round, different considerations would arise. The Licensing Act ought to be strictly enforced and carried out, no doubt, because it was a penal Act, but nevertheless the court must take care not to strain the words of the section beyond the principle of the decisions upon them. It is not necessary for me to say that no game played for prizes on licensed premises would not come within the mischief of the section; nor to decide that a game of skill would be exempt. Both these questions were dealt with at length in Dyson v. Mason, and also, I believe, in other cases. Here the justices found that the ladies and gentlemen of this club were competing for prizes given by their friends who were not playing, and there is no suggestion that in what they did they desired to evade the statute. The justices appear to have wished to raise the point for our decision whether playing any game of skill and chance not being an unlawful game of itself and not being played for money stakes was within the section. In my opinion we have not to decide that question here, because I think that we cannot hold that this whist drive played under these conditions was gaming at all within the meaning of the statute. For these reasons the conviction cannot be supported, and this appeal must be allowed.

WILES and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellant, T. H. Hiscott, for Tasker Hart, Scarborough.

Solicitors for the respondent, Bockett, Stunt, & Nash, for J. R. Procter, Beverley.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 10.

CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION. (a.)

Insurance, marine—Risk, duration of—"Thirty days in port after arrival"—Days, computation of.

A policy of insurance on ship was expressed to be "from Portland, O., by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival." The policy further described the risk as continuing until the ship "hath there moored at anchor in good safety." The ship arrived at Algoa Bay on the 2nd of August, and was moored in good safety at 11.30 a.m. on that day. She remained at Algoa Bay until she was lost by a peril insured against at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Held, that the thirty days meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours each beginning at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, and that therefore the ship was lost after the insurance had ceased.

Judgment of Bigham, J. (51 W. R. 527, [1903] 2 K. B. 363), affirmed.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Bigham, J., and a jury (reported in 51 W. R. 527, [1903] 2 K. B. 363).

The action was brought to recover for a total loss of the plaintiffs' ship, Inchcape Rock, under a policy of marine insurance dated the 4th of April, 1902, against the usual perils, of which the defendants were underwriters.

The policy, which was on a printed form with blanks to be filled in, described the insurance as "at and from Portland, O., by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed." Later on the policy described the insurance as continuing "until the said ship with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., shall be arrived at as above upon the said ship, &c., until she hath there moored at anchor in good safety." This latter clause was in print except the words "as above," which were written in. The latter part of this clause as it originally stood in the printed form ran "until she hath there moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety," but in the policy in question the words "twenty-four hours" were struck out.

The ship arrived at Algoa Bay on the 2nd of August, and remained there until the 1st of September, when she was totally lost in a gale.

At the trial the jury found that the vessel arrived at Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd of August, 1902; that she was moored at anchor in good safety at 11.30 a.m. on that day; and that she was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Bigham, J., on further consideration, held that the "thirty days" meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours each beginning at 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, and not thirty calendar days, and that therefore the insurance had expired at 11 30 a.m. on the 1st of September, before the ship was lost. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the plaintiff.—The thirty days are thirty calendar days, commencing at midnight on the 2nd of August The insurance is described in the policy as continuing "for thirty days in port after arrival." That means after the day of arrival, and therefore the day of arrival is to be excluded in the computation of the thirty days: The Katy, 43 W. R. 290, [1895] P. 56; and Goldsmiths' Company v. West Metropolitan Railway Co., ante, p. 21. Unless there is something to the contrary, the law construes a day as meaning a calendar day. The insurance therefore did not expire until midnight on the 1st of September, and the vessel was covered by the policy when she was lost.

They also referred to Mercantile Marine Insurance Co. v. Titherington, 13 W. R. 141, 6 B. & S 765.

Scrutton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants, contended that the thirty days ran from the time the vessel was moored at anchor in good safety—namely, from 11.30 a.m. on the 2nd of August.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., and raises a question as to the construction of a policy of marine insurance. By the policy the ship was insured at and from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay, "and for thirty days in port after arrival however employed." Later on in the policy the insurance is described as continuing "until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., shall be arrived at as above upon the said ship, &c., until she hath there moored at anchor in good safety."

This last clause defines the period during which the policy would have attached apart from the earlier provision as to the thirty days. The earlier clause involves this, that we must ascertain the date of arrival before we can see when the thirty days begin to run. The later clause seems to me to define the point of time when the ship is said to arrive, and from that point of time, and from no other, the thirty days begin to run—namely, from the point of time when she hath moored at anchor in good safety. That, to my mind, is the obvious meaning of the policy. Further, when one looks at the genesis of this later clause, the matter is made quite clear. The clause as it originally stood in print was "until she hath there moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety," but the parties have struck out the words "twenty-four hours," thus making the point of time from which the thirty days ran the same as that from which the twenty-four hours would have run. The twenty-four hours would clearly have run from the time of mooring in good safety. The thirty days therefore began to run from the particular point of time—namely, the particular hour of the day at which the vessel was moored at anchor in good safety. The jury have fixed the point of time when she was so moored at 11 30 a.m., on the 2nd of August. The thirty days from that point of time would expire at 11.30 a.m. on the 1st of September. Therefore the vessel would be uncovered by the policy in respect of any loss occuring after 11.30 a.m. on the 1st of September. The jury have found that the loss occurred at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September, and as the insurance had run out at that time the defendants are not liable.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to determine is, how are the thirty days to be calculated? The policy states that the insurance is from Portland, Oregon, to Algoa Bay, "and for thirty days in port after arrival." The meaning of "arrival" of the ship is clearly defined in the later clause as the time when "she hath there moored at anchor in good safety." In my opinion there is only one possible construction of this policy. The twenty-four hours, which have been struck out by the parties, would have run from the time that the vessel moored at anchor in good safety, and no reason has been advanced why we should place a different interpretation on the policy because thirty days are inserted instead of twenty-four hours.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Oct. 31; Nov. 6. 7.

WILKINSON v. LLANDAFF AND DINAS POWIS RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local authority—Sewer—Drain—Nuisance by sewage—Drainage of houses—Liability of local authority—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 2, 4, 14, 19, 21, 42, 43.

A channel or gutter, which was vested in the defendants as the local authority, and which ran between a road and the footpath in front of the house of the plaintiff adjoining the road, was used for carrying off the surface water from the road, and also the water from the roofs of some of the other houses bordering on the road, by means of pipes communicating therewith, and from the curtilages of these houses. In the channel itself at various intervals were gratings for conducting the water into the deep underground drains. There was also a cesspool situate in a garden adjoining the plaintiff's house. Sewage-matter had overflowed from the cesspool into the channel through no fault of the plaintiff, as it came from another house, and being permitted to remain in the channel had caused the illness of the plaintiff's infant son by means of foul and noxious smells escaping therefrom, through the defendants neglecting to keep the channel properly cleaned out.

Held, (1) that the channel was a "sewer" within the meaning of the definition of sewers in section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875; (2) that being a sewer the local authority were bound under section 19 of the same Act to keep it free from pollution; and (3) that the plaintiff not having himself caused the pollution, was entitled to damages and an injunction against the defendants.

Decision of Phillimore, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant council from the decision of Phillimore, J., and a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

The action was tried at the spring assizes at Cardiff in March, 1903.

The facts were as follows: The plaintiff, a Mr. David Wilkinson, an ironfounder, resided at a house called "Thornleigh," in Mulbrook-road, in Dinas Powis. The defendants were the Rural District Council for the District of Llandaff and Dinas Powis.

In front of the plaintiff's house was a channel or gutter which ran down the side of the road and separated it from the footpath in front of the plaintiff's house. The channel was used for carrying off the surface water from the road, and it also carried off the water from the roofs of some of the houses at the side of the road, and from the curtilages of these houses by means of pipes connected with the channel.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In a garden adjoining the house occupied by the plaintiff was a cesspool, which was situate between the gardens of two other houses, "Rosedene" and "Thistledene," close to the plaintiff's. Owing to the defendants' fault the channel, which at various intervals had gratings to carry the water down to the deeper underground drains, became defective, and could not carry away the water. Sewage-matter had overflowed from the cesspool into the channel through no fault of the plaintiff, and being permitted to remain there had caused injury to the health of the infant son of the plaintiff, V. A. Wilkinson, and thereby put the plaintiff to expense; he also complained that his son's illness was due to the noxious and foul gases which were said to have escaped from the cesspool in question.

It was alleged that the channel was vested in the defendants and that they neglected to cleanse it, and that they also neglected to empty and cleanse the said cesspool after taking that duty upon themselves in pursuance of the power vested in them by the Public Health Act, 1875.

The plaintiff stated that the defendants' neglect was continuous between the 21st of May and the 2nd of June, 1902, and that the sewage overflowed during that period, and that the defendants neglected to remove it from the channel during the same period and up to the 14th of June, 1902.

The plaintiff also claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants and their contractors from permitting a recurrence of the nuisance. The sewage matter had come from a house not the plaintiff's.

Frequent complaints have been made by various residents in the district about the nuisance, and the council then divided the parish into two districts, and made a separate contract in respect of each for the purpose of keeping the channel cleansed, as formerly it was done by only one contractor, which had proved to be insufficient. After this the complaints were less frequent.

The defendants admitted that they contracted for the scavenging (which included the emptying of cesspools) of the parish of St. Andrew's, in which Millbrook-road was situated, but they contended that they were not liable to the plaintiff, because he had sent them no notice as required by section 43 of the Public Health Act, 1875. They also denied that the piece of land, which, when the houses in Millbrook-road were constructed, was taken for the purpose of widening the road, wasever formally taken over by them, but they admitted having carried out work upon it—namely, the repair of the footpath for a few yards in front of the plaintiff's house, and also the laying of a covered drain along the edge of the road in the place of an open ditch which formerly existed there, and the fixing of gullies to carry away the rainwater from the surface of the road.

The defendants further contended that they were not liable, as they to take advantage of the power given to them by section 42 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to enter into a bonâ fide contract for the removal of sewage &c.

The main point to be decided was whether the channel was a "sewer" within section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55). If it were a "sewer" within the meaning of the Act, the defendants were, by section 19, bound to cleanse it. The definition of "drain," in section 4 is: "'Drain' means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed"; and "'sewer' includes sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act." Section 19 reads: "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied."

Phillimore, J., held that the channel was a "sewer" within the definition in section 4, and that therefore the defendants were under a liability to keep it cleansed, so as to prevent it from being a nuisance and injurious to health. He also granted the plaintiff an injunction, and awarded him damages.

From this the defendants appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and J. Sankey, for the appellants.—The plaintiff says that the defendants are liable under sections 42 and 43 of the Public Health Act, 1875, but where there is a contract to clear out the cesspool the defendants are not liable; there was no obligation to clear out the cesspool at all by law, but the defendants may contract with contractors to do the work, and then their duty is discharged: Ellis v. The Strand District Board of Works, 67 L. T. 307, 41 W. R. Dig. 139. If the defendants are liable under section 19 of the Act, then by section 21 any person living in the district will be entitled to use this channel as a sewer: Graham v. Wroughton, 49 W. R. 643, [1901] 2 Ch. 451. If this drain—that is, this grating, is on the surface, is it a sewer?—that is, is a channel to carry away surface water a sewer? It is not: West Riding of Yorkshire Rivers Board v. Reuben Gaunt & Sons (Limited), 67 J. P. 183, 19 Times L. R. 140. Even assuming that this drain along the road is a "sewer" within the meaning in section 4 of the Act, it is not a sewer for all purposes: Kinson Pottery Co. v. Poole Corporation, 47 W. R. 607, [1899] 2 Q. B. 41. A drain may be a sewer for some purposes and not for others. It would be an unjustifiable straining of the use of the word to call this gutter along a country road a sewer; the channel is part of the highway. If it is a sewer; the defendants are under an obligation to cleanse, but if it is not a drain, it is not a sewer. The defendants' only duty to cleanse it would be when they themselves polluted it. If the court says that it is a sewer, then it will entitle everyone in the district to use it as a sewer; the defendants contend that it is not even a drain; it was never intended to drain water into it at all. The only notice received under section 43 was from someone not the plaintiff. It is not a sewer within the Act, for if this is a drain, and therefore a sewer, every drain pipe in a house will be a sewer. This channel is not a drain of any sort.

The following cases were referred to: Mayor, &c., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne v. Houseman, 63 J. P. 85; Sykes v. Sowerby Urban District Council [1900] 1 Q. B. 584, 48 W. R. Dig. 104. [By VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.; Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co., 41 W. R. 580 [1893] 2 Q. B. 135].

B Francis Williams, K.C., and J. Davies Williams, for the respondent, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is no part of my business to criticise Acts of Parliament; nor to say whether they are closely drawn or loosely drawn, or easy to construe or difficult to construe. I have to construe the Act of Parliament, and in so doing I have to look at the definitions in the Act, and I have also to follow any decisions which have been given as to the meaning of the particular section. I think, therefore, my judgment must affirm the decision of Phillimore, J. I do not see my way to differ from him either as to the facts which he has found or as to the law which he has applied to these facts. Now, what are the facts of this case? The facts are these: There are these several houses, and I believe there are some ten or twenty; the rain-water from the roofs, and I believe the surface water from the ground within the curtilage of these houses respectively, undoubtedly as a fact all drain into this space at the side of the road, and it follows from that that this space at the side of the road is a space which, if it does in fact constitute a drain, is not within the definition of "drain" which is excepted from the definition of "sewer." The definition of "sewer" is "'sewer' includes sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies." And when one turns back to see what a drain "interpreted as aforesaid" is, one finds "drain means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed" It is quite plain, therefore, that if this space over which the water flows, which we find on either side of this highway, is a drain of some sort, it is not a drain which falls within the exception I have just now read; that is, it is not a drain as interpreted in the definition clause defining it. That being so, really the only remaining question that I have to decide is whether or not the portion of the highway over or along which this surface water runs is a drain. Phillimore, J., came to the conclusion that it is something which falls within the definition "drains of every description," except the interpreted "drain" mentioned before. It was contended that it did not come within the words "drains of every description" because it was difficult to define its lateral extension. There was no edge to it as against the highway, or separating it from the highway. I do not think that makes any difference. One has to look at the purpose of this graduated hollow being made at the side of the road. I cannot doubt that the graduated hollow was made for the purpose of drainage. It certainly was made for the purpose of draining the water from the surface of the road, because it was not only that the water of the surface of the road might run down from the crown to the edge, but it was also for the purpose, having got the water to the edge there, that it should be held in a confined space until it reached the gratings which were to convey it into a sewer below. Under these circumstances it does seem to me quite plain that this was, as Phillimore, J., held it to be, something falling within the words "drains of every description" in the definition section. I think it does, as a matter of fact, carry off, not only the water from the surface of the road, but also the water from these adjacent houses. Under these circumstances it not only comes within the words "drains of every description," but it is also clearly outside the definition of "drain."

I do not myself intend to decide anything more; I am only deciding in this case that Phillimore, J., was right in finding in fact that the hollow at the edge of the road was used for and intended to be used for the purposes of drainage, and that being used among other purposes for the purpose of carrying off the water from these houses occupied by different owners, it is a sewer, and that the local authority, are under section 19 of this Act of Parliament, liable to keep this sewer free from pollution. I do not decide that every agricultural drain into which the surface water of two or three fields, or the surface or underground water of two or three fields, runs is necessarily within the words "drains of every description." I have not to decide that to-day. All I decide is that this drain, carrying the rain-water from these various houses, is a sewer, and that the local authority are bound, as it is admitted they are bound, to keep the sewer free from pollution. It was said that although it might be a sewer within the meaning of the Act, yet there was a decision in the Queen's Bench Division which decided that a drain might be a sewer for some purposes in the Act and not for others. I only want to say with regard to that case (The Kinson Pottery Co. v. Poole Corporation), that in the first place, if it did so decide I do not agree with it; and in the second place, when the judgments of Darling, J., and in particular of Channell, J., are carefully read, it does not seem to me that they did decide anything of the sort, nor does it seem to me that it was necessary for the purposes of that case that any such decision should be given. I think, under all the circumstances this appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the finding of fact by Phillimore, J., that the channel which we have to consider in this case was a sewer within the definition of "sewers" in the Public Health Act, was correct. I need only very shortly point out a few leading circumstances which show, to my mind, that the decision of Phillimore, J., was right. The channel here is a well-defined channel to carry and take away the surface water, not only from the road, but also from the adjacent houses. It is a channel artificially made, and made for the purpose I have indicated; and, as I gather from the facts, there are gullies at regular intervals along the channel to allow the water passing along this channel to pass into the covered sewer below the surface of the road; and as I understand it, there are no less than about twenty houses already draining the surface water from their roofs by pipes into this channel. Those circumstances, to my mind, show that this is undoubtedly a sewer within the definition of the Public Health Act. With regard to the suggested evil consequences resulting from this decision—an argument which is always used in these cases—I may shortly observe that it does not follow because this is a sewer within the definition of the term "sewers" in the Public Health Act that it can be used by all the inhabitants of the district for sewage matter. From the finding that this channel is a sewer it results that the appeal fails, for clearly, it being a sewer, the defendants had a duty cast upon them with regard to cleansing it, among other matters. That duty they have broken, and the result of their breach of duty has been damage to the plaintiff as found by the judge, and as to that part of the case, there is no substantial appeal. That being so, it appears to me that the judgment was right, and the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to consider two questions. First, whether the channel which has been so much spoken of is a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act; and, secondly, whether the local authority have failed in the duties which are imposed upon them by that Act with reference to sewers within the meaning of the Public Health Act. Now, in order to decide the first question, we have to find what is the meaning of a "sewer" as that word is used in the Public Health Act. Section 4 contains a definition of the word

"sewer": "Sewer includes sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act." It has not been contended before us that the channel in question is a drain within the first exception, that is to say, drains to which the word "drain" as interpreted by the Act applies. And it is plain that it does not fall within the second exception, because in this case the authority having the management of the roads is a local authority under the Public Health Act. Therefore the question arises with regard to the widest ambit of the definition which makes the word "sewer" include sewers and drains of every description, and the question which we have to decide really comes back to this—a question of fact—is this channel a drain of any description within the meaning of the Act?—a drain of any description. Phillimore, J., on the facts, which I shall not repeat, came to the conclusion that it was a drain, and therefore a sewer within the meaning of the Act, and I cannot differ from that finding of fact on the part of Phillimore, J. But it has been argued that that cannot be, because, if so, then everyone under section 21 of the Act has a right to drain into it. Now I say, with all respect to those who use that argument, that that is an exaggeration of the effect of section 21. Section 21 does not provide that every owner of property within the district of a local authority shall be entitled as of right to connect every drain which he has with every sewer of the local authority. That distinctly is not the meaning of the Act. All that is given by that Act is a right to have his drain connected, or made to communicate with the sewers—with some of the sewers, that is to say, of the local authority. And the right is given subject to compliance with conditions, amongst others, that he is to comply with the regulations of the local authority in respect of the mode in which the communication to the drains is given. I do not think, therefore, that anything can be based upon that argument to prevent the court from coming to the conclusion that this is a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act. Then, that being so, has the local authority in this case failed to fulfil the duties imposed by the Act with reference to sewers within the meaning of the Act? Now that turns on the construction of section 19, "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health and to be properly cleansed and emptied." What is alleged against the local authority in this case is that that authority failed to keep this channel which we hold to be a sewer so as not to be a nuisance, or injurious to health and to be properly cleansed. What happened was that sewage—fœcal matter—escaped into the channel—I assume, improperly and contrary to law—and, having escaped there, was permitted to remain and was not removed, so that the sewer was not cleansed, and became a nuisance and injurious to health. It seems to me that the complainant in this case being a person who had not caused or who was not answerable in any way for the escape of the fœcal matter in question, the local authority failed in their duty; and it is no answer for them to say that sombody else was guilty of a wrongful act in permitting the escape of that fœcal matter. In that respect this case differs entirely from that which was relied on by the learned counsel for the appellant in Kinson Pottery Co. v. Poole Corporation, because there the person who was complaining, or was setting up the defence in that case, was the very person who was answerable for the improper escape of the fœcal matter into the sewer, and it was held, and, if I may say so, it appears to have been rightly held, that in that case he could not take advantage of his own wrong. Here no such question arises, and it seems to me that in this respect also the finding of the learned judge in respect of the fact is in accordance with law.

In those circumstances I agree with my brethren. The appeal fails.

The appeal was dismissed, and there was no order on the cross-appeal.

Solicitors, Riddell & Co., for E. W. Pocock, Cardiff; Cunliffes & Davenport, for L. G. Williams, Cardiff.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Oct. 27.

BROWN v. DIMBLEBY. (a.)

Married Woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Wife's contracts during coverture—Judgment after cessation of coverture——Married Women's Property Act, 1893, (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 1.

A married woman, who was possessed of separate property with a restraint against anticipation, made a promissory note jointly with her husband. After the death of the husband an action was brought against the widow on the promissory note, and judgment was obtained against her. On an application by the plaintiff for the appointment by way of equitable execution of a receiver of the income due to the widow from the aforesaid property,

Held, that, although in consequence of her having become discovert the restraint against anticipation had ceased, still the property was protected by section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and an order for a receiver could not be made.

Decision of A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L JJ., in Barnett v. Howard, [1900] 2 Q. B. 784, 49 W. R. Dig. 107, approved and followed.

Appeal from the refusal of Walton, J., to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution.

The action was brought against a widow upon a promissory note. The defendant, who had married in 1892, made the note in question jointly with her husband in 1897. The husband died in 1902. The action was commenced in January, 1903, the plaintiff being the executrix of the payee.

On an application under order 14 the plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant in the ordinary form.

The plaintiff then applied for the appointment of a receiver, by way of equitable execution upon the judgment, of certain income to which the defendant was entitled under the will of her father, proved in 1882, whereby certain trust funds were settled on her for her separate use for life without power of anticipation during coverture.

Walton, J., dismissed the application on the authority of Barnett v. Howard, [1900] 2 Q. B. 784, 49 W. R. Dig. 107, but gave leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

Archibald Brown, for the plaintiff.—The case turns on the true construction of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, which is as follows: "Every contract hereafter entered into by a married woman otherwise than as agent (a) shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, whether she is or is not in fact possessed of or entitled to any separate property at the time when she enters into such contract; (b) shall bind all separate property which she may at that time or thereafter be possessed of or entitled to; and (c) shall also be enforceable by process of law against all property which she may thereafter while discovert be possessed of or entitled to. Provided that nothing in this section contained shall render available to satisfy any liability or obligation arising out of such contract any separate property which at that time or thereafter she is restrained from anticipating." In Barnett v. Howard, which Walton, J., followed, the court held that the proviso to this section protected property which the married woman had during coverture been restrained from anticipating, although, in consequence of her having subsequently become discovert, the restraint against anticipation had ceased. That case, however, was decided by only two Lords Justices, and one of them doubted. The authorities on this subject are not all consistent, and it is suggested that the question as to the construction of this proviso should be reconsidered before the full Court of Appeal.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He referred to Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Pelton Bros. v. Harrison, 39 W. R. 689, [1891] 2 Q. B. 422; Softlaw v. Welch, 47 W. R. 626, [1899] 2 Q. B. 419.

Hume-Williams, K.C., and T. T. Blyth, for the defendant, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—There is no ground for having this question reargued before the full Court of Appeal. In Barnett v. Howard A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., held that, while section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, enlarged the area of the property which could be rendered available to satisfy a married woman's debts, it safeguarded the immunity of property which she was restrained from anticipating. That decision followed a series of decisions of this court which seem to me to be consistent with one another. This case is admitted to be covered by Barnett v. Howard, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Dunn & Hilliard.

Solicitors for the defendant, Blyth, Dutton, Hartley, & Blyth.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — July 28, 29, 30; Aug. 11, 1903.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION v. BARCLAY & CO. (a.)

Company—Shares—Indemnity—Forged transfer of stock—Innocent transferee—Loss incurred by company—Liability as between company and transferee to bear loss.

The transferee of a forged transfer of corporation stock innocently and without negligence presented such transfer to the corporation requesting them to register the transfer. The corporation, acting without negligence, accepted and registered the transfer, and in due course issued certificates to the transferee, one of the defendants, as holder and owner of the stock, thereby incurring liability to the real owner of the stock, whose name had been forged, and in an action subsequently brought against them by the latter they were ordered to make good the loss sustained by him.

Held that the corporation having registered the transfer in pursuance of a statutory obligation, and not voluntarily, at the request of the transferee, no contract by the transferee to indemnify the corporation against any loss sustained in consequence of their acting on his request could be implied.

Decision of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (51 W. R. 204, [1903] 1 K. B. 1), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (reported 51 W. R. 204, [1903] 1 K. B. 1).

The facts are fully reported in the report of the case in the court below, but may be shortly stated as follows:

The action was brought by the Corporation of Sheffield against Messrs. Barclay & Co., bankers, to recover the sum of £11,487 17s. 5d., being the amount of principal and interest of certain corporation stock which belonged to certain trustees named Timbrell and Honnywill, and was transferred to a nominee of the defendants under a transfer purporting to be executed by Honnywill, but which, for the purpose of this action, must be taken to have been a forgery.

Prior to the 13th of April, 1893, £8,500 Sheffield Corporation Redeemable Stock was transferred to the names of A. A. Timbrell and A. O. Honnywill, who were trustees of a certain estate. The certificate of the stock in these names bearing date the 13th of April, 1893, was produced at the trial. The stock had stood in the name of Sutcliffe from 1886, but had been transferred on change of trustees to Timbrell and Honnywill on the 29th of March, 1893, and on the 13th of April, 1893, a certificate was issued in their names.

Upon the 11th of April, 1893, a transfer of £8,200 of this stock to E. E. Barclay, a representative of the defendants, purporting to be executed by Timbrell and Honnywill, was handed to the defendants Barclay & Co. For the purpose of this case it must be taken that the signature of Honnywill to the transfer of the 11th of April was a forgery.

On the 15th of April, 1893, the defendants, Messrs. Barclay & Co., sent the transfer of the 11th to the corporation, enclosed in a letter in the following terms: "54, Lombard-street, London, E.C., April 15, 1893. Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Ransom, & Co. present their compliments to the Registrar of the Sheffield Corporation and beg to send enclosed the transfer of £8,200 3½ per cent. 1883 stock, and will be obliged by his registering the same in the company's books in the name of their Mr. E. E. Barclay, sending them the new certificates in due course. Messrs. Barclay & Co. also enclose the amount of the registration fee. The Registrar, Sheffield."

This was followed by a letter of the 17th from Mr. Sarkas, the registrar, acknowledging the receipt, but pointing out that the registration fee had not been sent; and on the 18th of April Messrs. Barclay & Co. sent the registration fee.

On the 28th of April, 1893, E. E. Barclay, the transferee named in the forged transfer of the 11th of April, executed a transfer of £8 000 of the stock to Messrs. Young & Macdonald, and, upon the 12th of May, of the balance, £200, to Mary Florence Cockayne.

Upon the 1st of June the plaintiffs issued certificates to Young & Macdonald for the £8,000 and to Mary Cockayne for the £200.

In the year 1901 an action was brought by Honnywill against the corporation, claiming the rectification of the register by inserting his name as the holder of the £8,200 stock transferred to Barclay under the forged transfer and the interest and dividends paid thereon. In that action the jury found that the transfer was a forgery and, had not been executed by Honnywill or with his authority, and for the purpose of this action it was agreed that the defendants were bound by that finding."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., found as a fact that there was no negligence either on the part of the defendants or their agents, or on the part of the registrar or of any official of the corporation. After a full and careful review of the authorities, he came to the conclusion that in the present case, as between the two innocent persons, the plaintiffs and the defendants, the loss should be borne by the defendants, who had innocently caused the plaintiffs to act upon an instrument which turned out to be invalid. His lordship also thought that sub-section 1 of section 30 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883, relied on by the defendants, did not afford them any defence, and, except upon the question of negligence, did not appear to him to affect the point he had to decide. His lordship then gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, and made a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to be indemnified by the defendants in respect of the liabilities arising from the transactions.

The defendants appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and F. R. Y. Radcliffe, for the appellants.—There has been no negligence or misrepresentation on the part of the defendants. The corporation was bound to keep a proper register. That being so, the doctrine of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., Anglo-American Telegraph Co. v. Spurling, 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188, applies, and the loss must fall on the plaintiffs.

They also cited Collins v. Evans, 5 Q. B. 820; Toplis v. Grane, 3 Bing. N. C. 636; Childers v. Wooler, 8 W. R. 321, 2 E. & E. 287; Dugdale v. Lovering, 23 W. R. 391, L. R. 10 C. P. 196; Smith v. Keal, 9 Q. B. D. 340, 30 W. R. Dig. 197; In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway, 16 W. R. 862, L. R. 3 Q. B. 584; Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, 42 W. R. 204, [1893] A. C. 396; Dixon v. Kennaway & Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 833, 48 W. R. Dig. 40; Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 9 W. R. 94, 1 J. & H. 243; Johnston v. Renton, 18 W. R. 284, L. R. 9 Eq. 181; Carshore v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 33 W. R. 420, 29 Ch. D. 344; Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 35 W. R. 173, 34 Ch. D. 261.

Danckwerts, K.C., Bankes, K.C., and Waddy, for the plaintiffs.—The corporation was bound to accept the statement of the transferee and register the transfer, unless they could show it was fraudulent. The sending on of the transfer by the defendants to the plaintiffs was in law a representation by them to the plaintiffs that they believed the transfer to be a genuine transfer, and that they had the authority of the registered owner to do so, and the plaintiffs acted on the representation implied from the act of the defendants. The representation was a request to the plaintiffs to do a lawful act. The plaintiffs have thereby sustained the loss which they now seek to recover. There is an implied promise by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. The view expressed by Lindley, J., in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., was dissented from by both Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., in the Court of Appeal.

They referred to Venezuela Railway Co. v. Kisch, L. R. 2 H. L. 99; Redgrave v. Hurd, 30 W. R. 251, 20 Ch. D. 1; Toplis v. Grane, 5 Bing. N. C. 636; Childers v. Wooler, 8 W. R. 321, 2 E. & E. 287; Dugdale v. Lovering, 23 W. R. 391, L. R. 10 C. P. 196; Betts v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57; Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 35 W. R. 173, 34 Ch. D. 261; Carshore v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 33 W. R. 420, 29 Ch. D. 344; Hart v. Frontino Gold Mining Co., L. R. 5 Ex. 111, 18 W. R. Dig. 57; Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82; Dixon v. Kennaway & Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 833; Richardson v. Williamson, L. R. 6 Q. B. 276, 19 W. R. Dig. 87; Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, 35 W. R. 92, 18 Q. B. D. 54; Oliver v. Bank of England, 50 W. R. 340, [1902] 1 Ch. 610; Boston and Albany Railroad Co. v. Richardson, 135 Mass. 473; and Brown v. Howard Fire Insurance Co., 42 Maryland 384.

Radcliffe, in reply, referred to Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 2 E. & B. 647; Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 407, 8 Q. B. D. 296, 30 W. R. 591, 9 Q. B. D. 59; Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 A. C. 337; and Nickalls v. Merry, L. R. 7 H. L. 530.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., in an action tried by him without a jury. The facts will be found sufficiently set forth in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. Shortly, they seem to me to come to this. One Honnywill was the owner of £8,200 stock of the Sheffield Corporation Redeemable Stock. This stock was created under the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1883, and the duties of the corporation in respect of the transfer of stock are controlled by sections 27 to 32 of that Act. This stock, by means of a forged transfer, purported to be transferred to Barclay, the defendant. The defendants, the firm of Barclay & Co., on the 15th of April, 1893, sent to the plaintiffs the forged transfer with a covering letter in the following terms. [His lordship read the letter, and continued:] This letter did not enclose the certificate of Timbrell and Honnywill, who purported to be the vendors and to have executed the transfer to Barclay. The Sheffield Corporation, however, had in their possession this certificate, having received it on account of the vendors from their brokers. The signature of Honnywill was a forgery, and in the year 1900 Honnywill brought an action against the corporation claiming the rectification of the register by inserting his name as the holder of the £8,200 stock transferred to Barclay under the forged transfer, and the interest and dividends paid thereon. The jury found that the transfer was a forgery, and for the purposes of this action it was agreed that the defendants were bound by that finding. The Sheffield Corporation thereupon, in compliance with the said judgment, purchased stock for the sum of £8,645 10s., and appropriated the same to Honnywill, and further paid to him a sum for dividends and interest and also his taxed costs of the said action.

The Sheffield Corporation, in the present action, claim that the defendants are liable to repay them the moneys so paid as aforesaid and to indemnify the plaintiff corporation in respect of the said liabilities. The plaintiffs shape their case in this way. They say that the plaintiffs have done a lawful act at the request of the defendants, which lawful act had caused the plaintiffs damage, and that, therefore, the defendants were liable for the damage so caused to the plaintiffs. They also say that the question whether a contract of indemnity ought to be implied is in each case a question of fact; and that the implication ought to be made in this case by reason of the defendants having sent in to the plaintiffs the forged transfer at the time when they requested, or, to use the word of the special Act, demanded registration and a certificate. Before dealing more particularly with the terms of the Sheffield Act and the authorities bearing on the circumstances justifying an implication of a contract of indemnity. I wish to say at once that I regard what the defendants did and the act of the corporation thereupon as being aptly described by the words of Bramwell, B., in Hart v. Frontino Gold Mining Co.: "I made you a tender of myself as shareholder and you accepted me, and I have acted upon that acceptance." And I do not think that the defendants in sending in a transfer to the corporation gave any warranty to the corporation, or made any material representation to the corporation that the transferor was the registered holder of the stock: see the judgment of Lord Field in The Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, where he says a purchaser sending in the transfer to the corporation makes no misrepresentation which might estop him as against the corporation; see also an observation of Brett, L.J., to the same effect in Simm v. Anglo-American Co. (Limited).

I will now deal with the authorities. It seems to me perfectly clear that a distinction must be drawn between cases where a request is made to some one who has no duty in the matter independently of the request, and a case where the request is made to one who has a duty in the matter independently of the request. In the former case, where that which is requested to be done does not appear to be illegal, and an act is done in accordance with the request, the implication of a contract of indemnity by the person making the request will generally be made. In the latter case something more than a mere request will be required to raise the contract of indemnity. This distinction is apparent by a comparison of the cases of indemnity claimed by sheriffs with cases where an indemnity is claimed by those who have no duty in the matter. The fact is that in the latter class of cases the request or instruction is the sole cause of this act. In the former the performance of the duty is, or may be, the dominant cause. Collins v. Evans is a case in the Exchequer Chamber, in which the defendants, having reason to believe and actually believing a fact to be true and representing it as such to the sheriffs, who had a duty in the matter, were held not to be liable to an action, although it turned out in the event that they were mistaken; and Tindal, C.J., distinguished that case from the case of Humphrys v. Pratt, 5 Bligh. N. S. 154, on the ground that in that case the plaintiff pointed out the goods and required the sheriff to take them. Childers v. Wooler is a case on the same lines, in which the defendant Wooler, as attorney for the plaintiff in a suit, caused a writ of fi. fa. to be issued upon the judgment, and the usual indorsement of the amount to be levied was followed continuously by these words; "The defendant is a (here there was a blank), and resides at Redcar, in your Bailliewick"; and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the indorsement was nothing more than a mere statement by the attorney for the purpose of affording information to the sheriff, leaving the sheriff to his own discretion as to how he would act. On the other line of cases one finds as examples Toplis v. Grane, in which the defendant authorizes the plaintiffs as brokers to distrain, and the plaintiffs, after asking for an indemnity, proceeded to distrain and took some privileged goods in bonâ fide compliance with the defendant's direction, without, however, having obtained an indemnity, and the defendant was held liable. And, again, in Betts v. Gibbins goods were deposited with the plaintiffs for N., who took two casks away, and the defendant ordered the plaintiffs not to deliver the residue of the goods, which order the plaintiffs obeyed. The plaintiffs being sued and having paid a sum of money and costs to compromise the action, it was held in an action by the plaintiffs against the defendant that a promise to indemnify to the full amount claimed might be implied from the facts. These were cases in which there was no relation of principal and agent, and the mere request or instruction by the defendant to the plaintiffs, to withhold the goods from N., obeyed by the plaintiffs, was held to be sufficient evidence to raise a contract of indemnity. Where the relation of principal and agent exists it is a fortiori that a contract of indemnity may arise on the facts. These cases illustrate the distinction which I have drawn. I will now deal with the special provisions of the Sheffield Act, although I do not think that they differ materially from the provisions to be found in the Companies Act, 1862. The most material provisions seem to me to be section 25 (1), which requires the corporation to keep books in which shall be entered the names and addresses of the holders from time to time of corporation stock; and (2) that the corporation stock register shall be primâ facie evidence of the title of the persons entered therein as holders of stock. 26 (1) Which provides on demand of the holder of corporation stock, the corporation may if they think fit give him a certificate of proprietorship thereof; (2) that a stock certificate shall be primâ facie evidence of the title of the person therein named. 29 (1) Provides that where stock is transferable by deed (which is this case); (4) the deed of transfer when duly executed shall be delivered to and kept by the corporation or the registrar, and the corporation or the registrar shall enter a memorial thereof in the register of transfers; (5) the corporation or the registrar shall on demand and on delivery up of the old stock certificate, or on proof satisfactory to the corporation of its absence, deliver a new stock certificate to the purchaser; (6) until the deed of transfer has been so delivered the corporation shall not be affected thereby, and the purchaser of stock shall not be entitled to receive any dividend thereon. 30. (1) The corporation or the registrar, before allowing any transfer of stock, may, if the circumstances of the case appear to make it expedient, require evidence of the title of any person claiming a right to make the transfer.

It seems to me that in this case those who sent the old certificate to the corporation—that is to say, those who claim to be vendors—claim a right to make the transfer, and in my judgment all that Barclays did was to tender the transfer for acceptance, and the corporation accepted the transfer. The case, as pointed out by Bramwell, B., in Hart v. Frontino Gold Mining Co., is analogous to the case of a bonâ fide holder of a bill of exchange presenting it for payment to a banker. If the banker pays it he cannot afterwards recover the money from the holder on the ground that the name of the drawer was forged. Lindley, J., took the same view in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. In my judgment the provisions of the special Act bring this case within the observations of Blackburn, J., in the case of In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway, approved by Lord Herschell in The Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson. Those observations run thus: "That when joint stock companies were established it was a great object that the shares should be capable of being easily transferred; that the Legislature had accordingly provided for the keeping of a register of the members, in order to keep which the company must alter the register whenever there was a transfer of its shares"; and the learned judge drew attention to section 31 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides that a company may give certificates, and that these shall be primâ facie evidence of the title of the person named to the shares specified, and pointed out that by granting the certificate the company make a statement that they have transferred the shares specified to the person named in it, and that he is the holder of the shares; that if the company have been deceived and the statement is not true, they may not be guilty of negligence, but they and no one else had power to inquire into the matter. The learned judge expressed the opinion that it was the intention of the Legislature that these certificates should be documents on which buyers might safely act, and continued thus: "It is quite clear that a statement of a fact was made by the company on which the company at the very least knew that persons wanting to purchase shares might act. And the claimants having bonâ fide acted upon that statement and suffered damage, can they recover from the company? I think they can on the principle enunciated in Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654." And Lord Herschell in Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson points out that it makes no difference whether it is the purchasers who are seeking to render the company liable by way of estoppel, or the vendor of the shares who himself received the certificate from the company, because it must equally have been within the contemplation of the company that a person receiving the certificate from them might on the face of it enter into a contract to sell the shares. It seems to me to be the fact in the present case.

I have only now to deal with the case directly bearing on the position and rights relatively of the person who tenders a transfer for acceptance and the company who accept it. It was not really contested in argument before us but that the corporation had some duties towards the person tendering the transfer. It was admitted that it was their duty to look at their register; and it was admitted that, in some cases at all events, the character of the duty was such that the issue of the certificate might raise an estoppel against the corporation if they neglected that duty. Indeed, the House of Lords in the case of Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson affirmed the judgment in favour of the plaintiff on the basis of the estoppel arising on the issue of the certificate; and it seems to me that in the main the opinions of the law lords were rather in favour of than contrary to the opinion of Bramwell, B., in Hart v. Frontino Gold Mining Co., and Lindley, J., in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. It is true that Lord Macnaghten in his judgment says: "Whether under such circumstances a person ought to be permitted to rely upon a misrepresentation innocently made to which he has in a sense and to a certain extent contributed is, I think, a matter not unworthy of consideration. The point, however, was not argued; the evidence bearing upon it was not sifted, and the attention of the learned counsel for the respondents was not called to it. It would not, therefore, be right for me to say more than that in my opinion there is nothing to prejudice the question if it should ever be raised, even under circumstances similar to those which have occurred in the present case. With this reservation, I concur in the motion that has been proposed." But this doubt as to the estoppel seems to me rather to negative than to affirm that in such a case there would be evidence upon which to raise an implied contract of indemnity. Then, again, Lord Field, after affirming in general terms the view of Lord Herschell, and agreeing in the view that a transferor who has entered into a contract to deliver valid shares upon the face of a certificate of his ownership issued to him by the company is in the same position as a purchaser, goes on to say: "I can very well understand that there may be cases in which, the untruth of the statement not depending upon any fact within the knowledge of the company as to which they have means of knowledge, which they reasonably ought to have recourse to, and the person setting up the estoppel having equal means of knowledge, and having applied for and obtained the certificate upon an alleged transfer, I say there may be such cases in which no such estoppel may exist." And he goes on to say that such a state of things existed in Simms v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., and to agree with the Court of Appeal in that case that there was no duty upon that company to inquire of a registered holder whether the signature was genuine, although it was the practice to do so. This passage raises a doubt as to estoppel in other cases; but the next passage seems to me distinctly to negative the raising of any contract of indemnity against the person presenting the transfer, in case it turns out in fact not to have been executed by the person purporting to be the transferor, for he says, "In sending in a transfer to a company for registration it does not appear to me that the applicants give any warranty or even make a material representation to the company that the transferor is the registered holder of the shares." But in the same judgment he says that it is at least the duty of a company, before affixing the seal of the company to a representation which they know that the applicant requires as evidence of title upon which he may go into the market and make contracts of sale, according to the regulations of the Stock Exchange, and involving the duty of making a complete delivery of genuine shares, to ascertain by reference to their own register whether the proposed transferor appears to be the holder of the shares which he purports to transfer or is the registered holder of the shares. How can it be said, in a case in which the corporation had a statutory duty to accept or reject the transfer, a contract of indemnity is raised against the person who, in presenting the transfer, gave no warranty and made no material representation? So to hold, in my judgment, would be inconsistent with business and would materially impede that traffic in shares and stocks which is essential to the very existence of joint stock companies and to the floating of loans to municipal corporations. In my judgment, the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was wrong and ought to be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. After the judgment of the Lord Justice I will only say a few words. In the first place it is important to remember that the sole question before us is whether a contract of indemnity can be implied. I say this, because it may well be that the transaction between the parties gave rise to some rights on the part of the corporation against the defendants. For instance, if the corporation had been fortunate enough to discover the forgery in good time, and before the defendants had in any substantial way altered their position on the faith of the certificate issued to them, it would have been entitled to bring an action against the defendants to recover the certificate, and to establish the right of the corporation to remove the name of the defendant E. E. Barclay from the register of stockholders in respect of the stock in question. But can a contract of indemnity be implied? Now that kind of contract is a very onerous one on the part of the person who has to indemnify, and is one not lightly to be implied. And in the circumstances of this case it appears to me that it ought not to be implied. This is not the case where a person, having no independent duty or obligation to do a particular act, does that act at the request and for the purposes of another. In such a case, if the act is one not known by him at the time to be illegal, but is one that turns out to be wrongful, the person doing the act may make the person requesting it indemnify him under an implied contract. But in the present case it was in the interests of the corporation itself to keep the register of stockholders and issue certificates, and the corporation was bound to keep the register correctly. The defendants were obliged to send in the transfer to E. E. Barclay, and to get the transferee registered by the corporation, assuming (as the facts were) that they believed the transfer to be genuine, and desired, accordingly, to be duly recognized as holders of the stock. The corporation did not act voluntarily on the request for registration made by the defendants. It acted because of the duty cast upon it, and (partly, at any rate) for its own purposes. When it received the transfer it had a duty or obligation cast upon it, as between itself and the transferors, to see that the transfer was really the act of the transferors. Accordingly the corporation took such steps as seemed to it sufficient to satisfy itself that the transfer was genuine. It compared the signatures of the transferors in its possession with the signatures to the transfer, and sent notice to the transferors that it was going to act on the transfer if no objection was taken by them. In fact, the corporation judged and acted for itself in dealing with the transfer, and did not act merely on the request of the defendants. Nor is this a case where, as between these parties in favour of the corporation, the authenticity of the signatures of the transferors is to be taken to be a matter exclusively in the knowledge of the defendants. As a matter of business it cannot be that the corporation was entitled to assume that the transferee of stock in ordinary course had personally the means of seeing, or ought by self or agent to see to the actual execution of the transfer by the transferors. The purchase and transfer of stocks and shares on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere could never practically be carried out if the purchaser was in each case, having regard to his possible future dealings, bound to see by himself or his agent personally to the execution of the transfer by the transferor. And I think the corporation must be taken to have known this. The transferee is not, in reference to the transfer, in the same position as the corporation is with regard to the position of the transferor as registered owner of the stock; for the register of stockholders is in the possession of the corporation, and the corporation is bound to keep it correctly. This being so, it appears to me that all that could be assumed by the corporation as against the transferee sending in the transfer for registration was that the transferee had taken reasonable care in the matter, and had reasonable ground for believing and did believe that the transfer, which, on the face of it, purported to be executed by the transferor, was, in fact, so executed. No representation could, in my opinion, be implied, under the circumstances, against the transferee beyond what the corporation was entitled to assume against him as above stated. I think, therefore, that no warranty of the execution of the transfer by the transferor ought to be implied as between the transferee and the corporation. But I may point out that, even if some representation beyond what I have above stated could, under the circumstances, be implied as against the defendants, or even if a warranty could be implied as against them, it would not of necessity follow that a contract of indemnity should be implied. A warranty and a contract of indemnity are distinct; one important difference being the period from which the Statute of Limitations would run. And, in the present case, whatever other implications might be made against the defendants, I think it would not be right to imply a contract of indemnity.

STIRLING, L.J.—The facts which gave rise to this action may be stated very shortly. The plaintiffs are the corporation of Sheffield, and have, under the authority of a private Act of Parliament, issued certain stock, bearing interest at 3½ per cent. The Act imposes on the plaintiffs duties with respect to the registration of transfers of such stock and the issue of certificates to stockholders. The defendant Barclay is a member of a banking company (his co-defendants), who made an advance to customers on the security of what purported to be a transfer to him of £8,200 of the corporation stock. This transfer he sent to the plaintiffs with a request that it might be registered and new certificates issued. With this request the plaintiffs complied. The defendants' customers then sold the stock, and the defendant Barclay concurred in a transfer to the purchasers. Some years afterwards it was discovered that the transfer to the defendant was a forgery, and the plaintiffs were compelled to make good the loss to the true owners of the stock. This action is brought by the plaintiffs to obtain indemnity from the defendants against the loss thus sustained by the plaintiffs. It is admitted, on the one hand, that the plaintiffs acted without any negligence; and, on the other, that the defendants acted in perfect good faith. The provisions of the plaintiffs' Act as to keeping a register of transfers and the issue of certificates do not materially differ from from those contained in the Companies Act, 1862; and with reference to them it was pointed out by the court in In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway that the effect was to make the shares of the company more easily dealt with, and, consequently, of greater value. This view was adopted, and acted on by the House of Lords in Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson. The provisions of the plaintiffs' Act, although they impose a burden on the plaintiffs, are, nevertheless, to their advantage; for in the absence of them it might be presumed that the stock could not have been issued with equal advantage to the plaintiffs. The Act does not expressly confer any right of indemnity on the plaintiffs; and if any such right exists it must arise by implication of law. The main contention before us is that there is on the part of the defendants an obligation so arising. Now the mere performance of a duty imposed by law on any one holding a definite legal position does not constitute a consideration sufficient to support a promise to him by the person to whom the duty is owed. If, however, the person who owes the duty at the request of him to whom it is due departs from the strict legal course of performance of that duty or puts himself in a different position from that created by law, then a consideration may arise for a promise express or implied. This is illustrated by the cases relating to the indemnity of sheriffs, which were much relied on in the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs. It was decided in Bridge v. Gage, Cro. Jac. 103, that a promise to pay money to a sheriff in consideration of his executing a writ of elegit, which the sheriff by the common law was bound to execute without remuneration, could not be enforced by action. In Arundel v. Gardiner, Cro. Jac. 652, it was held that a promise made by an execution creditor to a sheriff to save him harmless in consideration that he would execute a writ of fi. fa. by seizing particular goods was enforceable. In Humphrys v. Pratt a sheriff who had at the request of the execution creditor seized particular goods was held by the House of Lords to be entitled to an indemnity, although not expressly agreed to by the execution creditor. There is, unfortunately, no report of what was said by the noble and learned lords who addressed the House; but in Collins v. Evans the ratio decidendi is explained by Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber.

If, then, the goods are simply pointed out to the sheriff and he is left to follow his discretion—that is to say, to take the legal course—he is not entitled to indemnity; but if he is required to seize them he is. The sheriff in the latter case gives up his right to make inquiry as to the ownership of the goods and take steps for his own protection, in case there should be forthcoming a claim as to them other than the judgment claim, and puts himself in the position of a mandatory or agent of the execution creditor for the purpose of taking the goods; and is held to be entitled to the benefit of an implied agreement for his indemnity. In the present case the plaintiffs were under a statutory obligation to register transfers and issue certificates; the defendant called on them to perform their duty under the statute with regard to the transfer which he forwarded to them; and, as it seems to me, he did nothing more. The plaintiffs were left to perform their legal obligations; they gave up no right, and assumed no different position to the defendant than that created by the statute; and, in my judgment, are not entitled to the indemnity sought in the action. Inasmuch as the defendant Barclay was admittedly innocent of anything in the shape of fraud, the plaintiffs had not and did not in fact claim to have any cause of action based on misrepresentation. It was suggested, though somewhat faintly, that the defendant warranted to the plaintiffs the genuineness of the transfer. In my judgment the defendant did not give any such warranty. I think that the true nature of the transaction between the plaintiffs and the defendants is as stated by Lord Lindley (then Lindley, J.) in his judgment in the case of Anglo-American Telegraph Co. v. Spurling; but, further, it seems to me that, even if the warranty was given, the Statute of Limitations, which is pleaded, is an answer to any claim founded on it; for the warranty was broken and the cause of action (if any) accrued more than six years before the commencement of this action. The learned Lord Chief Justice based his decision on that of the Court of Appeal in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., which he held to be an authority for the proposition that, as between two innocent parties, one who had innocently and without negligence handed in a forged transfer upon which a joint stock company (under the Companies Act, 1862) was asked to act, the loss was to fall upon the person who handed in the transfer. I desire to point out that the position of the plaintiffs in that case does not in all respects resemble that of the defendant Barclay in the present. The bank for whom the plaintiffs in Simms v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. were trustees had, before action brought, received payment of their advances in full from their customers, who had not dealt with the stock or acted on the certificate issued by the company; whereas in the present case the defendant Barclay and his customers have dealt with stock on the faith (as I understand) of the certificate issued by the Corporation of Sheffield. The materiality of this circumstance is shown by The Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, to which, unfortunately, the attention of the Lord Chief Justice does not appear to have been called. The House of Lords there held that a person who has procured the registration of an invalid transfer of shares in a joint stock company, and to whom certificates have been issued, is entitled, if he has sold the shares on the faith of those certificates, to recover damages from the company upon a refusal to register his purchasers as owners of the shares. It is quite true that there the invalidity was not the result of forgery, and that this was one of the grounds by which the case of Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. was distinguished; but, at the same time, it seems to have been the opinion of Brett and Cotton L.JJ., that the plaintiffs in that action would, notwithstanding the forgery, have had a good title as against the company so long as the advances made by the bank remained unpaid. However this may be, all the learned judges of the Court of Appeal expressly leave open the question raised by the action of Anglo-American Telegraph Co. v. Spurling, which Lindley, J., had decided adversely to the company. With that decision I agree; and, in my judgment, this appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Maples, Teesdale, & Co; R. F. & C. L. Smith, for H. Sayer, Sheffield.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — June 30, 1903.

VAN LAUN & CO v. BARING BROTHERS & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Interpleader—Appeal—Summary decision at chambers—Ord. 57 rr. 9, 11—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 17—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 1 (b); s. 5; Schedule.

Where upon an interpleader summons the judge decides the question under ord. 57, r. 9, without directing an issue or ordering a special case to be stated, there is no appeal from his decision, even with leave, the Judicature Act, 1894, not having modified or in any way altered section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers in interpleader proceedings.

The defendants, Baring Bros. & Co. (Limited), guaranteed to the plaintiff the payment of moneys which should become due to him under a contract which he had made with the Russian Government. Subsequently an action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover a sum of money under the guarantee. A charge was given by the plaintiff to one Chatterton upon the moneys received under the contract, and two separate charges were also given by the plaintiff upon the moneys received under the contract over and above the sum of £15,565 in favour of one Mosino and one Lewison for the repayment of sums of £2 000 and £1,000 respectively. By the judgment in the action the defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £2 748. These moneys were claimed in the hands of the defendants by Chatterton, and also by Mosino and Lewison. The defendants thereupon took out an interpleader summons, and the master directed an issue to be tried as to the title to the moneys.

On appeal Phillimore, J., set aside the order of the master, and heard the matter summarily under ord. 57, r. 9, being of opinion that the question was one of law turning upon the construction of the documents. The learned judge made an order that the claims of Mosino and Lewison should be barred upon the ground that their charges had not come into effect, as the plaintiff had not received in all the sum of £15,565 under the contract, and he ordered the £2 748 to be paid out to Chatterton. He gave leave to appeal.

Lewison appealed from the order so far as it barred his claim.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for Chatterton, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay even with leave.—The learned judge having decided the merits of the claims in a summary manner under ord. 57, r. 9, no appeal lies from his decision, and there is no power to give leave to appeal: Waterhouse v. Gilbert, 15 Q. B. D. 569, 33 W. R. Dig. 158; Bryant v. Reading, 34 W. R. 496, 17 Q. B. D. 128; Lyon v. Morris, 35 W. R. 707, 19 Q. B. D. 139; In re Tarn, 41 W. R. 397, [1893] 2 Ch. 280. Unless the Judicature Act, 1894, has altered the law, there is no appeal. That Act has not altered the law. Section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, stands unaffected by that Act. Section 5 of the Act of 1894 gives power to make rules with respect to matters contained in and regulated by the enactments described in the schedule, and among those enactments is section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. No rules have, however, been made under that section giving a right of appeal in such a case as this. No appeal therefore lies.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Lewis Thomas, for Lewison.—The effect of section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1894, is to repeal or modify section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and to allow a limited right of appeal by leave. That section, read with the schedule to the Act, gives power to make rules as to matters regulated by section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. As no rules have been made, it must be taken that ord. 57, r. 11, is to be deemed to be a rule made under the powers of section 5, and therefore an appeal lies with leave. Moreover, an appeal lies with leave under section 1, sub-section 1 (b), of the Judicature Act, 1894. Waterhouse v. Gilbert is not in point, because that case only decided that no appeal lay from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal.

They referred to Robinson v. Tucker, 32 W. R. 697, 14 Q. B. D. 371; Dawson v. Fox, 33 W. R. 514, 14 Q. B. D. 377; Webb v. Shaw, 34 W. R. 415, 16 Q. B. D. 658.*

J. R. Atkin replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers in an interpleader matter disposing of the merits of the claims in a summary manner. The question appearing to the learned judge to be one of law, he decided it under ord 57, r. 9. The objection has been taken that no appeal lies from that decision even with leave.

It seems to me that upon the authorities we are bound to hold that no appeal lies. To my mind, considerable difficulty was involved in taking the first step and saying that ord. 57, r. 11, was not incompatible with section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and did not modify that section. Rule 11 provides that, except where otherwise provided by Statute, the decision of the court or a judge in a summary way, under rule 8, shall be final and conclusive, unless by special leave of the court or judge, or of the Court of Appeal. That was the difficulty, but it was explained by the Court of Appeal, the explanation being that the words at the beginning of the rule, "except where otherwise provided by statute," compelled the court to ascertain whether the matter had been regulated by statute. The statute which regulates it is section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and that section makes the decision of the court or judge in a summary manner final and conclusive against the parties and all persons claiming by, from, or under them; and it has been decided that that section prohibits an appeal. That has been laid down as the proper construction of rule 11. In the present case the decision of the learned judge was a decision in a summary manner, and though he gave leave to appeal it does not prevent the decision from being final and conclusive under section 17. That is involved in Waterhouse v. Gilbert, which is the foundation of the present law. In that case the master decided the case summarily at chambers against the execution creditor, but gave leave to appeal. The judge at chambers held that no appeal would lie, and the leave to appeal was of no avail. There was then an appeal to the Divisional Court, who again held that no appeal lay. From that there was an appeal to this court, and this court held that no appeal lay to them. It is contended that the Court of Appeal only decided that no appeal lay from the Divisional Court. But the question was considered one of sufficient importance for the full court to determine it, and it is obvious that the court were not deciding the mere question whether an appeal lay from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal. The whole object of having the full court, was to decide whether rule 11 had modified section 17 so as to let in an appeal by leave. The court decided that the rule had not in any way affected section 20 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and applying section 20 to section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, they held that in such a case as the one before them there was no appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court, nor any power in the Divisional Court or in this court to give leave to appeal to this court. Though not expressly decided, the real ground of the decision was that the provisions of section 17 were unaffected by rule 11, and that, therefore, the decision of the judge at chambers was final. That was followed in the next year (1886) in Bryant v. Reading, and in 1887 in Lyon v. Morris. Lastly came the case of In re Tarn, where it was decided that, where in interpleader proceedings a judge decides a question under ord. 57, r. 9, without directing an issue or stating a special case, his decision is a summary decision within the meaning of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, s. 17, and is not subject to appeal. That is an express decision upon the point in question. Those decisions establish conclusively that there is no appeal in such a case as this, and any dicta of judges before Waterhouse v. Gilbert which are inconsistent with those decisions must be taken to be wrong.

It is next contended that section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1894, has to some extent repealed or modified section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and that as that section gives power to make rules it must be taken that ord. 57, r. 11, is now a rule made in the exercise of that power. Section 5 gives power to make rules with respect to the matters contained in and regulated by the enactments described in the schedule to the Act; and one of the enactments described in the schedule is section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. That seems to me to be as clear a statement as possible by the Legislature that section 17 remains unrepealed. It would be a curious result if we were to say that the effect of it was to repeal that which the Legislature says is in force. So far from saying that it is repealed, the Legislature has asserted its continued vitality. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

* They also contended that Phillimore, J., acted under a misapprehension in dealing with the matter summarily where the amount in dispute was so large, thinking that there was an appeal, and that he would not have done so if he had thought that no appeal lay. They therefore asked the Court to refer the matter back to him in order that he might direct an issue to be tried.

We are asked in effect to overrule four decisions of the Court of Appeal from Waterhouse v. Gilbert to In re Tarn. It is impossible for us to say that the matter is now open unless it can be said that the Judicature Act, 1894, has made some alteration in the law as so laid down. I confess that I am unable to see how that Act has done so. The Act contains an express assertion that section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, is still in force.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Swepstone & Stone.

Solicitor for the respondent, H. W. Chatterton.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Nov. 10.

In re HOUSTOUN'S SETTLEMENT.
SPARKES v. HUTCHELL. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Copies of documents for the judge.

Where the court is asked to construe the terms of a document, a copy should be provided for its use, and the costs of such copy should be allowed on taxation.

In this case the decision depended entirely on the construction which the court might place on the terms of two indentures of settlement. No copies of these deeds had been provided for the use of the judge, it being stated in explanation that costs of such copies were commonly disallowed by the taxing-master.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the trustees, the plaintiffs.

Fowler and M. D. Warmington, for defendant tenants for life.

Wood, for defendant remaindermen.

FARWELL, J., said that it was quite impossible for a judge to decide on the construction of documents without having copies before him. In his opinion the costs of copies supplied for the use of the judge ought always to be allowed, and if it was not the practice to allow them he was prepared to make an order in every case before him which turned on the construction of documents that such costs should be allowed.

Solicitors, Farrer & Co.; Hunter & Haynes.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } July 31; Aug. 1, 3, 12, 1903.

TENDRING HUNDRED WATERWORKS CO. v. JONES. (b.)

Solicitor—Partnership—Fraud of partner—Liability of partners—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict c. 39), s. 11 (b).

J. & G., who were solicitors, entered into a partnership deed by which all appointments held by G. were to be comprised in the business. G. was secretary to a company. The company, for purposes of their own, had property bought by them conveyed into the name of G., who retained the title-deed. The transaction was carried through by the firm of J. & G. It was no part of the duty of G., as secretary, to take a conveyance of real estate of the company or to take charge of the title-deeds of the company. G. raised money on deposit of the title-deed, and subsequently executed a legal mortgage to N. J. had no notice of the conveyance to G., except in so far as the firm of J. & G. had acted for the purchasers in the matter.

Held, that J. & G., being partners only as far as the secretaryship of the company was concerned, and the company by vesting the legal estate in G., having thus enabled him to withdraw the deed in his capacity as trustee, there was no implied contract that the firm of J. & G. were to be responsible for the deed after it had been handed over to G., as the legal owner; and consequently that J. was not liable for his partner's fraud.

On the 30th of September, 1895, the defendant Jones took C. E. Garrard into partnership with him in the business of a solicitor at Manningtree. Jones had another business as solicitor at Colchester, with which Garrard had nothing to do.

The first clause of the partnership deed was as follows: "The said H. W. Jones and C. E. Garrard will become and remain partners in the profession of solicitors at Manningtree aforesaid, but not elsewhere or otherwise, such partnership business to consist of the ordinary business of a solicitor of the High Court of Justice and Bankruptcy, and shall include conveyancing and all other matters of business usually undertaken by solicitors, and shall comprise and include all present appointments now or hereafter during the said partnership, held by the said H. W. Jones in the Tendring Hundred but not elsewhere, and by the said C. E. Garrard in the said Tendring Hundred or elsewhere, or either of them, as well as all premiums payable to either partner in respect of any articled clerk in the said Tendring Hundred, and which premiums shall be deemed part of the partnership profits of the year in which such premium or premiums shall be received, but all sums received by either partner in his capacity as a commissioner to administer oaths, for swearing affidavits, or taking declarations shall not be included or form part of the partnership business aforesaid, but all receipts and income from the said H. W. Jones's appointment as clerk to the Tendring Hundred Justices, and all receipts and income from the said C. E. Garrard's present appointments as well as any future appointments to be obtained by the said C. E. Garrard and H. W. Jones . . . shall constitute and form part of the said partnership business and assets as from the 24th of June, 1895, during the term of fourteen years if the said H. W. Jones and C. E. Garrard shall so long live under the style or firm of 'Jones & Garrard.'" Garrard was secretary of the Tendring Hundred Waterworks Co., the present plaintiffs.

In the month of October, 1897, the plaintiffs were desirous of buying some land, but did not wish their name to appear in the negotiations as the intending purchasers; and accordingly they instructed the firm of Jones & Garrard to negotiate for the purchase. This was done, and on the 4th of August, 1898, an agreement was entered into between the owners and Garrard for the purchase by Garrard of the property in question. In due course this was reported to the plaintiffs, who resolved "that the land be conveyed to the secretary (C. E. Garrard) for the present, on his undertaking to convey to the company when called upon," and a cheque for £503 11s. 11d. was drawn in favour of Garrard. This cheque was paid into Garrard's private account, but the amount subsequently passed into the firm's account in two sums at two different dates.

On the 21st of October, 1898, the conveyance, duly executed by Garrard, was sent to London with the firm's cheque for £510, and on the 27th of October

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

it was executed by the vendors and returned to Jones & Garrard. It was a simple conveyance to Garrard in fee, but contained a covenant by him to fence off the purchased property and keep such fence in good repair.

On the 4th of November, 1898, the completion of the purchase was reported to the board. Neither the plaintiff company nor anyone else ever informed the defendant Jones that the conveyance was taken in Garrard's sole name; nor had he any notice or knowledge of the transaction until after Garrard's fraud, hereinafter mentioned, had been committed, except so far as he was fixed with notice by reason of the approval of the conveyance by his firm and the receipt of payment for the same.

From the 10th of February, 1893, until the 10th of April, 1902, plaintiffs rented a safe in the Chancery Lane Safe Deposit Co. It was no part of the duty of the secretary of the company to hold the company's deeds, or to accept conveyances of their land in his name. No resolution of the board expressly referring to the custody of the deed of conveyance of the land was ever passed.

On the 23rd of November, 1899, Garrard deposited the deed with F. J. Nunn to secure £500 lent to Garrard by Nunn.

On the 12th of September, 1900, the deeds were returned by Nunn to Garrard "for the purpose of obtaining the money elsewhere."

On the 1st of March, 1901, Garrard resigned his secretaryship of the plaintiff company under compulsion, in consequence of the complaints of the auditors of his neglect in keeping the books.

On the 27th of March, 1901, the defendant commenced proceedings for dissolution of partnership against Garrard; and on the 29th of March he was appointed receiver and manager; and on the 5th of August, 1901, there was judgment for dissolution as from that day.

Meanwhile, on the 10th of May, 1901, Garrard executed a legal mortgage of the land, and handed over the deed to Nunn, who was assumed for the purposes of the action to be a purchaser for value having the legal estate without notice.

The plaintiff company now sought to charge the defendant Jones with the amount necessary to redeem the estate from Nunn.

Upjohn, K.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiffs.—Section 11 (b) of the Partnership Act, 1890, applies, "where a firm in the course of its business receives money or property of a third person, and the money or property so received is misapplied by one or more of the partners while it is in the custody of the firm, the firm is liable to make good the loss." Here Garrard misapplied the deed while in the custody of the firm. The fact that Garrard was a secretary makes no difference. He is a mere servant: Barnett v. South London Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 640, 18 Q. B. D. 815; George Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh, 50 W. R. 218, [1902] A. C. 117, 124.

Jenkins, K.C., and Whinney, for the defendant.—The fact that the conveyance was made in Garrard's name was an authority to hand the deeds over to him: Carritt v. Real and Personal Advance Co., 37 W. R. 677, 42 Ch. D. 263; Ex parte Eyre, 1 Pn. 227.

FARWELL, J., stated the facts and proceeded: Under these circumstances the plaintiffs seek to charge the defendant with the amount necessary to redeem the estate from Nunn. I will assume that the partnership contract bringing Garrard's secretaryship into the common partnership fund imposes on the defendant liability for Garrard's default in the performance of his duty as secretary; but it was no part of such duty either to accept a conveyance of the company's real estate or to take charge of their deeds, or to advise them. The functions of a secretary are primâ facie clerical and ministerial only. To quote Lord Macnaghten in George Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh "They are of a limited and of a somewhat humble character. A secretary, said Lord Esher, is 'a mere servant.'" No loss has been occasioned to the plaintiffs by anything done or omitted by Garrard in his capacity of or within the scope of his employment as secretary. Indeed, Mr. Upjohn did not put his claim on this ground at all. His contention is that the defendant is liable as Garrard's partner under section 11, sub-section (b), of the Partnership Act, 1890, that the defendant's firm drew the conveyance and received the completed deed in the course of their ordinary employment as solicitors for the plaintiffs, and that they have therefore received the property of a third person, and such property has been misapplied by Garrard, one of the partners, while in the custody of the firm. Now, if a client leaves his deeds with his solicitor in the ordinary course of business, and a member of their firm fraudulently deposits them with another in order to raise money on them, I apprehend that the firm would be liable for the loss of the deeds, because such deeds when misapplied were in their custody. The solicitor could of course give no title to the estate comprised therein, but the firm would have to pay the costs incident to their recovery. But that is not this case. The real cause of the loss here is not the loss of the deed, but the conveyance of the legal estate by Garrard. Without such estate he could have made no title, and this loss would not have arisen. Now it is no part of the ordinary duty of a solicitor to accept conveyances of land belonging to his clients into his own name, still less when such conveyances contain covenants by the grantee to expend money. The plaintiffs for their own convenience, and without the consent of or any communication to the defendant personally, have chosen to vest the legal estate in this property in Garrard. Garrard has dealt fraudulently with that estate. How can the plaintiffs charge the loss arising from that fraud to the defendant? They by their own act enabled Garrard to commit it by putting him in a position which it was not within the scope of the partnership business for him to accept, and which gave him the legal title to the estate and the deeds relating thereto. This title enabled him at law to withdraw the deeds from the firm unless some duty was cast on the firm to prevent it. Accordingly it has been argued that the defendant's firm has been guilty of negligence in not preventing the withdrawal of the deeds. It is said that when A. instructs a firm of B. & C. to prepare a conveyance of land to B. in fee, who is in fact, though not so stated in the deed, a trustee for A., and leaves the deed with the firm, the firm is guilty of negligence if it allows B. to have possession of the deed without A.'s assent; and the argument was pushed to the length of applying it to every case of a conveyance to a bare trustee, whether a member of the firm or not, and of keeping the duty alive for any length of time until A. determines it. The argument excludes cases where the trustee is not a bare trustee; and it might perhaps be enough to say that Garrard was not a bare trustee in the present case, but had to perform covenants and was entitled to a lien on the trust property for his indemnity: Morgan v. Swansea Urban Sanitary Authority, 27 W. R. 283, 9 Ch. D. 582.

I do not, however, propose to rest my judgment on this ground alone; for in my opinion no contract can be inferred by the firm in the simple case above stated to do more than to exercise due care and skill in the preparation of the deed and to hand it over to the legal owner. The liability of a solicitor for negligence is a purely common law liability. Such negligence is tort founded on contract, so that an action ex contractu may be brought for the breach of contract or an action ex delicto for the tort. But in either case it is at common law; no bill would lie in equity for the purpose: British Mutual Investment Co. v. Cobbold, 23 W. R. 687, L. R. 19 Eq. 627. The plaintiff has to prove retainer by him of the solicitor for reward to do certain work and negligence in doing it. In this case the solicitors were retained simply to prepare the conveyance to Garrard and to receive the deed when executed and hand it over to the legal owner. They were not asked to advise on the form of the deed or the advisability of taking the conveyance to Garrard, nor were they asked to advise as to the custody of the deed.

In order to succeed, therefore, the plaintiffs must allege and prove that the solicitors were retained for reward to keep possession of the deed until the equitable owner concurred with the legal owner in demanding it, involving the duty of refusing to hand over the deed to the legal owner without such concurrence. There is, of course, no evidence of any such contract in fact; but I am asked to imply it from the plaintiffs' instructions to Garrard, and through him to the firm, to draw the conveyance to Garrard in his own name. It certainly cannot be said that such a contract is usual, so that it can be imported on the ground of known usage. I am not aware of any case in which any such contract is mentioned or suggested, nor were counsel able to refer me to any. It is an onerous duty, involving the possibility of disputes with the legal owner and the necessity of bearing the circumstances in mind during an indefinite period, possibly many years, and no extra remuneration is paid or payable by reason of its existence. But an implied contract (which assumes, of course, the non-existence of any actual contract) is founded on that obligation which ought "in justice and fair dealing" to be deemed to have been undertaken by the party sought to be charged: Freeman v. Jeffries, L. R. 4 Exch. 189, 17 W. R. Dig. 86. I fail to see the justice or fairness in any case of imposing on the partner who knows nothing of the circumstances an onerous duty without reward; but, in the case before me, having regard to the conduct of the plaintiffs, it would be, in my opinion, positively unjust and unfair. The defendant knows nothing of the conveyance of the legal estate to Garrard. The acceptance of it was not within the scope of their partnership agreement. If it has the effect contended for by the plaintiffs, such acceptance was a breach of article 13 of the partnership deed, whereby neither partner was without the consent of the other to contract any liability on account of the partnership or in any way pledge the credit thereof except in the usual and regular course of business. No consideration for this extra liability is given to the firm, and the plaintiffs, who rely on justice and fair dealing themselves, directed Garrard, as their secretary, to take this conveyance for their own convenience and neglected to take such steps as the usual ordinary rules of prudence would have suggested to direct and see that the deeds went to their proper destination. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs, by their own acts and conduct, gave Garrard the legal title to the deed, and that Garrard by virtue of such title withdrew the deeds so that they were not "in the custody of the firm" within section 11, sub-section (b), of the Partnership Act when Garrard handed them over to Nunn. I am further of opinion that no such contract by the firm as alleged can be implied, and that there has therefore been no negligence. I should add that the good faith and honesty of the defendant are undoubted and unchallenged. Nothing that I have said would have any application to a case of collusion with the guilty partner by the other member of the firm. The action fails, and is dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Free & Winckworth.

Solicitors for the defendant, Doyle, Devonshire, & Woodhouse, for Jones & Son, Colchester.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — June 23, 24, 25, 27, 1903.

In re GEIPEL'S PATENT. (a.)

Patent—Petition for revocation—Disclaimer—Terms—Form of order—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18, 19, 20.

On a petition for the revocation of a patent it was held that the patent was valid subject to disclaimer in two respects. In the exercise of its discretion under section 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act 1883, the court ordered that the patent should be revoked unless within three months the patentee obtained leave to amend his specification by making the necessary disclaimer.

Held in the absence of special circumstances, that it should be a term of the court making such order, that if the specification were amended, no injunction should be asked in any action brought for infringement of the patent in respect of any goods made prior to the date of the order, unless the patentee established to the satisfaction of the court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge.

This was a petition for the revocation of a patent, granted in 1893, for improvements in steam traps, which are appliances for the removal from pipes and cylinders of water arising from the condensation of steam therein.

Attached to the complete specification were certain plans, hereinafter referred to as figures 2 and 6, describing modes of using the invention, which his lordship held must be disclaimed—figure 2 on the ground of non-utility, and figure 6 on the ground of disconformity with the provisional specification.

In other respects his lordship held that the patent was valid, and proposed to make an order for revocation unless within three months, or such further period as the court might allow, the patentee should obtain leave to amend the specification by disclaiming figures 2 and 6.

T. Terrell, K.C., Astbury, K.C., and J. H. Gray, for the petitioners.—We ask that it be a term of the patentee being allowed to amend his specification under section 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, that if the specification be amended, no action shall be brought or maintained for infringement of the patent in respect of any steam traps made prior to this date. This is similar to the order which was made in Deeley v. Perkes, [1896] A. C. 496; In re Pitt's Patent, [1900] 1 Ch. 508, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 745; and In re Allison's Patent, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 298, 513. Unless such a term be imposed we shall suffer an injustice. Since 1893 we have established a trade, and the patentee has brought actions not against us, but against our customers. The result has been that we have been forced to bring this petition. Instead of applying at the outset to amend his specification under section 18, he has fought out the action. Section 20, which enables a patentee to recover damages in actions in respect of the use of the invention before the disclaimer, "if the patentee establishes to the satisfaction of the court that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge," has reference only to the case of an amendment under section 18. It is no guide to the court as to the discretion which ought to be exercised, under section 19, in imposing terms on a patentee whose patent would, but for the indulgence of the court, be declared invalid. Not to impose such a term would be to render our previous acts tortious. Even if the orders in the cases cited were made on the ground of special circumstances, we say that there are special circumstances in the present case.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to Moses v. Marsden, 13 R. P. C. 31.

A. J. Walter (Moulton, K.C., with him), for the respondent.—I object to an order like that which was made in Deeley v. Perkes. In the present case there are no special circumstances in favour of the petitioner. He did not commence business with the knowledge that the patent was invalid, or take advice on the subject.

BUCKLEY, J., delivered judgment to the following effect: In Deeley v. Perkes the House of Lords imposed the terms, "That if the specification be amended, no action shall be brought for infringement of the patent in respect of any guns or parts of guns made prior to the date of the appeal" The meaning of that order was that persons who had manufactured articles under that part of the patent which, when the disclaimer had been made, had become valid, should not be sued in respect of work which had been done before the date of the order which enabled the patentee to set himself right by disclaimer.

In In re Pitt's Patent the form of order in Deeley v. Perkes was considered. The Court of Appeal held that it was not to be adopted as a common form. Lindley, M.R., said: "It does not at all follow that it would be proper to impose those terms in other cases simply because liberty is asked to apply for leave to amend a specification by way of disclaimer or otherwise." By that he meant, that in the absence of special circumstances, it is not a matter of course to leave the person who, when the patent has been amended by disclaimer, would thereafter be an infringer if he did the acts complained of, in possession of the profits of having done those acts at a period when the patent was invalid. In that case it was held that there were special circumstances, and the same order was made as in Deeley v. Parkes.

The discretion which I have to exercise is under section 19 of the Act, under which section I might, on finding that the patent requires a disclaimer in order to make it valid, instead of dealing with the matter at once, direct the hearing of the petition to stand over on such terms as I thought fit, till after disclaimer had been made, and then have dealt with it on the new state of facts by refusing to make any order on the petition. The order which I make, that the petition be revoked unless something happens, has the same effect.

The question, then, which I have to consider in the exercise of my discretion is as to what is fair between the petitioner and the respondent. Thinking, as I do, that I ought to give the patentee an opportunity of disclaiming, as in Deeley v. Perkes, ought the person whom I will call the infringer to be protected in respect of the goods which he has manufactured under the infringed patent prior to the date of the order giving leave to amend, or ought he to be exposed to an action in respect of them? Under special circumstances he ought so to be protected; that is shown by In re Pitt's Patent and Deeley v. Perkes. Under ordinary circumstances, it does not follow that he ought to be protected in respect of them.

I have held that the patent requires amendment in respect of two particulars. One of these is figure 2, which represents a method of working the machine which cannot be made to work. The infringer, as I shall continue to call him, has not used figure 2, but he has used another part of the invention which will work. Then there is figure 6, which represents a particular way of producing distortion, and which I have held to be bad for disconformity, because it is not in accordance with the provisional specification.

The question, then, which I have to consider is this: If the "infringer" has availed himself of that part of the patent which after disclaimer will become good, ought he, as against the person who will become the patentee, to be allowed to continue to sell goods made in infringement of that which will hereafter become a valid patent? If he has availed himself neither of figure 2 nor of figure 6, but only of other parts of the patent, and the "original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge," it seems to me that it is fair that there should be room to restrain him, or those who are dealing with his goods, from disposing of the goods thus made.

Section 20 has nothing to do with the case before me, but I think that it indicates the line upon which I ought to exercise my discretion. The effect of that section is this. Suppose a disclaimer is made, and then an action is subsequently brought, damages may be given in respect of the use of the invention in a certain event, and if that event does not happen, then damages cannot be given. There is power to give damages in respect of acts which were rightful when they were done, because the disclaimer had not been made, but which, by reason of the disclaimer, subsequently become wrongful, if it is proved that "the original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge." I think that I ought to make an order here in a form similar to that—that is to say, that the person whom I have called the infringer ought to be protected from an injunction in an action brought for an injunction if the original claim was not framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge, but if the original claim was so framed, then he ought not to be protected in such an action.

I therefore make an order in this form: That if the specification be amended no injunction shall be asked in any action brought for infringement in respect of goods made prior to this date unless the patentee establishes that his original claim was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge. I put the order in that form because, of course, I cannot control any subsequent judge who may have to deal with such an action, but I can control the plaintiff in that action, and I impose the term on him that he shall not ask for an injunction in those circumstances. I therefore make the order in that form.

Solicitors, Frank Evelyn Jones, for W. T. Hill, Manchester; Faithfull & Owen.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 5.

BOSTON v. BOSTON. (a.)

Frauds, Statute of—Interest in land—Memorandum in writing—29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4.

A wife verbally agreed with her husband that if he bought a certain house she would make him a present of it. The husband accordingly bought the house, and sued his wife to recover the amount of the purchase-money.

Held, that this was merely an agreement by the wife to pay her husband the amount of the purchase if he bought the house, and was not a contract for or concerning an interest in land within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and that therefore the action was maintainable though there was no memorandum or note of the contract in writing.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial.

The action was brought by a wife against her husband to recover possession of certain furniture. The husband counterclaimed to recover £1,400 in these circumstances: In September, 1895, the husband and wife were living together and the wife became entitled to a sum of money under her father's will. The wife told her husband that she wanted to live in a larger house, and he said that he could not afford the expense of it. She then said to him, "If you will buy Charlwood" (the house in question), "I will make you a present of it." In consequence of this promise by the wife the husband bought Charlwood for £1,400 and they lived together there until November, 1901. The wife did not pay the husband the £1,400, though she received sufficient money under her father's will to enable her to do so. The wife, in answer to the counterclaim, pleaded, so far as material, the Statute of Frauds.

At the trial before Wills, J., and a jury, the wife obtained judgment on the claim, and the jury found a verdict for the husband on the counterclaim for £1,400.

Wills, J., held that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds did not apply, and gave judgment for him upon the counterclaim.

The wife applied for judgment or a new trial.

Montague Lush, K.C., and J. R. Macoun, for the plaintiff.—This contract is a "contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them" within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and is not enforceable without some note or memorandum thereof in writing. It is not necessary, in order to bring the case within the section, that the contract should be for the sale or transfer of an interest in land by one party to the other. Where the primary object of the contract is an acquisition of an interest in land by either party the contract must be in writing: Cocking v. Ward, 1 C. B. 858; Horsey v. Graham, 18 W. R. 141, L. R. 5 C. P. 9. It is sufficient if the contract "concerns" an interest in land. In Mann v. Nunn, 43 L. J. C. P. 241, the court did not treat section 4 as relating only to a transfer of an interest in land by one party to the other.

Pickford, K.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the defendant.—This is not a contract within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds. The only agreement here is one by the wife to pay the husband a certain sum of money in the event of his buying a certain house. There is no case in which it has been held that section 4 applies except where the contract itself provides for the acquisition of an interest in land by one party from another. Mann v. Nunn is almost exactly the same case as the present; and Angell v. Duke, 23 W. R. 307, L. R. 10 Q. B. 174, shows that such an agreement as this is merely collateral to an agreement for an interest in land. In Cocking v. Ward the court construed the agreement as one for the surrender of the premises, and therefore within section 4. This is no more a contract for or concerning an interest in land than a contract by a house agent to be paid commission on letting a house.

Montague Lush, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Wills, J., in an action which was tried by him with a jury. The question turns upon the counterclaim, and by it the husband claims £1,400 against his wife upon a verbal contract made in these circumstances. The wife said to her husband, "If you will buy Charlwood, I will make you a present of it." The husband accordingly bought Charlwood and gave £1,400 for it, and thereupon the promise of the wife to pay him the amount of the purchase-money arose. The husband's claim is founded upon that bargain between the parties. The wife says that the case comes within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and that the contract is not enforceable as there is no memorandum or note thereof in writing. The contention on her behalf is that the contract is a contract for the sale of land, or at any rate of some interest in or concerning land within section 4. Unless the contract is for one of those things, section 4 is not applicable. It seems to me that when one looks at this contract, it does not involve, as a part of the contract, any "contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them." It is not part of the contract to acquire an interest in land. The bargain merely amounts to this, that if the husband buys Charlwood the wife contracts to pay him the amount of the purchase-money. There is no case, so far as I know, in which it has been held that the statute applies unless by the terms of the contract some interest in or concerning land is dealt with by the contract. In the present case there is a contract by the wife to pay her husband a sum of money to be measured by the amount of the purchase-money which he might pay for an interest in land. The husband did not by the contract undertake to acquire an interest in land. If and when he did acquire such an interest in land he could claim to be reimbursed by his wife under the contract the amount of the purchase-money, upon the ground that he had performed something which gave rise to a promise by her to pay the money. The case is outside the Act both upon principle and upon the authority of Angell v. Duke. The appeal therefore fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract is, in my opinion, not within the statute. Section 4 needs construing as it stands, for it speaks of a "contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them." The contract referred to there must be one operating on an interest in land. In the present case the contract, which must be taken as having been made for good consideration, is one which did not affect the owner of the land, and did not create or deal with any interest in land. It only dealt with a sum of money to be applied in a particular way. It was a contract by the wife to indemnify the husband against the amount of the purchase-money if he bought the land. It was a contract purely collateral to any contract for an interest in the land. Angell v. Duke seems to me to be very much in point, and particularly the judgment of Lush, J., upon the subject of what contracts are within section 4. This contract therefore is not within section 4.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff. Lawson Lewis, Welch, & Wenham, for Leonard Broadbent, Darwen.

Solicitors for the defendant, Monro, Slack, & Atkinson.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 24; July 25, 1903.

POMFRET v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Arising out of and in the course of employment—Unexplained accident—Burden of proof—Inference of fact—Presumption—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the deceased workman, who was a fireman in the service of a railway company, was travelling by train, as he had a right to do, after he had finished work for the day, from the place where he had left his engine to the station where it was his duty to report himself, and that he fell from the train and was killed. It was admitted that the fall was the result of an accident, and that the accident happened in the course of his employment. The evidence as to how the accident happened was that he had a basket with him when he got into the train, and that he stood up to put it into the rack, that the train began to move on while he was standing by the door, and that almost immediately afterwards he fell out.

Held, that there was evidence to justify the county court judge in drawing the inference of fact, apart from any question of presumption, that the accident not only happened in the course of the employment, but also arose out of the employment.

Appeal by the employers from an award of the judge of the Manchester County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a fireman in the employment of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., who met with his death under the following circumstances: It was his duty to report himself every evening, after he had finished his day's work, at Newton Heath Station, and he had the right to travel to that station by any train from the place where he left his engine. While so travelling from Charleston Station on the 27th of December, 1902, he fell from the train and was found lying on the railway line at a place about 300 yards from Charleston Station, suffering from very serious injuries, from which he shortly afterwards died.

It was admitted on the part of the railway company that the fall from the train was accidental, and that the accident happened in the course of the deceased's employment; but it was contended that there was no evidence that it arose out of the employment.

The only evidence as to how the accident happened, was the evidence of a man named Moulton. He stated that he and the deceased and an engine-driver named Williams got into the same compartment at Charleston, that as the train moved out of the station the deceased lowered the window at his end of the compartment, that he (Moulton) was conversing with Williams, and that they had only gone 300 yards when he heard a bang and a crash and the deceased disappeared.

The county court judge held that, the fact of an accident being admitted, and the fact of employment being admitted, and the employers not having proved that the injuries arose from some cause which relieved them from responsibility, the case came within the Act. He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and A. Spencer Hogg, for the employers.—The applicant has failed to establish that the accident arose out of the deceased's employment as well as in the course of the employment. The county court judge was wrong in throwing upon the employers the burden of showing that the accident did not arise out of the employment. This is a case of an unexplained accident, and the principle of Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 35 W. R. 141, 12 App. Cas. 41, applies. The evidence is quite consistent with the supposition that the deceased opened the door for some purpose outside the scope of his employment: Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 47 W. R. 146, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141.

J. R. Randolph, for the applicant.—The county court judge was right. There is no ground for inferring that the deceased was acting outside the scope of his employment and for his own purposes: see McNicholas v. Dawson & Son, 47 W. R. 500, [1899] 1 Q. B. 773. If the county court judge ought to have required further evidence in support of the applicant's case, the evidence of Williams, who was in the same compartment with the deceased, and Moulton, is available.

COLLINS, M.R.—I regret to say that the court are not unanimous in this matter, but we are all of opinion that the case had better go back to the learned county court judge. My own view is that the learned judge misdirected himself. His direction is this: "I hold that, the fact of an accident being admitted, and the fact of employment being admitted, unless the respondents can prove that the injuries arose from some cause which relieved them from responsibility, I should hold the case to be within the Act." That, in my judgment, involves a misdirection. I think that the burden in this case, as in other cases, is on the person who is in the position of plaintiff; and that, as two conditions of obtaining relief are imposed by the statute—viz., that the accident must arise out of and in the course of the employment, the person who comes to claim relief under the statute must show that both of the conditions have been fulfilled. Here the only evidence is that an accident happened during the deceased man's employment. But the learned judge thinks that that is enough, unless the employers give evidence to show that it did not arise out of his employment. That is to say, he throws the onus on the employers. In my judgment, that is wrong. The whole burden of proving the conditions essential to relief rests upon the applicant, and if his case leaves it in doubt whether the conditions are fulfilled or not, if it is equally consistent with the fact of their having been fulfilled and with the fact of their not having been fulfilled, he has not discharged the onus. In my judgment the evidence in this case is wholly consistent with the accident having happened through something which did not arise out of the employment. There seems to me to be no presumption in favour of one view more than another. This brings in the principle of Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co. There negligence was an essential factor, but as the case was entirely consistent with there being negligence or with there not being negligence, the House of Lords held that the onus was not discharged. So here, in my view, the case is entirely consistent with either one or other of the two suppositions, that the accident arose out of the employment, or that it did not arise out of the employment. Therefore, in my judgment, this case has been wrongly decided; but as it is possible that other evidence may be given, we think it desirable that it should go back to the county court judge for further evidence and for reconsideration.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The right to compensation only accrues where a workman has suffered personal injuries from an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. This court has held that the words "out of" are as essential as the words "in the course of": Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.; Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 50 W. R. Dig. 112. Here the learned county court judge omitted to give effect to the provision that the accident must arise out of as well as in the course of the employment. If the deceased opened the door in order to get on to the footboard, and the accident happened through that, it clearly would not have arisen out of the employment, for his sole duty at that time was to travel from one station to another by this particular train. I therefore think the case should go back to be further investigated. I do not wish to be understood as saying that it is not competent for the judge from any particular state of facts which may be proved to draw an inference of fact that the accident arose out of as well as in the course of the employment.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree that this is a case which had better go back to the learned county court judge, but I confess my view, although it is not a final view, is that there is abundant evidence to justify the conclusion which the learned judge came to. I think he drew the inference that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was doing no more than an ordinary passenger might do. If that is so, I do not see how it is possible to resist the conclusion that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. The learned judge has, it is true, stated his view of the law, and if that view of the law is to be treated as applicable to all cases, it might lead to the conclusion that it was sufficient to prove that the accident arose in the course of the employment without its being shown that it arose out of the employment. But with reference to this particular case it seems to me that the learned judge might possibly come to the conclusion that the words of the statute were abundantly satisfied by the facts, and that no distinction in such a case as this ought to be drawn between the words "out of" and the words "in the course of." Cases were put in which such a distinction must be drawn, but they do not appear to me to be any guide in this particular case. It was admitted on the part of the company that the deceased was being employed and was performing his duty when he was going back by train, and that an accident happened to him while he was going back. I should have thought that that was sufficient to establish liability, but, as there is some doubt as to what the grounds of the learned judge's decision were, I agree that the case should go back.

Case remitted.

The case accordingly came before the county court judge again, and the evidence of Williams was taken. He stated that when he got into the train he sat down just inside the door facing the engine, Moulton being opposite to him. The deceased went to the other end of the compartment. The deceased had a basket with him, which he put on the rack nearest to the engine. The train was on the move then. The deceased stood by the door on his side with his back towards the witness and his face towards the door. The witness did not notice the window or see the deceased do anything else. He heard a crash, and the deceased had disappeared.

The county court judge adhered to his former decision.

July 25.—C. A. Russell, K.C. (A. Spencer Hogg with him), for the employers.—The fresh evidence does not throw any new light on the case. The second decision of the county court judge is, therefore, open to the same objections as the first.

They cited Goodlet v. Caledonian Railway Co., 4 Fraser, Ct. of Sess. Cas., 5th series, 986.

J. R. Randolph, for the applicant, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I adhere to what I said on the last occasion as to the necessity for the onus of proof, in the case of a proceeding to obtain a statutory relief, being discharged by the person on whom it is laid. But the fresh evidence which has been taken throws new light on the facts. The case is near the line, but I think there was enough evidence to justify a judge in leaving the case to a jury. We begin with an admission on the part of the employers that the fall from the train was an accident, which negatives the idea of deliberation. Then the new evidence is to this effect, that the deceased when he got into the train had a basket with him, and that he stood up in order to put it into the rack, and that while he was so doing the train began to move on. This new evidence, in my opinion, involves the supposition that the deceased lost his balance and fell against the window, and that he was not doing anything which an ordinary passenger might not do. I cannot say there was no evidence fit for the consideration of a jury. This is not a naked case like Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., in which there was no evidence to connect negligence with the accident, and where it was held that no presumption ought to be drawn one way or the other, and that, the onus being on the plaintiff, the action failed. If the county court judge had rested his judgment on the presumption that the deceased was doing everything that was right, I think that would have been wrong. But it appears to me that the county court judge drew an inference from the facts proved, quite apart from any question of presumption, that this accident was an accident which not only arose in the course of the deceased man's employment, but also arose out of his employment. In my opinion there was evidence sufficient to justify such an inference being drawn, and therefore I think the appeal fails.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the employers, Woodcock, Ryland, & Parker, for Moorhouse, Manchester.

Solicitor for the applicant, Wheatley, Son, & Daniel, for Cobbett, Wheeler, & Cobbett, Manchester.

From P. D. & Ad. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) July 8, 1903.

"THE VILLE DE ST. NAZAIRE." (a.)

Ship—Wharf—Negligence—Damage to vessel lying in berth—Liability of wharf-owners.

Judgment of Bucknill, J. (51 W. R. 590), on the facts, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Bucknill, J. (51 W.R. 590), in favour of the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Ville de St. Nazaire, in an action against the Briton Ferry Works (Limited), to recover the damage sustained by the plaintiffs' vessel through straining while lying aground at the defendants' wharf, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants in omitting to take proper care to have the berth in a safe condition for the vessel.

R. M. Bray, K.C., and Bailhache, for the defendants.

Pickford, K.C., F. Laing, K.C., and F. W. Stubbs, for the plaintiffs.

THE COURT (COLLINS, M.R., and MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal on the facts.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stokes & Stokes.

Solicitors for the defendants, Everett & Hodgkinson.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) July 1, 2, 1903.

RATHBONE BROS. & CO. v. DAVID MCIVER, SONS, & CO. (b.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Construction—Exceptions—Unseaworthiness—Unfitness of ship to receive cargo—Liability of shipowners.

The obligation cast by the common law upon a shipowner to provide a ship which is seaworthy, not only in the sense of being fit to meet the perils of wind and waves, but also in the sense of being reasonably fit to carry cargo, can only be got rid of by clear and unambiguous words in a bill of lading. A bill of lading contained the following exceptions: "Loss or damage arising from the consequence of any damage, breakdown, injury to or defect in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery . . . however such damage, defect, or injury may be caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, collision, stranding . . . or other perils of the seas, and whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by . . . unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness." Cargo shipped under this bill of lading was damaged by water from a pipe used for the supply of water to a tank for domestic purposes. This pipe was broken when the cargo was put on board, and it was admitted that the ship was not fit to receive the cargo when put on board, and that all reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness.

Held, that the warranty implied by the common law on the part of the shipowners was not got rid of by the exceptions in the bill of lading, and that the shipowners were consequently liable for the damage to the cargo.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wills, J.

The plaintiffs, who were indorsees of bills of lading, sued the defendants, who were the owners of the steamship Barbary, for damage to bales of sheepskins.

The sheepskins were stowed in the 'tween-decks of the vessel, and whilst there were damaged by fresh water, which escaped from a broken pipe.

This pipe supplied a fresh water tank for domestic service, and was already broken at the time when the cargo was loaded at the commencement of the voyage.

The material portions of the bills of lading were as follow:

"Shipped in apparent good order and condition . . . at Buenos Ayres . . . to be delivered in the like good order and condition at . . . Liverpool (the act of God . . . thieves . . . restraints of princes . . . loss or damage resulting from effects of climate, heat of holds, vermin, rain, spray, insufficiency in strength of wrappers and packages, non-marking, obliteration, or insufficiency of marks, and all injury to the same, sweating . . . and all damage arising from other goods . . . or from errors, obliteration, insufficiency or absence of marks . . . risk of lighterage to or from the vessel, risk of craft or hulk or storage or transhipment, or transhipment from or to craft, explosion, heat, fire, before loading, or in the ship, or after unloading, and at any time and place whatever, boilers, steam machinery, or their appurtenances, or from the consequence of any damage, breakdown, injury to or defect in hull, tackle, boilers, machinery, or their appurtenances, refrigerating engine, or chamber, or any part thereof, outfit, tackle, or other appurtenances, however such damage, defect, or injury may be caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, collision, stranding, or any other peril of the seas . . . and whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by the . . . negligence . . . of the . . . owners, master, officers . . . crew . . . and whether before, or after, or during the voyage, or for whose acts the shipowners would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness, or by any cause whatever excepted)."

At the trial it was admitted that the vessel was not fit to receive cargo at the time when the sheepskins were loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness.

Wills, J., held that the latter part of the exception as to "unseaworthiness" extended only to unseaworthiness of the ship as a ship—i.e., to her unfitness to meet the perils of navigation, and not to her unfitness to carry the cargo. The loss, therefore, resulted "from the consequence of any injury to or defect in the hull, tackle . . . machinery, or their appurtenances," and the defendants were not liable.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Pickford, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the plaintiffs.—Though the exception of loss or damage from any injury to or defect in hull, or machinery, or their appurtenances might cover this loss if it stood alone, yet the general clause at the end binds the shipowner to the usual warranty of seaworthiness if he does not take reasonable means to make the vessel

---

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

seaworthy, and if the two provisions are inconsistent the warranty must prevail. "Unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading is used in its wider sense—i.e., unfitness to carry the cargo, and reasonable means were not taken to provide against such unfitness.

They cited Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Co., 51 W. R. Dig. 146, [1903] 1 K. B. 144, 8 Com. Cas. 74; Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Co., 16 Times L. R. 533; The Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550; The Carron Park, 39 W. R. 191, 15 P. D. 203; and Carver on Carriage by Sea, ss. 16 and 17.

Horridge, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants.—"Unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading means unfitness of the ship to meet the perils of navigation with safety to the ship.

They cited The Laertes, 36 W. R. 111, 12 P. D. 187; The Waikato v. New Zealand Shipping Co., 46 W. R Dig. 154, [1898] 1 Q. B. 645, [1899] 1 Q. B. 56, 47 W. R. Dig. 180; Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 566, 12 Q. B. D 297; Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 A. C. 72, 26 W. R Dig. 216; Gilroy v. Price, [1893] A. C. 56 41 W. R. Dig. 223; Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Co., 19 Times L. R. 313; Queensland National Bank v. Peninsular and Oriental Co., 46 W. R. 324, [1898] 1 Q. B. 567; Stanton v. Richardson, 24 W. R. 324, 7 C. P. 421, 9 C. P. 380; Cohn v. Davidson, 25 W. R. 369, 3 Q. B. D. 455; and Carver on Transit by Sea, s. 103*a*.

Pickford, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that this judgment can be supported. I am not sure that it is necessary for us to differ from Wills, J., on any point that he really decided, but I may say at once that we should be prepared, if it were necessary, to take a wider view of the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading than that which was taken by Wills, J.

I want, before I go more into detail in this case, to point out the broad principle which I think ought to be applied in the construction of a bill of lading, or of any other contract relating to carriage by sea, just as much in the case of a charter-party as of a bill of lading. It is the principle that was laid down both by Bigham, J., and by the Court of Appeal in The Waikato v. New Zealand Shipping Co. (Limited), that with reference to carriage by sea the law implies certain warranties on the part of the shipowner. It puts upon him certain obligations which will always bind him unless there are clear and express words which, without ambiguity, relieve him from what I will call for short his common law obligations.

Bigham, J., says at the beginning of his judgment (p. 647 [1898] 1 Q. B. D.): "The common law obligation of a shipowner is to provide a ship reasonably fit to carry the cargo that is shipped upon it. If a shipowner desires to evade this responsibility, he must, I think, use very plain and distinct words to give notice of his intention to get out of that obligation." That obligation applies, in my judgment, to all these common law warranties which are implied by the law in the absence of words excluding them. Then, Collins, L.J., in the appeal in the same case, says (on p. 58 [1899] 1 Q. B. D.): "I am of the same opinion. I am not sure myself that the shipowners did not really mean to cover by the exception all defects at the beginning of the voyage whether latent or patent. I am inclined to think that they probably did mean to do so. But they are the persons setting up the exception, and who have to make out their exemption. I do not think they can sustain that onus, unless by unambiguous language they have excluded the liability which would primâ facie rest upon them. I think that the language used in this case is far too ambiguous." Shortly, the basis of my judgment here is the same as that expressed by Collins, L.J. The same thing was really said by A. L. Smith and Rigby L.JJ., but I have selected the judgment of Collins, L.J., because it happens to be very conveniently expressed. I think that those observations apply to the present case and that the language here is far too ambiguous to exclude the common law warranties.

Before dealing further with the case I wish to say that Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., in the passage that is quoted by Kay, L.J., in the case of The Maori King v. Hughes, at p. 558 in [1895] 2 Q. B., says: "I take it to be quite clear, both in England and in Scotland that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship, whether that contract is in the shape of a bill of lading, or any other form, there is a duty on the part of the person who furnishes or supplies that ship, or that ship's room, unless something be stipulated which should prevent it, that the ship shall be fit for its purpose. That is generally expressed by saying that it shall be seaworthy; and I think also in marine contracts, contracts for sea carriage, that is what is properly called a 'warranty,' not merely that they should do their best to make the ship fit, but that the ship should really be fit." I shall have to allude to this passage again when I am dealing with the question of the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in this particular bill of lading, but I am reading it now to show the view that Lord Blackburn took of these warranties and how they can only be got rid of by a clear and express stipulation.

Having said that, I will call attention to the terms of this bill of lading. [His lordship read it down to the exceptions as to the defects in hull and tackle, and continued:] I have only got to say with regard to those exceptions, and in particular in regard to this exception which I have just read, that it is perfectly obvious that the words there are wide enough to cover loss and damage arising in consequence of things which in themselves might constitute unseaworthiness, and I take as an example defect in hull. Then comes collision, and a quantity of other things are mentioned, and then these words, "And whether any of the perils above-mentioned or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by the wrongful act or negligence of the persons mentioned whether before or after or during the voyage, or by the unseaworthings of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness, or by any cause whatever." With regard to that passage which I have just read, the last words make it perfectly plain that it was not intended by this clause relating to unseaworthiness to create any new exception or to add to the list of exceptions. It is quite impossible to put that construction upon these words. In my judgment the clause is a qualification which overrides the exceptions before mentioned, and it is not a new exception.

Now, having dealt thus with the bill of lading, I wish to deal with the case first with regard to the point on which Wills, J., seems to me to have based his judgment solely and entirely—namely, the construction of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading. The report I am reading from is in the 8th volume of the reports of Commercial Cases, and the case is reported on p. 1. It will be seen on p. 4, that Wills, J., considered that the effect of the clause that has just been commented upon was to add an additional exception; but whether he did so or not, he bases his judgment upon the meaning of the word unseaworthiness, and he says on p. 5, "But in my opinion the words which follow the expression 'unseaworthiness' in this bill of lading—namely, 'at the beginning or at any period of the voyage,' conclusively show that the expression 'unseaworthiness' as used means what I may call unseaworthiness proper, because if it were used with regard to the cargo and the fitness of the particular portion of the vessel to receive it, the phrase by which it is followed, instead of being 'at the beginning or at any period of the voyage,' would certainly be 'at the time of loading,' or some equivalent phrase, because the time of loading would be the critical time at which provision would be made for the obligation of seaworthiness to arise. But in the bill of lading it is not till the beginning of the voyage that the obligation arises, and it therefore seems to me that the intention was to confine the meaning of the word to unseaworthiness proper—that is to say, unseaworthiness of the ship as a ship." In my judgment it is not right to put this narrow construction on the word "unseaworthiness." I think if the passage which I read from The Maori King v. Hughes, in the course of the judgment of Kay, L.J., and the other judgments of the Lords Justices there are read, it is reasonably certain that we ought not so to limit this word "unseaworthiness," but to make it cover not only the unseaworthiness of the ship in the sense that it was not fit to meet the perils of the winds and the waves and the voyage, but also in the sense that the ship was not in a condition which rendered it fit to carry the cargo.

This opinion of mine, if it is right, does not, however, dispose of the whole case, because counsel for the respondents urged upon us an argument which was not urged before Wills, J., at all, and as to which I cannot find out that he has expressed any opinion whatsoever. Now, the point is this: Accepting the proposition that the shipowners cannot get rid of what I will call the common law obligation—whether the common law warranty of seaworthiness includes fitness of the ship to receive the cargo, or whether the warranty of seaworthiness and the warranty of fitness of the vessel to carry the cargo, are to be treated as separate warranties—without some plain and unambiguous words in the bill of lading excluding that obligation, it is said that express words of exclusion are found here. The way in which the express words are found is this. The plaintiffs take these words "before the loading or sailing of the vessel" and say that in this particular case there are two admissions by the defendants; it is admitted that the vessel was not fit to receive the cargo at the time when the sheepskins were loaded, and that reasonable means had not been taken to provide against such unfitness. Then they say that the words that are employed in these exceptions are wide enough to cover this particular defect; that here, therefore, you have got a defect which existed before the loading, or at all events at the time of loading, and that this loss has resulted from that defect so existing, and whether that defect amounts to unseaworthiness or whether it amounts to unfitness of the vessel to carry the cargo, it is equally covered by these words; that under these circumstances they are entitled to say: "Accepting the common law warranty and accepting that the shipowner must get rid of his common law liability by some plain words in the bill of lading or other shipping contract, you have got those words here, because this particular defect is saved by the exception." It seems to me that the answer is tolerably plain. It is impossible for anyone who reads that proviso at the end of the exceptions to say that it is manifest upon the face of this bill of lading that the parties intended the shipowner to have no responsibility for unseaworthiness; on the contrary, it says in the plainest possible manner that his exemption from his common law liability for unseaworthiness is to be limited to the particular case mentioned in the proviso. Well, it seems to me that it is impossible, if you take unseaworthiness there in its widest sense, to say that it is plain, reading the exceptions and this qualification of the exceptions together, that the shipowner was to have been relieved from all liability for unseaworthiness. Then for the moment, although it does not agree with my judgment and opinion, I will assume that you ought to read "unseaworthiness" as limited in the way that Wills, J., limited it. Well, what then? The argument amounts to this, that having regard to the earlier portion of the clause which contains the exception, the final clause exempts the shipowner from all liability in respect of things occurring before the loading or at the time of the loading of the vessel, and therefore exempted the shipowner from the warranty of seaworthiness generally. They say that if you read the word as meaning unseaworthiness proper, then there is nothing here to prevent the exceptions applying to the warranty of fitness, because having regard to the words about the time of the occurrence of the peril, or of the damage or loss resulting from the peril, the warranty of fitness is not in any way asserted by the clause at the end of this proviso: all that is asserted there is by implicating the continuance of the warranty of seaworthiness in its proper sense, but the assertion of that is not the assertion of the continuance of the warranty of fitness, and therefore the warranty of fitness is excluded by these words in which the exceptions are couched. The answer is that really this argument must go the length of saying that the words of the exception exclude every defect and every loss resulting from a defect which was in existence before or at the time of the sailing. If that is so, it follows that they must exclude the warranty of seaworthiness in its widest sense. But the respondents are bound to admit that the words cannot, having regard to the express mention of unseaworthiness, have that effect. What is the result? The result is that it is plain that their contention that the parties ought to be taken on the words of this contract to have included everything in the exceptions which occurred before or at the time of loading is an unsound argument, and if you once get rid of that, the result is that the common law warranty of fitness is untouched.

In my judgment we ought in this case to treat the parties as having said nothing to exclude the warranty of fitness if the warranty of fitness is treated as a separate warranty. On the other hand, if the warranty of fitness is treated as part of the warranty of seaworthiness, then it seems to me upon any reasonable construction of this document that that warranty, so far from being negatived, is positively affirmed, unless the shipowners can save themselves under the words in the proviso.

For the reasons which I have given I think that the warranty of fitness really is untouched by anything in the bill of lading. If that is so I have no doubt, having regard to the admissions, that the warranty of fitness at all events has been broken, and I think that under those circumstances the shipowners must be held liable for the consequences following upon that.

As I have said before, though I base my judgment on this ground I need not differ from Wills J., at all. Not only was this point not argued before him, but he expressed no opinion upon it at all. But if it should be necessary to fall back on the question of what is the proper meaning of the word "unseaworthiness" in this bill of lading, in my judgment the wider and not the narrower meaning is the right one.

ROMER, L.J.—I cannot say that the question we have to decide on this appeal is an easy one, but after the best consideration that I can give to it, I also am of opinion that this appeal ought to succeed.

Now, a bill of lading in respect of the matter that we have to consider on this appeal has been the subject of a very large number of decisions, and the general principles under which bills of lading should be interpreted are well known at the present day, and the general construction to be given to them, in some respects of an artificial character, is well ascertained. In my opinion it is advisable not to depart from these principles in dealing with any special bill of lading that comes before the court, and as far as possible not to allow small variations in the form of the bill of lading to affect the general construction which has hitherto been put upon such documents. Now, I understand that for a long time shipowners have been trying to limit the general liability cast upon them as sea carriers by putting in special exceptions without going the length of refusing or seeking to exclude their liability in respect of the warranty of seaworthiness, and they have, as I understand, from time to time been extending the special exception. I think, however, that I am right in saying that as a principle of construction in these cases the warranty of seaworthiness will not be held to have been excepted by the special exceptions unless it plainly appears that it was intended to except the warranty. In others words, the court will not readily infer an exception of the warranty. I think, moreover, that nowadays, whatever views may have been entertained in years gone by, the warranty of seaworthiness includes, and is well known to include, the warranty that the ship and her equipment are fit for the purpose of safely carrying to their destination the goods which the shipowners know are to be carried; and further I think that in a bill of lading of the present day the expression "seaworthiness" or "unseaworthiness" would be used and would be understood as being used with reference to the well-known extent of the warranty as above stated. Now in the present bill of lading the special exceptions are very numerous. Sometimes you find used very general expressions, and in parts you find expressions minutely detailing special injuries or injuries arising in respect of special parts of the ship or its equipment, but for my present purposes let me read the exceptions so far as they are general and essential. The exceptions are: "From all loss or damage arising from the consequence of any injury to or defect in hull, tackle, machinery, outfit, or appurtenances, however the damage may be caused, notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel, and whether the loss or injury was occasioned by the negligence of the officers and crew before or after or during the voyage or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness." Now, that is the clause that we have to construe in this bill of lading. In the first place I ask myself does that make it clear to me that the general warranty of seaworthiness is intended to be swept away, as it would undoubtedly practically be if you treat all the special exceptions enumerated as being absolutely without limit? In my opinion, not only is it not clear that that was intended, but I think the wording shows that the numerous and wide exceptions to which I have referred are not intended to extend to unseaworthiness unless all reasonable means had been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness.

To my mind the very way in which these exceptions are wound up by reference to unseaworthiness points to this, that the shipowners were, notwithstanding the prior exceptions, intended to be made liable for unseaworthiness unless reasonable means had been taken to provide against it, and I think therefore on the construction of this bill of lading that the list of exceptions must all be taken to be subject to this, that the shipowners were to be under liability as specified as to unseaworthiness. Therefore it follows that in my opinion the general argument for the respondents that the special exceptions must first have given to them their full operation, and then that the warranty as to unseaworthiness must be cut down accordingly —that is to say, practically destroyed—really fails. I agree that the construction which I have put upon these provisions in this bill of lading cuts down to a very great extent the operation of the special exceptions, but it does not destroy the effect of those special exceptions. Cases were referred to in the course of the argument before us by way of illustration which show that that is so, and I have no doubt that other examples could be given if necessary. Therefore, as I have said, the first argument, and really the main argument on behalf of the respondents, appears to me to fail.

There is, however, a further argument that has to be dealt with on behalf of the respondents, and which I understand was the one acceded to by Wills, J. It is said that in this bill of lading the word "unseaworthiness" is not to receive its ordinary meaning, but is to be limited to unseaworthiness of the ship as a ship, without special regard to the cargo, to meet the ordinary perils of navigation. On consideration of the case I think that it would not be right on this bill of lading to cut down the meaning of the term "unseaworthiness" as contended for by the respondents. In the first place it is important to bear in mind that this word unseaworthiness is being used in a mercantile document for and by mercantile men, and it ought to receive what I have previously referred to as its now well-known meaning unless there are other and overwhelming considerations which compel the court to depart from that meaning. Now, to my mind there is nothing in this bill of lading, taken as a whole, which prevents the court from giving to the word unseaworthiness its ordinary meaning. If the earlier words in the clause in which it occurs, the special exceptions to which I have referred, could be said only to have a limited operation, which could only be given effect to by giving a limited construction to the word unseaworthiness, then I should have felt more difficulty than I do in dealing with the present argument; but I may point out that the exceptions cover defects in the hull itself before, during, or after the voyage, and if all the exceptions are to be given their full effect the word unseaworthiness cannot even have the limited meaning that Wills, J., seeks to give it, and therefore, consistently with giving to the special exceptions their meaning according to their terms, you could not cut down the meaning of the word unseaworthiness even to the extent pointed out by Wills, J. It would take away from the term unseaworthiness the whole, practically, of its meaning. Then last with regard to the point relied upon by Wills, J., which depended upon the expression used in the bill of lading "unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage" I think that it is not sound to infer from that phrase that it was intended to exclude the period of loading. I think that the expression "unseaworthiness at the beginning or at any period of the voyage" was a common one, used not with a view of narrowing the term "unseaworthiness," but with a view of showing that it was not to be limited. There are cases in which similar expressions have had to be dealt with by the courts in which it is shown that those expressions are to have the full meaning that I am indicating now, and ought not to have such a limited construction as is sought to be put upon those words here. For example, in the case of The Carron Park the shipowners had stipulated that they should not be liable for neglect and so forth of their servants "during the voyage," and it was contended that "during the voyage" would only apply to the time at which the voyage commenced and that at any rate the voyage could not begin before the ship's loading was completed. But it was pointed out in that case, following other authorities, that the expression, being a general one, would cover the period during which the ship had to go from her then berth to the port of loading. In fact the expression a warranty of seaworthiness "at the beginning of and during the voyage," by itself, without any context to cut it down, would clearly, I think, cover, so far as regards the cargo, the period of loading. The fact is that for the purposes of the cargo and of that part of the warranty which extends to the ship being fit to receive the cargo, the voyage really begins when the cargo is put on board, and I think that the primâ facie meaning of the expression that we have to deal with here ought not to receive another interpretation, as contended by the respondents. To my mind there is nothing to sufficiently justify us in giving it another interpretation.

It appears to me, therefore, that this argument on behalf of the respondents also fails, and it follows that in my opinion the appeal must succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and substantially for the same reasons as have been given by my learned brothers; but as we are differing from Wills, J., and out of respect to the very able arguments which have been addressed to us, I shall endeavour as shortly as possible to give the general grounds on which I come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Now we have here to deal with a bill of lading which presents difficulties of construction on the face of it. It bears marks of not having been all framed at the same time, but of having been added to or altered from time to time, probably to meet the exigencies of commerce as various difficulties arose; but the general object is to limit the liability of the shipowners in respect of the general obligations imposed on them by law. The shipowners contract to deliver the goods in good order and condition at the port of discharge, but they except from such liability various matters, and amongst others all damage arising from the consequences of any defect in the hull or machinery or other appurtenances of the ship, "however such damage may have been caused, and notwithstanding that the same may have existed at or at any time before the loading or sailing of the vessel." Now, stopping there, it is contended on behalf of the respondents that if those words stood alone they would be sufficient to exonerate the shipowners from liability by reason of unseaworthiness of the vessel, which is one of the liabilities attaching by law. Cases were referred to to establish this, and it may be that such would be the effect of the clause in the absence of any context. But in construing documents, especially documents of this kind, it is not safe to deal with the contract piecemeal, but one must examine, in ascertaining the meaning of one portion of it, whether there is any context that follows. Now in the later portion of the document we find that it proceeds "whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by the wrongful act, default, negligence, or error in judgment of the owners, masters, officers, pilots, mariners, crew, engineers, stevedores, workmen, or other persons employed in or about the ship, or otherwise, and whether before or after or during the voyage, and for whose acts the shipowner would otherwise be liable, or by unseaworthiness of the ship at the beginning or at any period of the voyage, provided all reasonable means have been taken to provide against such unseaworthiness or by any cause whatever." This portion of the document is not introduced for the purpose of enlarging the perils, causes, or things which are to be excepted, because it begins by a reference to "the perils, causes, or things above mentioned." The object of it, therefore, must be to define the limits of exemption with reference to the perils, causes, and things which have been already mentioned in the prior part of the bill of lading. Consequently it seems to me that the earlier part of the document cannot be read in the wide sense in which the respondents desire that it should be read—as excluding all liability whatever on the part of the shipowners by reason of unseaworthiness. I think the two portions must be read together, and so reading them I come to the conclusion that the shipowners were to be liable in respect of unseaworthiness unless all reasonable means had been taken by them to provide against it.

Now, that being so, the question arises, What is the meaning of the word "unseaworthiness"? The learned judge in the court below says that it admits of two meanings—one relating to the fitness of the ship to encounter the perils of the sea, and the other including not only that fitness but also the fitness of the ship and her equipment to carry the particular goods with which she is to be loaded. The learned judge arrives at the conclusion that the word unseaworthiness is appropriate with reference to both species of fitness, and in that I agree with him. He, however, comes to the conclusion that in this particular bill of lading it is limited to what he calls the narrower sense of seaworthiness—namely, that which relates to the unfitness of the ship to encounter the perils of the sea. I am unable to agree with the learned judge in that respect. Looking at the object of this clause, I cannot doubt myself that the shipowner intended to exempt himself as widely as possible from liability, and that the meaning was that everything which the term "unseaworthiness" would appropriately cover was to be within the exemption. But it is not necessary absolutely to decide that. On this portion of the document it must be admitted that some meaning is to be attached to unseaworthiness. If the more limited meaning is to be attached to it, then it is said that the earlier portion of the document still remains in force, and that excludes all liability in respect of the fitness for the carriage of particular goods. I am unable to assent to that contention for when we find that the words in the earlier part of the document are sufficient to exclude all liability for any unseaworthiness in the widest sense, and when we find in the document a context which shows that it cannot have such a wide meaning and that it must certainly not be taken to include unseaworthiness in the narrower sense, then it seems to me that it cannot be intended to exclude unseaworthiness in the wider sense. At all events it is certainly in accordance with the cases already referred to on the part of the shipowner that when he desires to relieve himself of a common law liability he must do so in plain and unambiguous language. The result is that either unseaworthiness must be read in the wider sense or else that the unfitness of the ship with respect to the cargo to be carried is not to be excluded. In either view the shipowners fail.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool; Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson, & Hill, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Aug. 6, 7, 1903.

PULSFORD v. DEVENISH. (a.)

Company—Voluntary winding up—Debts—Duty of liquidator—Negligence—Liability—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 107, 133, 138, 143—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 25.

The liquidator of a company, knowing of a debt due by the company, and having sufficient assets in his hands, did not, on the winding up of the company, pay the said debt. The creditor, upon hearing of the dissolution of the company and the distribution of assets, brought an action against the liquidator for breach of his statutory duty in not providing for the claims of the creditors, and, further, claimed damages against him.

Held, that the liquidator was liable.

By an agreement in writing of the 2nd of March, 1900, between the plaintiff Pulsford, as agent for and on behalf of his co-plaintiffs, the Société Centrale d'Electricité et de Lampes à Incandescence (a French company) of the one part, and the Hiram S. Maxim Electrical Corporation (Limited) (hereafter called the licensees) of the other part, it was agreed that the licensees should as from the date thereof have the grant from, the plaintiffs as beneficial owners of a licence to make, use, and exercise a certain invention during the unexpired residue of the term of the letters patent in respect thereof at a rent of £300 a year, the payments for 1900 and 1901 to be made on the signing thereof, and the next payment on the 1st of March, 1902, and subsequent annual payments on the 1st of March of each year. It was also agreed that the said agreement should be deemed to be a contract made in England, and should be governed and construed according to the laws of England. The payment for the licence for 1900 and 1901 was made to the plaintiff Pulsford on the signing of the agreement.

By written agreement of the 22nd of January, 1901, between the licensees and the Maxim Electrical and Engineering Co. (Limited), the licensees agreed to sell their business undertaking and assets, including book debts and the full benefit of all agreements which were then vested in the licensees or wherein the licensees had directly or indirectly a beneficial interest, and also all other agreements connected with the licensees' business, whereunder the licensees were entitled to any benefit, to the said electrical engineering company.

It was further provided that the said company would pay and discharge all the trade debts and liabilities of the licensees of every kind in due course of business, and within six months from the date thereof would carry out and complete all the existing contracts the licensees might have entered into and would indemnify the licensees against all claims and responsibilities arising out of the debts, liabilities, and contracts. For the purpose of carrying out this agreement the licensees went into voluntary liquidation early in March, 1901, and the defendant was appointed the liquidator and was authorized when and so soon as the debts and liabilities of the licensees had been paid and satisfied to distribute among the contributories of the licensees the number agreed upon of fully paid-up shares.

The defendant accordingly proceeded to divide such shares among the shareholders of the licensees. Prior to his appointment as liquidator the defendant had been a director of the licensees, and had on their behalf signed the agreement of the 2nd of March, 1900, with the plaintiff, and the defendant consequently had, as the plaintiffs contended, both as director and liquidator, full knowledge of the provisions of that agreement and of the plaintiffs' rights under it.

Neither of the plaintiffs at any time received notice of the liquidation, or saw the advertisements which were inserted in six London papers calling upon creditors to send in their claims.

In April and May, 1900, the plaintiff Pulsford, as agent for the plaintiff company, supplied the licensees with lamps to the value of £124, and that sum was owing to the plaintiffs at the date of the voluntary liquidation.

The defendant wrongfully, and in breach of his duty, as the plaintiffs now contended, as liquidator, made no provision either for the plaintiffs' rights under the agreement of the 2nd of March, 1900, or for their claims in respect of the sum of £124 and distributed the assets of the licensees without making such provision.

The creditors of the licensees, other than the plaintiffs, were paid in full, and the assets in the liquidation were more than sufficient to pay the plaintiffs also in full.

On the 6th of August, 1901, an account purporting to show the manner in which the liquidation had been conducted, was laid before a general meeting of the licensees, and on the following day the defendant made a return to the registrar of such meeting having been held, and on the 7th of November, on the expiration of the statutory three months, the licensees were deemed to be dissolved. Neither of the plaintiffs had notice or knowledge of the liquidation until June, 1902, nor of the dissolution of the licensees till a later date.

The plaintiffs now claimed £1,800 damages under their agreement, and £124 for the lamps supplied.

It appeared from the defendant's evidence that he had no knowledge whatever of the plaintiffs' claim for the lamps, and that beyond inserting the advertisements in the six newspapers as above stated he had done nothing to ascertain who were the creditors of the licensees, and had not paid a single creditor, but had left everything to the new company, relying on their covenant in the agreement of the 22nd of January, 1901.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and S. R. Earle, for plaintiffs.—We have no statutory remedy, the old company being dissolved, neither can we apply to the court under section 138 of the Act of 1862 as extended by section 25 of the Act of 1890. Under section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, the liquidator has a statutory duty to distribute the assets of the company pari passu among the creditors: Ross v. Rugge-Price, 24 W. R. 786, 1 Ex. D. 269; In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co., 27 W. R. 713, 11 Ch. D. 140.

Upjohn, K.C., and A. Adams, for the defendant.—The case is covered by Knowles v. Scott, 39 W. R. 523, [1891] 1 Ch. 717. The statute did not impose any duty on the liquidator except as far as his own principals were concerned.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FARWELL, J., said that the present case could be distinguished from Knowles v. Scott. The defendant as liquidator took no steps to ascertain what debts the company owed except by inserting advertisements in six London papers. The defendant knew of the plaintiffs' claims under the agreement, but he said he was not aware that the lamps had been supplied, as he never examined the books. He did not pay one single creditor, but apparently relied upon the covenant by the purchasing company. He received the purchase consideration, and distributed it among the shareholders of the old company, he himself receiving over 2,000 shares. A more gross dereliction of duty on the part of a liquidator he had seldom heard of. The question now arose, Was the defendant under any liability to the plaintiffs, the company having been dissolved, and the plaintiffs not having known anything about the liquidation? It would be shocking, in his opinion, if no remedy existed, and he was glad to think he was able to find one. Section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, provided that upon the voluntary winding up of a company the property of the company should be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and that the liquidators should pay the debts of the company and adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves. Section 138 of the same Act provided that, where a company was being wound up voluntarily, the liquidators or any contributory might apply to the court to determine any question arising in the matter of the winding up, and by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1900, that power was extended to creditors. The effect of these sections was, in his opinion, to impose a statutory duty on the liquidator to pay the debts of the company and to provide a remedy for creditors by application to the court so long as the liquidation was actually going on, but when the company was finally dissolved there was no longer any remedy under the Act. When the statutory remedy was thus gone, then, in his opinion, the ordinary rule applied that the common law remedy remained to the creditor, and he could bring what used to be called an "action on the case": Ross v. Rugge-Price. The direction to the liquidator by the Act of 1862 was not limited by time, and the duty imposed remained though the company was dissolved. That was the view of James, L.J., in In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co. In the case of Knowles v. Scott the liquidation was still pending and the contributory there had his statutory remedy.

Romer, J., there said: "All I hold is that the liquidator is not liable to an action for damages for delay in performing his duty when that delay was not wilful or fraudulent and in no way arose from mala fides on his part." The Lord Justice had not to consider the circumstances which had to be considered in the present case, the company having been dissolved and the statutory remedy lost: The plaintiffs had not charged fraud, and he did not therefore rest his judgment on fraud; but it was difficult to see how any liquidator could honestly permit himself to bring about a dissolution of a company when he knew that a large debt of that company remained unpaid. Further, the liquidator had not attempted to compel the new company to perform its obligation of payment of such debt, though he was himself interested as a shareholder in the new company.

The result is that I hold the defendant to be liable, his liability extending to the amount payable under the agreement of the 2nd of March, 1900, subject to the usual discount, and to the amount due for the lamps supplied, which will be reduced to a shilling if the lamps be restored to the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Braby & Macdonald.
Solicitors for defendants, Terrell, Terrell, & Varley.

Chan. Div. } May 4, 1903.
Farwell, J. }

In re CORBETT.
CORBETT v. VISCOUNT COBHAM. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Subsequent gift—Particular purpose—Ademption.

A testator by his will gave a sum of £10,000 to the trustees of the endowment fund of a hospital. Subsequent to the date of his will he sent a cheque to the trustees for the sum of £10,000.

Held, that the legacy in the will was for a particular purpose, and was adeemed by the subsequent gift of the same sum in the testator's lifetime.

The testator, John Corbett, by his will, dated the 5th of May, 1898, made inter alia the following bequest: "I bequeath the following charitable legacies, for which the receipts of the treasurer or other proper officer of the respective institutions hereinafter named shall be sufficient discharges—that is to say, to the trustees of the Infirmary, Worcester, £1,000; to the trustees of the endowment fund of the Corbett Hospital, Stourbridge, £10,000."

On the 6th of August, 1900, the testator wrote to Lord Cobham, who was one of the trustees of the hospital, in the following terms: "I am desirous of redeeming a promise which I think I made some time ago to advance a sum of £10,000 in addition to the sum I have already advanced to endow the hospital in which I am interested at Stourbridge." Subsequently the testator sent a cheque for the sum mentioned.

Testator died on the 22nd of April, 1901, and his will was proved on the 30th of October, 1902.

The question to be determined was whether the gift of £10,000 made by the testator operated as an ademption of the legacy of £10,000 bequeathed in the will.

Upjohn, K.C., and Henderson, for executors.—This was a gift for a particular purpose, and the legacy is therefore adeemed: Debeze v. Mant, 2 Bro. C. C. 165; In re Pollock, Pollock v. Worrall, 28 Ch. D. 552, 33 W. R. Dig. 242; In re Fletcher, Gillings v. Fletcher, 36 W. R. 841, 38 Ch. D. 373; In re Smythies, Weyman v. Smythies, 51 W. R. 284, [1903] 1 Ch. 259.

Butcher, K.C., and W. L. Richards, for the defendants, referred to Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), p. 381; Monck v. Lord Monck, 1 B. & B. 298; Rosewell v. Bennett, 3 Atk. 27; Pankhurst v. Howell, 19 W. R. 312, L. R. 6 Ch. 136.

Upjohn, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J., stated the facts and continued: The testator made two consecutive gifts. One was "To the trustees of the Infirmary, Worcester, £1,000," the other was the gift in question. The first one was obviously a general gift, but the object of the testator's bounty in the second one was the endowment fund of the Corbett Hospital. The trustees could not do what they pleased with it, because they were precluded from spending it and were bound to use it on an endowment fund, using only the income thereof. I suggested to the learned counsel in argument that if there were a gift to trustees for the purpose of apprenticing A. B., a stranger, of a sum say of £1,000, clearly that would be a particular gift. So, again, to the trustees for the purpose of making an endowment fund for A. B., a stranger, and then to his children, in my opinion that would be a particular purpose. The case of In re Smythies, before Swinfen Eady, J., does not really touch this point, because that case went on the fact of a gift to A. in trust for B., an infant to whom the testator was not in loco parentis. The creation of the fund here is a case of perpetuity for a particular department of the hospital, and not for its general purposes. In my opinion, therefore, the gift in the will is for a particular purpose, and the subsequent gift of the £10,000 operates as an ademption.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Crowders, Vizard, & Oldham; A. E. Bale, for Harward & Co., Stourbridge.

K. B. Div. (Kennedy, J.) July 31, 1903.

CRONON v. STANIER. (a.)

Insurance, marine—Constructive total loss only—Sue and labour clause—Claim by underwriters for work and labour done, or as salvors—Common law—Maritime law.

A vessel was insured against total and/or constructive total loss only, and the policy contained the sue and labour clause. During the continuance of the policy the vessel was stranded and the crew left her. Before the insurers' representatives arrived to take charge of the vessel considerable damage was done by looting. The insurers, through a contractor on the no cure no pay system, raised the vessel and brought her into port. The insurers claimed for an award as salvors or for an amount for work and labour done.

Held, that there was no constructive total loss, and that the underwriters were not entitled to an award as salvors, and that there was no common law right to recover.

The Pickwick, 16 Jurist 669, distinguished.

Action tried in the commercial court before Kennedy, J., sitting with a jury.

This was an action brought to recover as for a constructive total loss on a policy of marine insurance, dated the 30th of August, 1900, on the vessel Izidoro Antunes. The plaintiff was the mortgagee of the vessel, and the defendant was an underwriter at Lloyds. Of the mortgage debt there remained due and owing the sum of £6,000.

The policy, which was for "twelve calendar months, say from the 20th of September, 1900, to the 19th of September, 1901, both days inclusive, date of leaving Para or from expiry of voyage policy whilst in rivers and basins of the Amazon," contained the following clauses: "The said ship, &c., goods and merchandizes, &c. . . . are and shall be valued at £5,950; on hull and materials valued at £9,000, machinery and boilers, &c., valued at £5,000—£14,000. This insurance is against the risk of total and/or constructive total loss of vessel only"; " . . . and in case of any loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the said goods and merchandizes, and the ship, &c. . . ." "Warranted nevertheless free of capture, seizure, and detention, &c. . . . piracy excepted . . . "; "The insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss."

The facts were as follows: On the 18th of May, 1901, the Izidoro Antunes ran on a bank in the River Amazon. Twice a day the vessel, with the exception of the awning-deck, promenade deck, and part of the fore-part of the vessel was submerged by a four-knot tide.

The crew landed and encamped on the shore, which was half a mile distant. On the 19th of May they left for Para, leaving six men to guard the vessel. This guard was withdrawn on the 23rd of May, since the owners considered it was the duty of the underwriters to guard the vessel, as the former alleged the vessel to be a constructive total loss.

On the 8th of June the representatives of the underwriters arrived and took charge of the vessel.

Between the 23rd of May and the 8th of June the vessel had been looted by the inhabitants of the banks of the Amazon, who removed a large quantity of fittings, deck planks, &c., causing considerable damage.

The defendants raised the vessel through one Faria Barbosa, contractor, on the "no cure no pay" principle, and brought her into Para.

The plaintiffs claimed as for a constructive total loss and alleged that notice of abandonment had been given; the defendants denied the constructive total loss or that notice of abandonment had been given, or that the loss was caused by perils insured against, and alleged that the loss was caused by the wilful act and default of the insured in withdrawing the crew from the vessel when stranded and by taking no steps to protect the vessel from further damage. The defendants counterclaimed (1) for £4,500, the expense incurred in raising and bringing the vessel into Para; (2) for such an award as salvors as might be just.

The jury returned the following findings: The reasonable cost of raising and taking the vessel into Para would be £3,500; the costs of repair at Para would be £6,000; the reasonable cost of repairing the damage caused by plundering would be £3,000; that the damage caused by plundering was all done prior to the 8th of June; that the underwriters did not have the opportunity of preventing the plundering, but that the owners could have prevented the plundering to the full extent.

Hamilton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants. On the counterclaim the defendants are entitled at common law to recover the expense incurred in raising the vessel and bringing her into Para as work and labour done on an implied promise to pay. If the defendants are not entitled to recover at common law, then under the maritime law they are entitled to an award as salvors. All the elements of salvage are present, and the mere fact that the defendants had an interest does not of itself disentitle them to an award as salvors.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lochnis, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants cannot recover for work and labour done. If, however, they can recover, they were the "factors, servants, or assigns" within the meaning of the sue and labour clause, and can be paid; but under the sue and labour clause the defendants would have to repay such amount to the plaintiffs, and, therefore, to prevent circuity of action, the defendants cannot recover. The services rendered were not salvage services. Further, since the defendants are underwriters, and had an interest, they are not entitled to an award as salvors.

The following cases were cited: The Pickwick, 16 Jur. 669; The Liffey, 58 L. T. 351; Newman v. Walters, 3 Bos. & P. 612; Towle v. The Great Eastern, 2 Rep. Maritime Law Cases 148; The Hannibal v. The Queen, L. R. 2 A. & E. 53, 16 W. R. Ad. Dig. 20; The Blairmore, [1893] A. C. 593; Johnston & Co. v. Hogg and Others, 31 W. R. 768, 10 Q. B. D. 432; The Solway Prince, 44 W. R. Dig. 153, [1896] P. 120; Uzielli & Co. v. Boston Marine Insurance Co., 33 W. R. 293, 15 Q. B. D. 11; Van Laun v. Thames and

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mersey Insurance Co., ante, p. 59; Western Insurance Co. v. Poole, 8 Com. Cas. 108.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the jury have come to the conclusion that the vessel was not a constructive total loss, and it only remains for me to deal with the counterclaim. This is a counterclaim in respect of services rendered to the insured vessel, and the persons who put forward the claim are the underwriters on that vessel. The policy is a policy against total or constructive total loss only, and contains the usual suing and labouring clause, which is not struck out. Under the policy it appears to me that the word "only" does not operate to strike out the suing and labouring clause; in other words, it is a policy under which, if, as a fact, efforts are successfully made to avert either a total or a constructive total loss by the labours of the assured, there would be a right to recover for those labours under the suing and labouring clause. When this vessel stranded on a reef in the Amazon, the person who claimed, at any rate, to be the assured at Para protected the wreck for a few days, and then took the crew away, and said he treated the casualty as a loss, and that the underwriters were the proper persons to deal with it, because it was a total loss; the underwriters then made a contract for employing a certain firm Faria Barbosa, to do the salvage work, the work of bringing the vessel off the reef to Para, on the principle of "no cure no pay," and fixed a sum in case it was successfully done. It was successfully done, the sum has been paid, and either in full discharge of that sum, or by way of obtaining some money which will go in part reduction, the underwriters who have successfully resisted an action brought by the plaintiff to recover as for constructive total loss say in their counterclaim that they are entitled either as salvors to an award or to recover under a common law count for work and labour done. It is impossible on the construction that I give to this policy for me to say that there is any common law right. What the underwriters did they had a right to do for themselves under the policy, without prejudice to their contention that there was no constructive total loss; they as well as the assured had the right to do work and try to keep the property safe. As the assured at Para were not going to take any further step in the matter, the underwriters did what the assured, if he had done it himself, would have been entitled to recover back from the underwriters, and therefore it would be simply to give effect to a claim which might be recovered back by the assured directly it was paid over. The insurers through the salvage association accepted the position, and it seems to me they were entitled to accept it, and it seems to me there is no claim on which they can sue the assured, or any implied contract at law to treat it as work and labour done for the assured; because if it were so done for them, and at their request they would have a right under the policy to ask back any sum that was given. As to the question of the salvage. It is said that the underwriters paid Faria Barbosa, with whom they contracted under an agreement of "no cure no pay," which is said to be strictly a salvage class of agreement; further that they have salved that vessel which by the verdict of the jury was after all the plaintiffs' vessel and not the underwriters'. They say they are entitled to a salvage award for that, and the claim, unless the case of The Pickwick raised the point, is practically a novel one. In this particular case I should feel great difficulty if there were any right to salvage on the evidence before me in dealing with the claim, because the salvage would have to be given on the value of the property as salved, and the value of the property as salved on the evidence before me would be a very difficult thing to appraise. But I am not deciding the case on that ground. I could come to some computation of value, but it would only be very small. I do not feel justified in treating the underwriters, who have taken on themselves (I think that is really the position on the facts of this case) to do the suing and labouring, with the assured person sitting by and knowing of it, to be doing it other than as persons who were no doubt acting in their own interests, because it was to their own interest that there should be no constructive total loss, and they were entitled under the policy so to act without affecting the safety of their position. But at the same time they were in that sense acting in suing and labouring for the vessel through Barbosa, and, as such, I think on two grounds I should have a difficulty which I do not see my way of getting over. In the first place I think that they were not volunteers but as insurers, apart from the special facts and circumstances, interested persons, salving for themselves to prevent a constructive total loss; but I think further as to the particular facts they were doing with the assured's knowledge that which he could properly allow them to do, and safely because they were doing that which would cause him no liability, because as to suing and labouring he would be protected from cost and expenditure under the policy. But then comes the case of The Pickwick, 16 Jurist, p. 669, which was a decision of Dr. Lushington. There a vessel, The Pickwick, which was insured by underwriters, Potter & Co. and Rawson & Co., had been abandoned by her crew, and the underwriters chartered a steamer to go in search of her, and, ultimately in the view of the court, that vessel, though not alone, did render salvage service to the barque, and brought her into safety. A claim was put forward then apparently by the underwriters who hired the steamer, and that is what I wish to call attention to, for the owners do not appear to have been parties to that case at all, and a question apparently was taken whether the party who hired was not entitled to claim as owner of the property for the time being. There is a considerable discussion by the learned judge as to the position of the claim. He says: "If the owners of the property had hired the vessel at their own peril to save the ship, then I might have doubted whether I could have allowed them to appear in the character of salvors; still I should have had great hesitation in excluding the persons who actually performed the service. But it is not pretended that the parties who now claim are owners at all. It is said that they are insurers to the extent of £1,170, and that, as brokers, insurances are effected by them to the extent of £12,000. If that be so, on what grounds would they be entitled to sue?" Then he proceeds to the position of the insurers as persons who remained on shore and merely hired the vessel to do it; and he points out that owners who remain on shore may be still, if their property is at risk, entitled to be salvors, though they remain on shore, and do not take part themselves in the act of salving. Then he says: "The true question, however, is whether the party who hired is not entitled to claim as the owner of the property for the time being? Am I to exclude the persons to whom the owners have transferred their right, by virtue of what they must have deemed a remunerative contract for the risk run and the services performed? I shall decree to them what I should decree to the owners of The President if they were suing here—namely, the proportion they would take for the performance of a beneficial service" And a little later on he says: "With regard to the steamer I will only observe that, with respect to Potter & Co. and Rawson & Co., I do not allot one sixpence to them in their capacity as salvors." That great judge was acting, it seems to me, simply upon the view that for the time being the underwriters under their contract for employment ought to be treated as owners of the vessel, the vessel which was at risk, the vessel which was the instrument of the salvage service, and as such he allowed them to have a salvage award.

It appears to me that in this case the circumstances are not the same. Were they the same I should simply follow that decision. But here there was no such contract for the employment of a ship at all. The only contract was for the personal services of Faria Barbosa & Co. under a contract by which Faria Barbosa might have been under obligation not to claim salvage themselves, in the sense of claiming it by exercising a lien or suing for salvage in respect of the vessel salved; but nevertheless it seems to me that this is distinguishable. Just as a shipowner is entitled to reward for the use of a vessel and men during salvage, the judge in the case of The Pickwick, gave the underwriter in that position the right, not to salvage reward, but to reward which the owners of the chartered vessel would have been entitled to as owners, according to the practice of the Admiralty Court. Here there is nothing of the kind; there were certain services which did result successfully rendered by persons who were employed to sue and labour for the safety of that vessel by the insurers, who were not only interested in the safety of the property as such, and therefore were not pure volunteers, but who were (as indeed the common law counterclaim of the defendants assumes they were) doing that which, under the circumstances, was successful in preventing constructive total loss with the knowledge and consent, and in a sense on behalf of the assured person; in other words, suing and labouring for him, he knowing that under the suing and labouring clause they were entitled to do that at the expense of the underwriters. There will be judgment for the defendant on the claim, and for the plaintiff on the counterclaim.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Thomas Cooper & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 2, 1903.

FERRAND v. BINGLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway — Repair — General district rate — Alleged exemption by reason of liability to repair ratione tenuræ*—Evidence not forthcoming that in* 1835 predecessor in title was "legally exempt"—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50), s. 33*—Public Health Act,* 1875, ss. 210, 211, 269.

Where a general district rate is levied and the owner of property assessed thereto claims exemption from so much of the rate as relates to the cost of the repair of a highway, under section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, he must not only prove that he or his predecessors in title had, previous to 1835, been under liability to repair ratione tenuræ, but must also prove the fact of non-payment of rates or other circumstances giving rise to the presumption of the existence of the exemption claimed.

Case stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the West Riding of Yorkshire, at the instance of the respondents, upon the allowance of an appeal by a landowner under section 269 of the Public Health Act, 1875 against a general district rate made by the respondents, an urban district council, which included the cost of repairs of highways within their district in accordance with section 216 (i.).

The ground of the appeal to quarter sessions was that the appellant's property in the district had, previous to the passing of the Highway Act, 1835, been legally exempt by reason of liability to repair ratione tenuræ certain highways in the district; that these had been repaired ratione tenuræ, and that therefore the property was exempt under section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, from payment of so much of the rate as was made to defray the cost of repairs in the district.

No evidence was given as to whether or not prior to 1835 the owners or occupiers of the appellant's lands had performed statutory duty or paid composition in lieu thereof, or paid highway rates.

The court of quarter sessions found as a fact that the appellant and his predecessors had repaired the highway in question from time immemorial ratione tenuræ, and that such lands as were liable to its repair were exempt.

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the court of quarter sessions was right in allowing the appeal.

The material facts set out in the case were that down to 1862 the hamlet of Harden was a separate highway parish as defined by the Highway Act, 1835. A highway called the Harden and Cullingworth-road runs through the village of Harden and extends outside the actual village 2,070 yards in an easterly direction and 1,150 yards in a westerly direction; this was the highway in respect of which the question arose. There were also within the old highway parish of Harden other highways, which were repairable by the inhabitants at large; the portion of the highway in question within the actual village of Harden had also always been, and still was, repaired by the inhabitants at large. In 1862 the Bingley Township Local Board was formed and one of the constituent parts of that district was the hamlet of Harden. In 1894 that local board became the Bingley Outer Urban District, the area remaining as before. In 1898 the present urban district of Bingley was duly formed, comprising three separate urban districts—viz., the Bingley outer urban district, the Bingley urban district, and the Wilsden urban district. Mr. Ferrand was the owner, but not the occupier, of some of the lands alongside that length of the highway lying within the actual village of Harden upon the south side of that highway. This land was acquired by Mr. Ferrand's predecessors in title in comparatively recent times. Mr. Ferrand was also the owner of all the land on both sides of the said highway outside the actual village of Harden, occupying part of such land himself; this land as to the whole thereof had been in the ownership, and as to part thereof in the actual occupation, of himself or his predecessors in title continuously from a date long anterior to 1831. Mr. Ferrand was also the owner of extensive lands throughout the remainder of the area of the district council.

On the 17th of November, 1902, the council duly made and levied, under sections 210 and 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a general district rate at 2s. 2d. in the pound, and demand thereof was duly made from Mr. Ferrand. The cost of repairs of highways was included in the said rate in accordance with section 216 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1875, inasmuch as the whole of the council's district was rated for works of paving, water supply, and sewerage.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Ferrand gave notice of appeal against such rate on the ground above stated. No evidence was given as to whether or not down to the date of the Highway Act, 1835, the owners or occupiers of the lands of Mr. Ferrand performed statute duty, or paid composition in lieu thereof, or paid highway rates. It was admitted that from 1862 to 1898, both inclusive, they paid highway rates, and since 1898 they had paid general district rates. No evidence was given as to whether or not they had paid highway rates between 1835 and 1862. On the part of Mr. Ferrand a book containing entries between the years of 1731 and 1751 was produced, which showed that payments made for repairing portions of the highway in question were entered as items chargeable against the estate. In 1886 Mr. Ferrand and two of the tenants of portions of his estate lying immediately alongside the highway in question were called upon by the Bingley Township Local Board to repair that portion of the highway lying to the west of Harden village, on the ground, as the board alleged, that they were liable to do so under section 94 of the Highway Act, 1835, and later a summons was issued against one of the tenants charging "non-repair of highways" The proceedings against the tenant were not gone on with, in consequence of liability being accepted; and so much of the highway lying outside the actual village of Harden had ever since been repaired by Mr. Ferrand or his tenants. Upon these facts Mr. Ferrand asked the court to infer and to find as facts that he and his predecessors in title or their tenants had repaired the highway in question outside the actual village from time immemorial, and under an obligation ratione tenuræ; it was further contended by Mr. Ferrand that such part of a general district rate as was made to defray the cost of repairs of highways was still levied by the district council as surveyors of highways acting under or by virtue of the Highway Act, 1835, and could be dealt with separately from the rest of the rate. For the district council it was contended that there was no evidence that Mr. Ferrand and his predecessors in title or their tenants had repaired the highway from time immemorial, or that they did so (if at all) under a liability to repair ratione tenuræ; that there were no facts to show a legal exemption under section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835; that that section had no application to any part of a general district rate, inasmuch as no part of a general district rate was imposed under or by virtue of the Highway Act, 1835; and that, even if prior to 1835 Mr. Ferrand's predecessors were entitled to any "legal exemption" within the meaning of section 33, it was incumbent upon him to prove affirmatively to what particular lands such "legal exemption" attached in the year 1835, and that he had not attempted to do so.

The court of quarter sessions found as a fact that Mr. Ferrand and his predecessors in title had repaired the road—i.e., the highway in question so far as lying outside the actual village of Harden—from time immemorial, and that the road had been so repaired ratione tenuræ; and upon these findings the court found that in respect of such lands he was exempt from such portion of the general district rate as was attributable to the repairs of the highways; the court accordingly allowed Mr. Ferrand's appeal against the rate.

The urban district council appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and J. Scholefield, for the district council.—There was not sufficient evidence of a liability to repair ratione tenuræ to justify the court of quarter sessions in holding that there was a legal exemption proved under section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, and therefore the court of quarter sessions have come to a wrong determination in law. Even if the evidence showed generally that prior to 1835 the respondent's predecessors were entitled to some legal exemption within section 33, he must nevertheless prove affirmatively to what particular lands, now in his possession, such legal exemption attached at the passing of the Highway Act, 1835. That he has not attempted to do. There must be evidence of exemption in fact, and there is none in the present case. Liability ratione tenuræ can exist with or without exemption from other burdens, and in each case it is a question of evidence: Heath v. Weaverham Overseers, 42 W. R. 478, [1894] 2 Q. B. 108; Reg. v. Browne, 13 Q. B. 654; Esher and Dittons Urban Council v. Marks, 50 W. R. 330, 71 L. J. K. B. 309; Lyme Regis Corporation v. Henley, (1834) 3 B. & Ad. 77, 2 Cl. & Fin. 331; Reg. v. Rollit, 24 W. R. 26, L. R. 10 Q. B. 475. Further, the exemption given by section 33 does not apply to a general rate: Dyson v. Greetland Local Board, (1884) 13 Q. B. D. 946, 32 W. R. Dig. 88.

A. T. Lawrance, K.C. (T. R. D. Wright with him), for the respondent.—The court of quarter sessions was entitled, on the evidence, to find that Mr. Ferrand was exempt from paying so much of the rate as was levied to repair so much of the highway as is disputed. [He referred to the same cases as Macmorran had cited, and also to 6 Co. Rep., pt. XIII., p. 33; R. v. Ecclesfield, Inhabitants of, (1818) 1 B. & Ald. 348, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., at p. 356; Freeman v. Read, 11 W. R. 802, (1863) 4 B. & S. 174; Great Western Railway Co. v. Deuchwait, (1861) 25 J. P. 342; Dalton Overseers v. North-Eastern Railway Co., [1900] A. C. 345, 48 W. R. Dig. 67; sections 144, 149, 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and Glen on Highways (1st ed.), p. 113] It is sufficient to show that the road was repaired, although no rate for that purpose existed, to establish a primâ facie presumption of liability to repair ratione tenuræ. Once that presumption is made out from the evidence, as is the case here, then the onus of proving liability to the rate is shifted on to the district council. To discharge that burden the appellants here must prove, and they have failed to do so, that prior to 1835 Mr. Ferrand's predecessors in title had paid a highway rate in respect of the lands in question. Therefore this appeal should be dismissed.

[On the question whether the exemption given by section 33 applied to a general rate the court did not desire to hear argument, as they were not prepared to decide that question.]

Macmorran, K.C., in reply.—The burden is not upon the district council to show any payments were made by the respondent's predecessors in title towards the repair of the highway. No books or records before 1862 can be found, and there is no evidence one way or the other. Mr. Ferrand is claiming exemption, and he, like any other plaintiff, must prove his case and produce evidence if he can, that highway rates were not in fact paid.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this appeal succeeds upon the ground that on the evidence before us we cannot hold that the condition for exemption given by section 33 of the Act of 1835 has been proved. That section is in these terms: "When property, or the owner or occupier in respect thereof, has, previous to the passing of this Act, been legally exempt from the performance of statute duty, or from the payment of any composition in lieu thereof, or of highway rate, the said property and the owners or occupiers thereof shall be exempt from the payment of the rate hereby imposed." I do not desire to express any final opinion now on the second point raised by Mr. Macmorran, that the exemption, even if the court of quarter sessions was right in taking it as proved, would not avail the respondent here, because this was a general district rate, and therefore a rate not contemplated by the section I have just read. I am not prepared to assent to or dissent from that argument, because I am going to deal with the case as if the objection was taken by Mr. Ferrand to the payment of an ordinary highway rate. Mr. Lawrance's argument — and he pressed us very strenuously to accept it—was that if it was found in a case like this that in fact the person who claimed to be exempted had repaired or was liable to repair, a highway ratione tenuræ, he had fulfilled his obligation in the sense that he came within the exemption in section 33 and was not liable for the payment of highway rates. I think his argument failed, because for his argument he had to assume that it was sufficient to show liability to repair ratione tenuræ without showing non-payment in fact or other circumstances which gave rise to the presumption. In all the cases that have been cited there has been shown either non-payment of rates or some other circumstances which rendered it necessary for the court only to consider whether or not the exemption claimed was a legal exemption. For example, that was the point the court had to decide in Freeman v. Read, 4 B. & S. 174, and Wightman, J., in his judgment on p. 185 so deals with it. Again, in Reg. v. Heath, L. R. 1 Q. B. 218, the same consideration arises. In the more recent case of Heath v. Weaverham Overseers. 42 W. R. 478, [1894] 2 Q. B. 108, Charles, J., says—"What is the meaning of the words 'legally exempt'? Clearly the exemption must be a legal one; and it has been decided that, although the mere omission to rate premises is not sufficient evidence of exemption, yet the circumstance that the occupiers have always repaired a particular road is enough to establish a 'legal' exemption." Obviously the learned judge there assumed that the exemption in fact existed, for he was speaking of a case in which the root and foundation of the claim to exemption was that there had been non-payment. In all the cases the arguments proceeded upon that basis. There must be facts which show that the person sought to be charged has not contributed to the highway rates, although payment by mistake would not of course show a liability. In the present case it is stated that "no evidence was given as to whether or not down to the date of the Highway Act, 1835, the owners or occupiers of the lands of Mr. Ferrand performed statutory duty or paid compensation in lieu thereof, or paid highway rates," and we were also told that no books or records were forthcoming prior to 1862. Having regard to the statement in the case and what was said about the books and records, it must, I think, be taken that there is, as Mr. Macmorran pointed out, no evidence here one way or the other on this point. That being so, it is quite impossible to come to the conclusion that there was evidence upon which the court of quarter sessions could hold, as they did, that any claim to legal exemption from payment of the rate was made out by Mr. Ferrand. Such a claim must be based on legal grounds, and unless there is authority to show that the liability to repair some highway ratione tenuræ would of itself found and give rise to an exemption from the payment of highway rates, the respondent here does not come within the authorities and the decision appealed from is wrong. In my opinion as I have already pointed out, the cases all fall short of laying down any such proposition.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Church, Adams, & Prior, for A. & M. W. Platts, Bingley.

Solicitors for the respondents, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Co., for Mossman, Atkinson, & Blankley, Bradford.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Oct. 26.

In re MORGAN.
Ex parte THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

County court—Bankruptcy—Taxation of costs—Execution—High bailiff's fees—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71) s. 11, sub-section 1—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 146 — County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 25, r. 12c — Order as to County Court Fees, 1901, Schedule B, Part I., r. 35.

Where the high bailiff of a county court seizes separate sets of goods of the same debtor, and in the same house, under separate warrants of execution, he is entitled to a separate possession fee on each set of goods so seized.

Appeal from a decision of the taxing-master of the High Court in Bankruptcy, affirming the decision of the registrar of the County Court of Glamorgan as to the allowance of certain fees to the high bailiff.

In the month of March, 1903, the high bailiff of the County Court of Glamorgan levied the following executions by seizure of goods of the debtor Morgan, viz.: On the 17th of March, one execution at the suit of Hume for £21 4s. 6d., and a second execution at the suit of Winterman and Chenter for £11 3s. 8d. On the 19th of March, a public execution at the suit of Armsworth for £22 1s. 6d.

Distinct goods were seized in respect of each of such executions, but only one man in possession was put in, who held the goods seized on the 17th of March for seven days, and those seized on the 19th of March for five days.

All the goods seized were sold on the 23rd of March.

The high bailiff charged £3 10s. on the first execution, £2 12s. on the second, and £2 10s. on the third.

When these fees came before the registrar for taxation the Board of Trade were represented and contended that only one possession fee at the rate of ten shillings per day should be allowed in respect of all the seizures. The registrar allowed the three separate fees, whereupon the Board of Trade brought the taxation up for review by the taxing-master of the High Court in Bankruptcy, who affirmed the decision of the registrar.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Board of Trade appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.—The Board of Trade contend that only one possession fee should be allowed in cases like the present. Section 146 of the County Courts Act, 1888, describes the warrant of execution which is issued to the high bailiff as "in the nature of a writ of fieri facias," and it has been laid down in the case of writs of fieri facias that only one fee can be allowed although the sheriff may have seized under several writs: see Hutchinson v. Johnston, 1 T. R 729; In re Wells and Croft, Ex parte The Sheriff of Kent, 10 Morr. 69, 41 W. R. Dig. 221; In re Broster, Ex parte Pruddah, 45 W. R. 576, [1897] 2 Q. B. 429. Rule 35 of Part I of Schedule B. of the order of 1901, which regulates the amount of fees, also contemplates that the maximum allowance shall not exceed ten shillings per day, and is as follows: "35. For keeping possession of goods till sale on any process of execution, per day (including expenses of removal, storage of goods, and all other expenses), not exceeding seven days, sixpence in the pound on the value of the goods seized, to be fixed by appraisement in case of dispute, so that the total amount does not exceed 10s. per day: and in addition for feeding animals the actual cost thereof."

Frank Mellor, for the respondent.—If an execution by a high bailiff were on all fours with an execution under a writ of fieri facias the respondents' case would be unarguable, but both the law and the scale of fees applicable are totally different. By the earliest County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95) it was enacted in section 94 that the clerk of the court "shall issue a writ of fieri facias as a warrant of execution to the high bailiff," and by Schedule D of the same Act the high bailiff is allowed the same fees for mileage, &c., as would be allowed to a high sheriff. These fees were, however, altered by the Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), Schedule B, which is as follows: "For keeping possession of goods till sale, per day (including expenses of removal, storage of goods, and all other expenses), not exceeding five days, sixpence in the pound on the value of the goods seized, to be fixed by appraisement in case of dispute." This, like the present order as to fees, allows only the one fee for all the high bailiff's work, and ever since that scale came into force it has been the universal practice to allow high bailiffs a separate fee on each execution. The Act of 1888 also evidently intends to draw a distinction between a fieri facias and a county court warrant, for it rejects the wording of the Act of 1846, "a writ of fieri facias," and adopts the words "a warrant of execution in the nature of a writ of fieri facias." Finally, there is this important distinction, that a sheriff seizes all the goods on the premises once for all, while a high bailiff seizes separate and distinct goods in respect of each execution, and is only paid according to the value of the goods he seizes, while a sheriff is paid according to the amount of the judgment under which he seizes.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a case of some importance, as it deals with a practice which has existed ever since 1856. By section 146 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the high bailiff has issued to him "a warrant of execution in the nature of a writ of fieri facias," which empowers him to levy "by distress and sale of the goods and chattels . . . such sum of money as shall be so ordered," that is, he is told how much money he has to raise, and would do wrong if he seized more goods than were necessary to satisfy that amount. Nothing turns upon any other section of that Act, but it is necessary to consider, as applied to the facts of this case, the meaning of Rule 35, Part I., Schedule B, of the Order as to Fees, 1901: "For keeping possession of goods on any process of execution . . . sixpence in the pound on the value of the goods seized." Here there were three "processes of execution," but, if the same goods had been seized under each process, then, quite apart from the analogy of seizure by a sheriff, it would be reasonable to say that only one fee ought to be allowed. Such, however, is not the case here, the high bailiff seized thirty pounds' worth of goods to satisfy the first execution, fourteen pounds' worth to satisfy the second, and twenty-seven to satisfy the third. I do not think it would be right to apply rule 35 so as to make possession of each set of goods all one possession. Although they were all in the same house, I think that under the plain language of the rule a maximum fee of ten shillings per day was payable for the possession of the goods taken under the first seizure, and a similar fee upon each of the subsequent seizures.

It was admitted that if the rules applicable to a writ of fieri facias applied here, the conclusion would be different, but I am not sure that that admission need be made in a case where separate sets of goods are seized. It may be that the order now in force ought to be altered, but so long as it remains unchanged the established practice must continue.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Solicitor for the respondent, E. F. Turner.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). } Aug. 7, 1903.

FENTON (PAUPER) v. THORLEY & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—"Accident"—Compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

A workman of average health and strength unintentionally injured himself by overstrain while turning a machine in the course of his ordinary work for his employer.

Held, that this was an "accident" within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, where the word is used in the popular and ordinary sense, and the workman was therefore entitled to compensation thereunder.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

Hensey v. White, 48 W. R. 257, [1900] 1 Q. B. 481, overruled.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L JJ.) affirming the decision of the county court judge of Surrey.

The appellant, who was a workman in the employment of the respondents, ruptured himself whilst turning or adjusting a machine in the course of his work, and for this accident he claimed compensation.

The whole circumstances of the case are set out in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Cyril Dodd, K.C., and F. Mellor (E. A. Jelf with them), for the appellant.

A. Powell, K.C., and W. Shakespeare, for the respondents.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—Fenton, the appellant, was a workman in the employment of the respondents, who manufacture for sale an article called Thorley's Food for Cattle. He was employed to look after one of the machines used in preparing the food. It seems to have been a sort of combination of kettle and press. The actual operation performed by this machine takes about six or eight minutes. At the end of that time the workman in charge moves a lever and then turns a wheel for the purpose of raising the lid and removing the contents, which come out, or ought to come out, dried and pressed into separate layers of cakes. On the 3rd of December, 1901, Fenton was at work at his machine. He had got through the operation on that day a good many times without hitch or difficulty; but about 9 p.m. or a little later, when the time came for opening the vessel, the wheel would not turn. He then called a fellow-workman to his assistance, and the two men together set to work to move the wheel. Suddenly Fenton felt something which he describes as a "tear" in his "inside," and it was found that he was ruptured. Fenton was a man of ordinary health and strength. There was no evidence of any slip, or wrench, or sudden jerk. It may be taken that the injury occurred while the man was engaged in his ordinary work, and in doing or trying to do the very thing which he meant to accomplish. There is evidence that the wheel was short of one spoke or handle, which may have made it more difficult to grasp than usual, and it was discovered afterwards that there was a leak in the kettle which let moisture into the vessel below, glueing its contents together, and so causing the lid to stick. I mention these circumstances merely for the purpose of putting them aside. It was, indeed, argued by the learned counsel for the appellant that if the mishap that befell Fenton was not of itself and apart from all other circumstances an accident within the meaning of that word as used in the Act, then these two things—the loss of a spoke in the wheel and the leak in the kettle—introduced an element of accident—a fortuitous element it was called—which would satisfy the terms of the enactment, however narrowly it may be construed. In my opinion, they do not affect the question in the least.

The Court of Appeal held that the injury which Fenton sustained was not "injury by accident" within the meaning of the Act. In so holding they followed an earlier decision of the court in the case of Hensey v. White, 48 W. R. 257, [1900] 1 Q. B. 481, which in its circumstances is not distinguishable from the present case. In Hensey v. White a passage was cited from the opinion of Lord Halsbury in Hamilton, Fraser, & Co. v. Pandorf & Co., 36 W. R. 369, at p. 370, 12 App. Cas. 518, in which his lordship says: "I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words 'peril' or 'accident.'" Founding themselves upon that expression the learned judges of the Court of Appeal held in Hensey v. White, as they have held here, that there was no accident, because (to quote the leading judgment) there was "an entire lack of the fortuitous element." What the man "was doing," it was said, "he was doing deliberately, and in the ordinary course of his work, and that which happened was in no sense a fortuitous event." To the expression as used by Lord Halsbury in the passage in which it occurs, no possible objection can be taken; but it is, I think, to be regretted that the word fortuitous should have been applied to the term injury by accident in the Workmen's Compensation Act. If it means exactly the same thing as accidental the use of the word is superfluous. If it introduces the element of haphazard (if I may use the expression), an element which is not necessarily involved in the word "accidental," its use, I venture to think, is misleading, and not warranted by anything in the Act. And now I must ask your lordships' attention to the Act itself; but before doing so there are two observations I should like to make. If a man, in lifting a weight or trying to move something not easily moved, were to strain a muscle, or rick his back, or rupture himself, the mishap in ordinary parlance would be described as an accident. Anybody would say that the man had met with an accident in lifting a weight, or trying to move something too heavy for him. One other remark I should like to make. It does seem to me extraordinary that anybody should suppose that when the advantage of insurance against accident at their employers' expense was being conferred on workmen, Parliament could have intended to exclude from the benefit of the Act some injuries ordinarily described as accidents which beyond all others merit favourable consideration in the interest of workmen and employers alike. A man injures himself by doing some stupid thing, and it is called an accident, and he gets the benefit of the insurance. It may even be his own fault, and yet compensation is not to be disallowed unless the injury is attributable to "serious and wilful misconduct" on his part. A man injures himself suddenly and unexpectedly by throwing all his might and all his strength and all his energy into his work by doing his very best and utmost for his employer, not sparing himself or taking thought of what may come upon him, and then he is to be told that his case is outside the Act because he exerted himself deliberately, and there was an entire lack of the fortuitous element! I cannot think that that is right. I do not think that if such were held to be the true construction of the Act, the result would be for the good of the men or for the good of the employers either in the long run. Certainly it would not conduce to honesty or thoroughness in work. It would lead men to shirk and hang back, and try to shift a burden which might possibly prove too heavy for them on to the shoulders of their comrades. Now I turn to the Act.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The title of the Act is "An Act to amend the Law with respect to Compensation to Workmen for Accidental Injuries Sufferred in the Course of their Employment." It has been held that you cannot resort to the title of an Act for the purpose of construing its provisions. Still, as was said by a very sound and careful judge, "the title of an Act of Parliament is no part of the law, but it may tend to show the object of the legislation." Those were the words of Wightman, J., in Johnson v. Upham, 2 E. & E. 263; and Chitty, J., observed in East and West India Docks v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Co., 39 Ch. D., 531 that the title of an Act may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining generally the scope of the Act. Surely, if such a reference is ever permitted, it must be permissible in a case like this, where Parliament is making a new departure in the interest of labour, and legislating for working men presumably in language that they can understand. The first section of the Act, sub-section 1, declares that "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman" his employers shall be liable to pay compensation. Now, the expression injury by accident seems to me to be a compound expression. The words "by accident" are, I think, introduced parenthetically as it were to qualify the word injury, confining it to a certain class of injuries, and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self-inflicted by design. Then comes the question, do the words "arising out of and in the course of the employment" qualify the word "accident" or the word "injury" or the compound expression "injury by accident." I rather think the latter view is the correct view. If it were a question whether the qualifying words apply to "injury" or to "accident," there would, I think, be some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. I find in section 4 the expression, "accident arising out of and in the course of their employment." In section 9 I find the words, "personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment," while in section 1, sub-section 2 (6), the qualifying words seem to be applied to the compound expression "injury to a workman by accident." The truth is that in the Act, which does not seem to have had the benefit of careful revision, "accident" and "injury," that is, injury by accident, appear to be used as convertible terms; for instance, in section 4, "notice of the accident" has to be given, and that notice is referred to immediately afterwards as "notice in respect of an injury under the Act." I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the expression "accident" is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked-for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed. It would serve no useful purpose to review the English cases on the subject. The decisions before Hensey v. White are curiously conflicting. It would seem almost as if the court, in some cases at least, simply confirmed the finding of the county court judge as a finding of fact, however opposed the finding might be to a previous decision of the court on facts precisely similar. With the decision in Hensey v. White and the decisions in which that case has been followed, including Roper v. Greenwood, (1901) 49 W. R. Dig. 113, 83 L. T. 471, speaking with all deference, I am unable to agree. There is, however, a recent decision of the Court of Session in Scotland to which I should like to call your lordships' attention, and in which I agree entirely. It is the case of Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. (Limited), 5 Fraser, 120. A miner strained his back in replacing a derailed coal hutch. The question arose, Was that an accident? All the learned judges held that it was. True, two of the learned judges expressed an opinion that it was "fortuitous," but they could not have used that expression in the sense in which it was used in Hensey v. White. What the miner did in replacing the hutch he certainly did deliberately and in the ordinary course of his work. There was nothing hapazard about it. Lord MacLaren observed that it was impossible to limit the scope of the statute. He considered that "if a workman in the reasonable performance of his duties sustains a physiological injury as the result of the work he is engaged in" . . . "this is accidental injury in the sense of the statute." Lord Kinnear observed that the injury was "not intentional," and that "it was unforeseen." "It arose," he said, "from some causes which are not definitely ascertained, except that the appellant was lifting hutches which were too heavy for him. If," he added, "such an occurrence as this cannot be described in ordinary language as an accident, I do not know how otherwise to describe it." The learned counsel for the respondents, in his able address, referred to several cases on policies of insurance intended to cover injuries described either as arising from accidental, violent, and external causes, or in somewhat similar terms. I do not think that these cases throw much light upon the present question. They turn on the meaning and effect of stipulations for the most part carefully framed in the interest of the insurers. But, on the whole, they do not, I think, make against the construction which I ask your lordships to put on the word accident in the Workmen's Compensation Act. I will not trouble your lordships by going through the cases which Mr. Powell cited. I will only only refer to one—a case of considerable authority, for it was a case in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is reported in 131 U.S. Supreme Court Reports, 100. A jury had found in favour of the assured, who had injured himself fatally in jumping off a platform some four or five feet high. There was a motion for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The court refused to disturb the verdict. In the course of the judgment two cases were referred to with approval as supporting the conclusion at which the court arrived. One was an English, the other an American case. I give them both as stated in the judgment. In Martin v. Travellers' Insurance Co., 1 F. & F. 505, the "policy was against any bodily injury resulting from any accident or violence, 'provided the injury should be occasioned by any external or material cause operating on the person of the insured.' In the course of his business he lifted a heavy burden and injured his spine. It was objected that he did not sustain bodily injury by reason of an accident. The plaintiff recovered. In North American Insurance Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Penn. St. 43, the policy was against death in consequence of accident, and was to be operative only in case the death was caused solely by accidental injury. It was held that an accidental strain resulting in death was an accidental injury within the meaning of the policy, and that it included death from any unexpected event happening by chance and not occurring according to the usual course of things." I have no doubt that in the present case the county court judge ought to have found in favour of the appellant, if he had not been compelled to decide the other way by recent decisions in the Court of Appeal. I move your lordships that the decision of the Court of Appeal and of the county court judge be reversed, with costs in both courts, and that the action be remitted to the county court with a direction to the judge to ascertain the amount of compensation to which the appellant is entitled. The costs here will follow the rule laid down for pauper appeals.

Lord SHAND concurred.

Lord DAVEY concurred.

Lord ROBERTSON.—It is not disputed that this man, being a person of ordinary strength, suffered personal injury while working at his employer's business, because he applied such force to his work as to rupture him. Nor is it suggested that he hurt himself intentionally. The plain fact is that he miscalculated, or by inadvertance did not compare, the relative resisting forces of the wheel and his body. In this state of facts I am of opinion that his personal injury arose, by accident, out of and in the course of the man's employment in the sense of the 1st section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and I think that there was an accident in the sense of the other sections in which the word accident is used, whether preceded by "an," "any," or "the."

Much poring over the word "accident" by learned counsel has evolved some subtle reasoning about these sections. I confess that the arguments seem to me to be entirely over the heads of Parliament, of employers, and of workmen. No one out of a law court could ever hesitate to say that this man met with an accident; and, when all is said, I think this use of the word is perfectly right. The word accident is not made inappropriate by the fact that the man hurt himself. This use is indeed directly sanctioned by this Act itself, for 1 (2) (c) plainly implies that an accident giving right to compensation may be attributable to the fault of the injured man himself. In the present instance the man by an act of over-exertion broke the wall of his abdomen. Suppose the wheel had yielded and been broken by exactly the same act, surely the breakage would be rightly described as accidental. Yet the argument against the application of the Act is in this case exactly the same, that there is nothing accidental in the matter, as the man did what he intended to do. The fallacy of the argument lies in leaving out of account the miscalculation of forces, or inadvertence about them, which is the element of mischance, mishap, or misadventure.

In this view, I do not rely on the historical circumstances that the sticking of the wheel was caused by an accidental leak. I think myself that the leak is too remote to impart its own accidental character to the injury which ultimately resulted to this man.

I am for allowing the appeal.

Lord LINDLEY.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, contains no definition of the word accident, but the interpretation and legal effect of the Act, when applied to ascertained facts, are clearly questions of law as distinguished from questions of fact. I will assume for the present that it is for the plaintiff to prove personal injury caused by an accident. But when personal injury and its cause or causes have been ascertained, the question whether such cause or causes amount to an accident within the meaning of the Act is a question of law on which the decision of the county court judge is not final, and is not a question of fact on which his decision is not open to appeal. Upon this point I will only remind your lordships of the observations of Lord Brampton in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. (Limited), 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 47, see p. 68, which were concurred in by the other noble lords who heard that case, although they differed in the result.

The word accident is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning. Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities, an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss. But it is often used to denote any unintended and unexpected loss or hurt apart from its cause, and if the cause is not known the loss or hurt itself would certainly be called an accident. The word accident is also often used to denote both the cause and the effect, no attempt being made to discriminate between them. The great majority of what are called accidents are occasioned by carelessness, but for legal purposes it is often important to distinguish carelessness from other unintended and unexpected events.

In this Act of Parliament the word is used in a very loose way. The title speaks of "accidental injuries," section 1 (1) uses the expression "personal injury by accident." Personal negligence and even a wilful act on the part of an employer or any one for whom he is responsible is not called an accident, but it can be dealt with as if it were an accident, section 1 (2) (b). Serious and wilful misconduct on the part of a workman precludes him from obtaining the benefit of the Act, section 1 (2) (c), but mere carelessness on his part does not. Further, section 1 (4) shows that the Act applies to cases where a workman sustains injuries for which, but for the Act, he would have no remedy. In section 2 "accident" and "accident causing the injury" are used indiscriminately in fixing the time within which notice of it has to be given. In the schedule the word "injury" is used, and the word "accident" does not occur.

It is impossible to read the Act without coming to the conclusion that the object of the Legislature was to throw upon certain classes of employers of labour the obligation to compensate their workmen for personal injuries for which such employers were not responsible before, and it becomes necessary to determine what injuries are within the Act and what are not.

The governing section is section 1 (1), which runs thus: "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman," his employer shall be liable to pay compensation. What is meant by personal injury by accident? Mr. Powell, in his very able argument, contended that there must be: 1st, a personal injury; 2nd, that there must be an accident causing it; 3rd, that such accident must be the proximate cause of the injury and that nothing more remote than the proximate cause can be properly taken into account. I cannot accede to this contention. Assuming that there must be something unintended and unexpected besides the personal injury sustained, or, in other words, assuming that there must be a personal injury and an accident causing it, I cannot agree with Mr. Powell that this statute ought to be construed as if it were a policy of insurance against accidents.

In an action on a policy the causa proxima is alone considered in ascertaining the cause of loss; but in cases of other contracts and in questions of tort the causa causans is by no means disregarded. This was pointed out by Willes, J., in Grill v. General Iron Screw Colliery Co., L. R. 1 C. P. 611, and is strikingly illustrated by Siordet v. Hall, 4 Bing. 607, and numerous other cases of a similar kind. Siordet v. Hall was an action against a steamship owner for injury to cargo caused by water escaping from a pipe which had been burst by a sharp frost. The defence was that the accident was an act of God for which the defendant was not responsible. The judge, however, told the jury that if the water had been unnecessarily placed in the boiler, or, considering the season of the year, improperly left there without heat to prevent the action of the frost upon the pipe, the mischief was not occasioned by the act of God but by gross negligence. The jury found for the plaintiff. A new trial was applied for on the ground of misdirection. The court held that the loss was attributable to negligence and was not caused by the act of God so as to exonerate the defendant from liability. In other words, attention was paid to the circumstances under which the proximate cause produced the damage complained of. The rule that in contracts of insurance the proximate cause of loss can alone be regarded is carried so far that if it were rigidly applied to this Act of Parliament its evident object would in many cases be clearly defeated. No doubt the rupture in this case was the result of an effort voluntarily and strenuously made, and it may be that a policy of insurance against accidents might be so worded as not to cover an injury so caused. But if we look further and inquire what called forth this unusual effort, we find it was an unexpected difficulty in moving the wheel of the machine, and that this difficulty arose from an unobserved leakage which caused the material in the machine to choke the mechanism. The machine was accidentally put out of order. It had worked properly until it was stopped by an accident. It is not straining language but using it in its ordinary sense to describe the personal injury as caused by an accident. The personal injury was the rupture; the cause of it was the unintended and unexpected resistance of the wheel to the force applied to it. Such a case appears to me to fall within the Act.

Every injury must have a cause. The proximate cause may be an internal strain; but if, as in this case, the strain is occasioned by an effort to overcome an obstacle accidentally presented to a workman in the course of his employment, I am not prepared to say that the Act does not apply. I think it clearly does, and that the interpretation put upon the Act in Scotland in Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. (Limited), 5 Fraser 120, is to be preferred to the narrower construction occasionally adopted in this country.

In this case the cause of the injury is known, and it is proved that the cause was an accident. It is not, therefore, necessary to consider whether the Act applies to cases in which the cause of the injury is not known or in which the only unforeseen occurrence is the personal injury itself. But if personal injury is caused to a workman, and it arises out of and in the course of an employment to which the Act applies, it appears to me that primâ facie the Act entitles him to compensation; but that this inference may be displaced by proof that the injury is attributable to his own serious and wilful misconduct or to some other cause which shows that the injury was not accidental. The Scotch case above referred to is a valuable authority on this point.

The appeal in this case ought to be allowed, and the case remitted to the county court judge to assess compensation as proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack (Lord Macnaghten).

Order of the Court of Appeal and award of the county court judge reversed, with costs here and below.

Solicitors, C. F. Appleton; William Hurd & Son.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 16.

BIRMINGHAM EXCELSIOR MONEY SOCIETY v. HAYWOOD. (a.)

Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Ante-nuptial debt—Property available to satisfy debt—Form of judgment—Validity of restraint—Exception—Settlement of woman's own property by herself—Money payable by husband under separation deed—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 19.

In an action against a married woman, who married after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, on an ante-nuptial debt, judgment was signed against her for a sum to be paid out of her separate property, whether subject to any restraint against anticipation or not. Subsequently she separated from her husband under a deed of separation, which contained a covenant by the husband to pay her a yearly sum by monthly instalments for her separate use without the power of anticipation.

Held, that, on the true construction of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the money payable under the covenant could not be made available to answer the judgment debt, and that the judgment ought to be rectified by limiting its operation to separate property of the married woman not subject to any restraint against anticipation.

Axford v. Reid, 37 W. R. 291, 22 Q. B. D. 548, distinguished.

Appeals from two orders of Ridley, J.

The action was brought against several defendants on a promissory note.

One of the defendants, Clara Anne Lane, who was sued as a surety, was, at the time when she signed the promissory note, an unmarried woman. She married in 1902, and judgment in the action was signed against her on the 31st of December, 1902.

By the judgment as drawn up it was adjudged that the plaintiffs do recover £39 and costs against the defendant, Clara Anne Lane, such sum and costs to be payable out of her separate property, whether subject to any restraint against anticipation or not.

In March, 1903, Mrs. Lane and her husband separated, and a deed of separation was executed which contained a covenant by the husband to pay the wife a certain yearly sum by monthly instalments to her separate use without the power of anticipation.

The defendant, in order to protect her right to receive the monthly instalments from the operation of the judgment, took out a summons for the rectification of the judgment by striking out the words "whether subject to any restraint against anticipation or not."

The plaintiffs took out a summons for the appointment by way of equitable execution of a receiver of the monthly instalments.

The two summonses came on together before the judge at chambers.

Ridley, J., acting on the authority of Axford v. Reid, 37 W. R. 291, 22 Q. B. D. 548, refused to vary the form of the judgment, and made an order for the appointment of a receiver.

The defendant appealed.

Pritchett, for the defendant.—The learned judge was misled by the case of Axford v. Reid. That was a decision on section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, which enacted that any married woman's property belonging to her for her separate use should be liable to satisfy her ante-nuptial debts. The court there was asked to read in after the words "belonging to her for her separate use" the words "and not subject to any restraint on anticipation"; and they refused to do so. But the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has now repealed the Act of 1870, and the effect of sections 13 and 19 of the present Act is to introduce the very words which the court refused to introduce into the earlier Act. The only case in which a restraint on anticipation is inoperative is where the married woman has made a settlement of her own property. The defendant's right to receive the sums payable under the separation deed is therefore protected, and the judgment ought to be rectified by striking out the words "whether subject to any restraint against anticipation or not." The judgment ought to be in the same form as in Downe v. Fletcher, 36 W. R. 694, 21 Q. B. D. 11. The order for a receiver ought also to be discharged.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Longstaffe, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to maintain their judgment as it is drawn up. Section 13 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, says that a married woman shall be liable in respect of her separate property for her ante-nuptial debts, and may be sued for them, and all sums recovered against her in respect thereof shall be payable out of her separate property. That is a clear enactment. Section 19 does not qualify this, but, while preserving the effect of restraints on anticipation so far as regards post-nuptial debts, provides that no restraint on anticipation shall have any validity so far as regards ante-nuptial debts. The plaintiffs might have taken judgment against the defendant in even wider terms—viz., a judgment against her personally: Robinson, King & Co. v. Lynes, 43 W. R. 62, [1894] 2 Q. B. 577.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appeals must be allowed. The judgment which has been entered against this married woman has been drawn up without reference to the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The Married Women's Property Act, 1870, under section 12 of which the case of Axford v. Reid was decided, has been repealed, and the question now depends on section 19 of the Act of 1882. That section enacts as follows: "Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman, or shall interfere with or render inoperative any restriction against anticipation at present attached or to be hereafter attached to the enjoyment of any property or income by a woman under any settlement, agreement for a settlement, will, or other instrument." Then comes this important exception: "But no restriction against anticipation contained in any settlement or agreement for a settlement of a woman's own property to be made or entered into by herself shall have any validity against debts contracted by her before marriage." Here the defendant incurred an ante-nuptial debt; she then married, and subsequently she separated from her husband under a deed by which he covenanted to pay her a yearly sum by monthly instalments for her separate use with a restraint against anticipation. It is now sought to make this money which she is restrained from anticipating liable for her ante-nuptial debts; and it is attempted to bring the case within the exception. But this money is not her "own property" settled by herself, it is property settled on her by her husband, so that the case clearly does not come within the exception. The first part of the section, therefore, applies, and the restraint against anticipation must be allowed to have effect.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The case of Axford v. Reid is no longer an authority, as the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, under which it was decided, has been repealed by section 22 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. This case has to be decided under the Act of 1882. Section 13 of that statute provides that "a woman after her marriage shall continue to be liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property for all debts contracted and all contracts entered into or wrongs committed by her before her marriage." If the enactment stopped there, the present judgment might be allowed to stand. But there follows section 19, the language of which is wide and unambiguous. I am of opinion that on the true construction of this section the judgment is clearly wrong, and the money payable under the separation deed can not be made available to answer the ante-nuptial debt. The case of Robinson, King, & Co. v. Lynes does not touch the point raised here. All that was decided there was that judgment should go against the married woman. Nothing was decided as to what property the judgment should go against.

Appeals allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ward, Bowie, & Co., for T. W. Walthall, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the defendant, Hulberts, Hussey, & Metcalfe, for Edwin Docker, Birmingham

---

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Aug. 2; Nov. 19, 1902;
And K. B. Div. (Kennedy, J.) — Aug. 1, 3, 4, 1903.

ROWSON v. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT CO. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Butter carried in refrigerating chambers — Negligence in working refrigerating machinery—"Faults in management of vessel"—Harter Act (U. S. Congress, 13th of February, 1893) incorporated in bills of lading—Meaning of "seaworthy."

By bills of lading incorporating an American Act of Congress the owners of The Minneapolis, conveying butter in refrigerating chambers, were relieved from liability for damage caused by faults in management of the vessel, provided she were seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. The refrigerating machinery was in good order and the chambers properly cooled at starting, but through negligence in working the said machinery the butter became damaged during the voyage.

Held, by Kennedy, J., that "seaworthy" meant, in the present case, "fit to carry the butter safely," that The Minneapolis was seaworthy in this sense, that the damage arose from faults in management of the vessel, and that her owners, therefore, were not liable.

Held, on appeal, that inasmuch as the machinery was not intended for cooling the butter only, but other parts of the cargo and the ship as well, it was part of the ship, and that its mismanagement was a fault in the management of the vessel which relieved the owners by virtue of the Act.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Kennedy, J., sitting without a jury.

The facts were as follows:

The plaintiff was indorsee of certain bills of lading, dated the 29th of June, 1900, under which certain parcels of butter were delivered in good condition to the defendants in New York by Messrs. Abraham Hodgson & Sons, for shipment in defendants' steamship Minneapolis and delivery in London to the order or assigns of the shippers in the like condition.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The bills of lading incorporated the terms and provisions of, and all the exemptions from liability contained in, the Act of Congress of the United States approved on the 19th of February, 1893, and entitled, "An Act relating to Navigation of Vessels, &c.," commonly known as the "Harter Act."

The butter was carried in insulated chambers connected with the refrigerating machinery and apparatus of the vessel. This machinery and apparatus were in good order, and the chambers were at the time of shipment cooled down to the proper temperature for the safe conveyance of the butter; but by the negligence (which was not denied) of the crew in the management of the said machinery, the temperature of the chambers was allowed to rise unduly during the voyage with the result that the butter became deteriorated and was delivered to the plaintiff in a damaged condition.

The plaintiff thereupon claimed damages for breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading, but the defendants denied liability, relying on one of the incorporated clauses of the Harter Act, section 3 of which contained the following provision: "That if the owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property to or from any port in the United States of America shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy, and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent, or charterers, shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of said vessel." It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the negligence of the crew in the management of the refrigerating machinery was a fault or error in the management of the vessel within the meaning of that section.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the plaintiff.

Robson, K.C., and D. Stephens, for the defendants.

KENNEDY, J., in a reserved judgment, held on the the authority of The Thames, 61 Fed. Rep. 1014, and Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R. 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550, that the term "seaworthy" in the Harter Act must refer to fitness for carrying the particular cargo in question. His lordship found that in this sense The Minneapolis was seaworthy at the commencement of her voyage, and that as she ceased to be so through the negligence of the crew in the management of the refrigerating machinery, the logical conclusion must be that such negligence was, within the meaning of the Harter Act, negligence in the management of the ship of which that machinery was a part; and he gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Loehnis (Ricardo with them), for the appellant, cited Dobell v. Steamship Rossmore Co., 44 W. R. 37, [1895] 2 Q. B. 408; Owners of Cargo on Ship Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R. 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550; The Ferro, [1893] P. 38, 41 W. R. Dig. 222; The Glenochil, [1896] P. 10, 44 W. R. Dig. 148; The Rodney, 48 W. R. 527, [1900] P. 112; Botany Worsted Mills v. Knott, 76 Fed. Rep. 582; The Prussia, 88 Ibid. 531, (on appeal) 93 Ibid. 837; Steinman v. Angier Line (Limited), 39 W. R. 392, [1891] 1 Q. B. 619; Stanton v. Richardson, L. R. 7 C. P. 421; Kay v. Wheeler, L. R. 2 C. P. 302; Burton v. English, 32 W. R. 655, 12 Q. B. D. 218; and Calderon v. Atlas Steamship Co., 170 U. S. Rep. 272.

Robson, K.C., and D. Stephens, for the respondents, cited Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 566, 12 Q. B. D. 297; Queensland National Bank v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., 46 W. R. 324, [1898] 1 Q. B. 567; Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; The Rodney, 48 W. R. 527, [1900] P. 112; The Mexican Prince, 82 Fed. Rep. 484; and The Strathdon, 89 Ibid. 374.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This case seems to me to be rather on the border line; but the question which the court has to decide is really a question of fact, and not a question of the construction to be placed upon the clauses of the Harter Act which have been imported into the bills of lading. The decision (as I understand it) of the learned judge in the court below comes to this: He has found that the vessel, at the moment of starting on the voyage, carrying this cargo of butter, was in all respects seaworthy, properly manned and equipped. Having come to that conclusion he has also come to another conclusion of fact—namely, that the damage to the butter, by reason of its not being kept properly cool in the refrigerating chambers, was damage which arose in the management of the vessel. I do not think that anybody dealing with the clauses imported from the Harter Act, and deciding that those first two conclusions of fact were right, can doubt that the ultimate judgment of Kennedy, J., was right also. The moment that the court came to the conclusion that the vessel was in all respects seaworthy, properly manned and equipped, and if it was also true that the damage to the butter was damage resulting from the management of the vessel, it would be an irresistible conclusion that the shipowners were relieved from liability in respect of such damage. The court has to consider what the facts of the case are, and to see whether the facts and evidence are such as to justify the conclusion of Kennedy, J. [His lordship referred to the facts, and discussed the provisions of the Harter Act and the arguments based thereon, and continued:] What, for the purpose of clause 3 of the Harter Act, is the meaning of the phrase "faults or errors in . . . the management of said vessel"? In my opinion it means, in the management of the said vessel qua vessel. In these circumstances, if there had been some apparatus simply for the purpose of refrigerating the butter, I should have hesitated very much to say that such apparatus was part of the vessel, and should not be able to persuade myself to come to the conclusion that mismanagement of that special apparatus was mismanagement of the vessel. But it is not the fact that the apparatus was introduced into the vessel for a special purpose. It was not introduced any more for the butter than were the port-holes, the hatches, or other ventilating apparatus. I think that on the evidence it is clear that this refrigerating apparatus was put into the ship for the purpose of cooling the ship. It is true that when it was there, it could be used for the butter in the chambers or for meat there, or for the store-room of the ship, in which were placed the provisions for consumption during the voyage. It could be used for any or either of those purposes; and, in my judgment, the court ought not to say that Kennedy, J., was wrong in holding that this particular refrigerating apparatus was part of the vessel, and that the management of it was management of the vessel, and that therefore mismanagement of it was mismanagement of the vessel. That is the conclusion I have come to in the present case, and the moment I come to that conclusion I find it impossible to say that Kennedy, J., was wrong in deciding that the damage to the butter resulted from the negligence in working part of the vessel.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., gave judgment to the like effect,

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton; Holman, Birdwood, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } July 20, 1903.

HOARE & CO. v. MORSHEAD. (a.)

Practice—Leave to defend—Security to satisfaction of master—Decision of master as to sufficiency of security—Appeal—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14, r. 6; ord. 54, r. 21.

Where an order has been made under ord. 14, r. 6, granting the defendant leave to defend on giving security to the satisfaction of the master, there is no appeal from the decision of the master on the question of the sufficiency of the security tendered by the defendant

Appeal from an order of Walton, J., at chambers.

The action was brought to recover a liquidated sum.

On an application by the plaintiffs for summary judgment under order 14 the master made an order granting the defendant leave to defend the action on giving security for the amount claimed to the satisfaction of the master.

On an appeal by the plaintiffs from that order, Phillimore, J., affirmed the order.

The defendant having tendered certain security, the parties attended before the master, and the question of the value of the proposed security and its sufficiency was argued. The master found that the proposed security was not sufficient, and made an order directing that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to sign final judgment.

On an appeal by the defendant from that order, Walton, J., was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction to review the finding of the master that satisfactory security had not been given, and he refused to make any order except to give the defendant leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

The defendant appealed accordingly.

Witt, K.C., and Pollard, for the defendant.—Walton, J., ought to have reviewed the decision of the master as to the sufficiency of the security. The order of Phillimore, J., did not make the master a persona designata, but referred the question of the sufficiency of the security to him in his capacity as master. The master, in dealing with that question, was acting as an officer of the court, and was exercising the jurisdiction conferred on him by ord. 54, r. 12. By rule 21 of the same order, "Any person affected by any order or decision of a master may appeal therefrom to a judge at chambers." Owen v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 125, L. R. 3 Q. B. 54, and Sandback Charity Trustees v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 26 W. R. 229, 3 Q. B. D. 1, have no bearing on this case. They were cases of a persona designata not exercising the functions of an officer of the court.

Lochnis, for the plaintiffs.—The order of Phillimore, J., designated the master as the person who was to exercise his judgment on the question whether the proposed security was sufficient. The learned judge clearly had power to do this under ord. 14, r. 6. The practice is that in such circumstances there is no appeal from the decision of the master; for the master in deciding such a question is not acting in virtue of any jurisdiction conferred on him by the rules as master. It would be very inconveient if that practice was disturbed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed. We must begin by looking at ord. 14, r. 6, which is as follows: "Leave to defend may be given unconditionally, or subject to such terms as to giving security or time or mode of trial or otherwise as the judge may think fit." Under this rule, the judge, if he orders security to be given, may designate a person who is to ascertain the value of the security offered; for he has power to say on what terms he will grant leave to defend. Here Phillimore, J., directed that the question of the sufficiency of the security should be referred to the master. That was in accordance with the common form of order, and I do not think it was a direction to refer the question to the master as such. The parties went before the master and the question of the sufficiency of the security offered by the defendant was gone into by him, and he came to the conclusion that it was insufficient. It is now for the first time suggested that such a decision may be reconsidered on appeal. In my opinion the contention on the part of the defendant fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant relies on ord. 54, r. 21. But that argument assumes that the master decided the question of the sufficiency of the security in the exercise of his jurisdiction as master, and not as a persona designata. I think that the order of Phillimore, J., which was made under ord. 14, r. 6, referred the question to the master as a persona designata, and that the defendant cannot be allowed to question the determination of the master that the security tendered by him was not sufficient.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Tylee & Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, B. W. Kemp.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } May 1, 2, 20, 21; June 23, 1903.

In re BOLTON ESTATES ACT.
RUSSELL v. MEYRICK. (a.)

Statute—Private Act—Construction—Restraint on alienation—Exception in favour of jointures—Jointure appointed by will—Validity of exercise of power—Construction of earlier statute by law as existing at later time.

By a private Act (27 Hen. 8, c. xvi.) certain estates were settled upon certain persons and the heirs of their bodies, and it was provided that none of the persons so entitled should "alyen, bargayn, give or selle any of the . . . premysses . . . nor any other thing do which should be to the hurt or disinheritance of the heires of any of them . . . but only for the joynter of wyfe or wyfes for the term of lyfe or lyves of any husband."

Held, that, on the true construction of the Act, a power of jointuring was conferred which could be exercised by any instrument for the time being known to the law, and not only by fine or recovery, or since the Fines and

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Recoveries Act by disentailing assurance; and that, on the authority of Vernon's case, 4 Co. Rep. 1a, 4b, it was well created by testamentary instrument, though at the time of the passing of the Act a will had no operation upon land, the statutes which enabled land to be devised by will being later in date.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

By a private Act of Parliament (27 Hen. 8, c. xvi.), which gave parliamentary sanction and effect to an arrangement between two daughters and two granddaughters of Lord Brooke and their respective husbands, certain estates in Dorset, Devon, Cornwall, and Wilts were settled on Charles Lord Mountjoye and Anne his wife and the heirs of their bodies lawfully begotten as co-parceners, and then followed a proviso in the following terms: "That neyther the saide Charles Lord Mountjoye and the Lady Anne his wyfe John Paulet and Elizabeth his wyfe Francis Dartrey and Blanche his wyfe Foulke Gryvell and Elizabeth his wyfe nor any of them nor their heires nor the heires of any of them shall hereafter alyen bargayn give or selle any of the saide castelles manours menses landes tenements and other the premysses above specified nor any parte or parcell of theym nor any other thyng doo which shulde be to the hurte or disenherytanche of their heires or of the heires of any of them or to any of the saide remaynders but only for the joynter of wyfe or wyfes for terme of lyfe or lyves of any husband that hath or shall marry any of them or any heires that shall be inheritable to any of the same landes and tenements or for terme of lyfe of any other person or for years or at wyll after custome of the manour yeldyng the true and anncyent rent of the same landes or tenements so to him letten as aforesaid but that all and every acte or actes hereafter done or suffered contrary to the true intent of this present acte shall be voyde and of none effect in the law."

This proviso was recited in the Bolton Estates Act of 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. vi., private Act), which was passed mainly to enable the granting of building and mining leases and the partition and sale of the estates. Section 5 of the later Act referred to the powers of the earlier Act, and section 9 provided as follows: "From and after the passing of this Act the powers in the recited Act contained or implied of giving the said (hereditaments) for the jointure of a wife or wives . . . shall and may be exercisable either previously to and in contemplation of a marriage or after the completion or solemnization thereof . . ."

Section 10 of the same Act provided that after partition the powers of leasing, selling, and jointuring might be exercised as to each portion by the persons interested therein.

On the death of the late Duchess of Cleveland on the 18th of May, 1901, General A. W. H. Meyrick became entitled to one undivided third share of the said estates as tenant in tail. He died on the 26th of March, 1902, leaving a widow but no issue. By his will, dated the 30th of May, 1901, he bequeathed an annuity to his widow. By a codicil dated the following day, after revoking the gift of this annuity, he purported, in exercise of the powers contained in the two Acts, and of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, to appoint, bequeath, and give to his wife for the residue of her life by way of jointure the whole of his third or other share in the premises to the utmost extent of his power in as general and complete a manner as possible. The testator never executed any deed or disentailing assurance requiring enrolment appointing his said share to his wife by way of jointure.

A summons was issued on behalf of a sister and the children of other sisters of the testator as his heirs-at-law to have it determined whether, on the true construction of the Acts, he had power by will or codicil to appoint the income of his said share to any wife who might survive him.

Joyce, J., held that the power of jointuring conferred by the Act was not exercisable by will.

Mrs. Meyrick appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Younger, K.C., and Cave, for the appellant.—The question turns on the meaning of 27 Hen. 8, c. xvi. The Act creates a positive power by way of exception, and does not limit its execution to fine and recovery. Fine and recovery as a mode of alienation was first recognized by the courts in Taltarum's case, Year Books, 12 Ed. 4, 19. The respondents must show that by 1535 the practice had become so general that the Legislature recognized it as a regular means of alienation. The words creating the power are inapt for its exercise by fine and recovery. A fine would bar the issue only, while a recovery would destroy the rights of the issue altogether and put an end to the parliamentary estate. Though the power of alienating land by will did not exist in 1535, yet the later Acts of Parliament which authorized such alienation must be taken to apply to these estates and give by implication a power to jointure by will.

They referred to Reade v. Nash, 1 Leon. 147; Duke of Bolton v. Grantham, 3 Burr. 1259; Earl of Darlington v. Pulteney, 1 Cowp. 260; Vernon's case, 4 Co. Rep. 1a. 4a; Wigson v. Garret, Sir T. Raym. 239; Mestaer v. Gillespie, 11 Ves. 621; Tollet v. Tollet, 2 P. Wms. 489; Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 48; Cruise's Digest, vol. 4, chapters 13 and 14; Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), p. 563; and Williams on Real Property (19th ed.), p. 73.

Warmington, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and Tomlin, for the respondents.—By 1535 recoveries were a well-known method of conveying land. The word occurs in the statute of Henry VIII. itself. The recovery could not have its full legal effect by reason of the Act—that is to say, it could not defeat the rights of the issue, but it took effect so far as it was lawful by reason of the exception—that is, so as to give the wife a jointure. An exception out of a prohibition does not amount to an affirmative enactment, so as to enable a person to do something which he could not have done otherwise. At the time of the statute of Henry VIII. fines and recoveries were the proper mode of assurance for creating a jointure, and it cannot have been intended by the exception in that statute to confer upon the tenants in tail of these settled estates a power of alienation which they would not have had but for the exception.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Duke of Marlborough, 3 Madd. 498; Martin v. Strachan, Willes Rep. 444; Lord Advocate for Scotland v. Hamilton, 1 Macqueen 46; West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, 45 W. R. 388, [1897] 1 Ch. 335, [1897] A. C. 647, 46 W. R. Dig. 125; Duke of Grafton v. London and Birmingham Railway, 6 Scott 719; Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 270.

C. Ashworth James, for the executors.

Younger, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 23.—The judgment of the court was read by

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal raises a question as to the construction and effect of a private Act of Parliament, 27 Hen. 8, 1535, relating to the Bolton Estate. Mrs. Meyrick, the applicant, claims to be entitled under the codicil of the will of her late husband, who was tenant in tail in possession, to the income of the estate by way of jointure. The respondents who are the present tenants in tail in possession contend that the testator had no power to create this jointure by testamentary instrument, and Joyce, J., has adopted this view. [His lordship read the proviso, and continued:] It was argued on behalf of the applicant that the successive takers were only tenants for life, but I am clearly of opinion that they were tenants in tail enjoying all such rights, powers, and privileges as were possessed by tenants in tail after the Statute De Donis, subject only to the proviso: Attorney-General v. Duke of Marlborough. That proviso prohibits alienation or any act done or suffered to the hurt of the heirs, but only (inter alia) "for the jointer of wyfe or wyfes." Now in point of form this is not an affirmative clause enabling a jointure to be created, but an exception from a prohibition, and it is contended that the result is that the tenant in tail is left, quoad the jointure, in the same position as if the prohibition had not been inserted in the Act, and that a tenant in tail never could dispose of or create any interest out of his estate tail by will, and that the only mode by which a jointure could be created was by fine or recovery and is now by a disentailing assurance. On the other hand it is contended that the Act confers a power which may be exercised by any instrument known to the law for the time being, including (since the Statute of Devises) a will. Upon the whole I have to come the conclusion that the former view cannot prevail. In the first place, assuming which may be doubted, that recoveries had in the short interval since Taltarum's case in 1472 come to be recognized in 1535 as common assurances and means of alienating estates tail, notwithstanding the language of the Statute De Donis, I am not satisfied that a jointure could have been created by means of a recovery which was said to have a "ransacking operation" except as part of a resettlement. In other words, the recovery must deal with and operate upon the whole fee simple, and not merely upon a smaller estate carved out of it. A resettlement would or might have involved the breaking of the parliamentary entail. In the second place, even if, which I doubt, a jointure might have been created by means of a fine, such jointure would only have been good against the issue of the tenant in tail and not against the remainders over. In the third place, it is almost inconceivable that customary leases for life or for years at the ancient rent should have required a fine or recovery in each case with all its delay and cost. In the fourth place, the words are sufficient to create a power if it is necessary to render the Act operative: Reade v. Nash. In the fifth place, there are dicta by Lord Mansfield with reference to this very Act in which the tenants in tail are said to have power to lease: Roe d. Duke of Bolton v. Grantham and Earl of Warlington v. Pultenay. In the sixth place, the usage of the Bolton Estate since the Act for a period of more than three centuries is only consistent with this view. There is no trace of leases having been granted otherwise than by ordinary deeds, and there is no trace of any jointure having been created by means of a fine or recovery, or, except in one instance in 1838, by means of a disentailing assurance. Lastly, the Bolton Estates Act, 1863, contains a recital that Katherine, Duchess of Bolton, who died in 1809, had a life estate under a settlement or deed of appointment made under the powers of jointuring contained in the Act. Section 4 speaks of a wife claiming any life estate under the powers of the Act, and similar language is used in section 9.

It remains to consider whether, although neither fine nor recovery nor disentailing assurance is necessary to the creation of a jointure, it can be created by will, and on this point it is important to observe that apart from custom a will had before 32 Hen. 8 no operation upon land, and it is impossible to suppose that in 1535 an exercise of the power by a testamentary instrument was contemplated. I have felt the weight of this argument, but on the authority of Vernon's case I think it must be held that the argument is unsound. The Statute of Uses, which was enacted in the same year as the Bolton Estate Act, 1535, contained provisions to the effect that a wife for whom a jointure should be provided should not also claim dower. It was held in Vernon's case, 1572, that a devise of land to a wife is a jointure within the Statute of Uses. "Although land was not devisable until 32 Hen. 8, yet it is frequent in our books that an Act made of late time shall be taken within the equity of an Act made long time before." This seems to justify the conclusion that a jointure under the power conferred by the Bolton Estate Act upon tenants in tail may be well created by testamentary instrument.

The result is that in my opinion the order of Joyce, J., must be discharged, and it must be declared that the testator had power by will or codicil to appoint the income of the entailed estate for the jointure of the appellant, and that such power was well exercised in her favour.

Solicitors, Ford, Lloyd, & Co.; Williams & James.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Oct. 29, 30, 31.

In re STEPHENS.
KILBY v. BETTS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift to class of children—Period for ascertaining class—Prior trust for accumulation of income—Remoteness—Provision for raising portions—Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), s. 2.

The rule that, where there is a gift to a class of children, the class shall be incapable of being increased, so soon as any child would, if the class were not susceptible of increase, be entitled to call for payment, does not apply where there is a direction to accumulate for a period extending beyond the time fixed for distribution.

A testator directed that out of the income of his estate there should be accumulated a yearly sum of £24 while there should be a child of S. B. for the time being under twenty-one, and that the accumulated fund should be in trust for the children of S. B. who should attain twenty-one in equal shares, the shares of such children to be vested in and payable to them at twenty-one. Subject thereto he gave the income of his estate to S. B. for life.

Held, (1) that the period directed for accumulation was so long as there should be any child of S. B. for the time being under twenty-one, irrespective of the date when such child was born; (2) following Beech v. Lord St. Vincent, 3 De G. & Sm. 678, that the direction to accumulate was a provision for raising portions within section 2 of the Thellusson Act, and that, consequently, it was not rendered void by that Act; (3) that the class of children could not be ascertained until the termination of the period directed for accumulation, and, consequently, that until that date the accumulated fund did not become divisible.

Watson v. Young, 33 W. R. 637, 28 Ch. D. 436, followed.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In re Wenmoth's Estate, 36 W. R. 409, 37 Ch. D. 266, discussed.

This was an originating summons raising questions on the construction of the will of Christopher Stephens.

By his will, dated the 11th of February, 1886, the testator gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and investment, and out of the income to set apart the sum of £24 while and so long as there should be a child of his daughter Sarah Betts, the wife of Henry Betts, for the time being under the age of twenty-one years, subject as thereinafter mentioned, And he directed his trustees to invest and accumulate the said sum of £24 during the infancy of such children of his said daughter, or so long as his trustees were by his said will directed to continue to set apart the said sum of £24 a year. And he declared that his trustees should stand possessed of the accumulated fund in trust for such of the child or children of his said daughter who, being a son or sons, should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should marry, and if more than one in equal shares, and the share and shares of such child and children to be vested interests in him, her, or them, and to be paid and payable to them, in the case of a son or sons, when and as they respectively attained twenty-one years of age; and in the case of a daughter or daughters when and as she or they should attain twenty-one years of age or marry, and if there should be but one such child, then the whole for such one child only. Subject thereto, he gave the income of the trust property to Sarah Betts during her life, and after her death to Henry Betts during his life, if he should survive her. And he provided that if Sarah Betts should survive Henry Betts, the trustees should pay to her during the remainder of her life the whole of the future income of the trust property, and should not set set apart for any then longer period the said sums of £24 a year therefrom, but without prejudice to the sums of £24 a year which should then have been accumulated, but subject to the obligation of maintaining such of her children as were under twenty-one, or in the case of daughters unmarried. And after the death of the survivor of Sarah Betts and Henry Betts, he directed the trustees to stand possessed of the trust property in trust for all such of the children of Sarah Betts as should be living at her death, and the child and children then living of any child or children of Sarah Betts who should have died in her lifetime, and being male should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female should attain that age or marry under that age, if more than one in equal shares per stirpes.

The testator died on the 4th of March, 1888.

There were six children of Mr. and Mrs. Betts—namely, Ethel, who died in infancy in 1881; Frederick, born on the 19th of June, 1882; Beatrice, born in 1885; Reginald, born in 1888; Dorothy, born in 1891; and Marjorie, born in 1896.

The questions to be determined on the summons, which was taken out by the trustees of the will, were: (1) Whether the direction to accumulate the sum of £24 year was void to any and what extent, and, if so, who was entitled to the money already accumulated and to the annuity for the remainder of the period during which the accumulation was directed; and (2) whether it was the duty of the trustees to continue to set apart the annuity while there was a child under twenty-one, having regard to the declaration that the shares of the children were vested and payable at twenty-one being a son, or being a daughter upon attaining that age or marriage, and whether such trust for accumulation ceased on the eldest child of Sarah Betts attaining twenty-one being a son, or marrying under that age being a daughter.

Kenyon Parker, for the trustees and for Mr. and Mrs. Betts, did not, having regard to Beech v. Lord St. Vincent, 3 De G. & Sm. 678, contest the point that the direction to accumulate was valid. On the question of the ascertainment of the class of children to take, he referred to Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), 279, 280.

T. Douglas, for Frederick, Beatrice, and Reginald Betts.—The period of accumulation is to continue until the youngest child for the time being attains twenty-one. The rule in Andrews v. Partington, 3 Bro. C. C. 401—that, where a time of payment is pointed out, as where a legacy is given to all the children of A. when they shall attain twenty-one, the class is fixed on the first interest vesting—is applicable to the present case. Only the five children, therefore, who were in esse at the time when Frederick attained twenty-one are entitled to share in the accumulation, and, at present, they are entitled in fifths. Frederick is henceforth entitled to receive during each year his one-fifth share in the income of the accumulated fund.

He referred to Mogg v. Mogg, 1 Mer. 654; In re Wenmoth's Estate, 36 W. R. 409, 37 Ch. D. 266; and In re Knapp's Settlement, 43 W. R. 279, [1895] 1 Ch. 91.

Duke, for Dorothy and Marjorie Betts.—The rule in Andrews v. Partington, being a rule of convenience, does not apply to a case where (as here) there is a period of accumulation directed which may last beyond the time when the first interest is vested: Watson v. Young, 33 W. R. 637, 28 Ch. D., at p. 445; In re Knapp's Settlement, [1895] 1 Ch., at pp. 96, 97; In re Emmet's Estate, 28 W. R. 401, 13 Ch. D. 484, 490. Consequently the class does not close until the period of accumulation comes to an end. The direction to accumulate is a provision for raising portions for children of a person taking an interest under the will. As such, it comes within the exceptions contained in section 2 of the Thellusson Act, and is not void. Portions are sums of money secured to children out of property springing from or settled upon their parents: Jones v. Maggs, 9 Ha. 665, 667. A similar gift was held to be a portion in Beech v. Lord St. Vincent: see also the note to Griffiths v. Vere, Tudor's Real Property Cases (3rd ed.), p. 515.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., after reading the material portions of the will, continued: The first question to be determined is, what is the period during which the testator directs the aggregation and accumulation of these sums of £24? It appears to me that he expresses it perfectly plainly, it is to be so long as there shall be a child of Sarah Betts for the time being under the age of twenty-one years. It does not matter whether that child be born before its eldest brother or sister attains twenty-one. If it be a child of Sarah Betts, and that child be under twenty-one, then the time thus specified for the aggregation and accummulation has not expired. Just to give the dates in the case, to show how that applies. The testator died on the 4th of March, 1888. There had been a child of Sarah Betts who had died in 1881, and who may be disregarded. At the death of the testator there were living three children—namely, Frederick, Beatrice, and Reginald, who were born in 1882, 1885, and 1888 respectively. Frederick attained the age of twenty-one years on the 19th of June, 1903. In the interval, in 1891 and 1896, were born other two children, Dorothy and Marjorie. The period of twenty-one years from the birth of Marjorie will not expire till 1917. In my opinion, the testator has directed the aggregation and accumulation of these sums till 1917, and if there shall be hereafter another child of Sarah Betts, the period may be a longer one. The period may also be cut down by the other event named in the will—namely, the death of the husband in Sarah's lifetime. If so, the period is cut down to that date. But the period for aggregation and accumulation is, in my opinion, in the events which have happened, 1917, or such later date as an afterborn child of Sarah shall attain twenty-one, but subject to discontinuing the aggregation and accummulation at the date at which Henry dies in Sarah's lifetime.

The next question is whether that direction is in breach of the Thellusson Act. It is quite obvious that the period I have described is not within any of the periods allowed by section 1. The question here, therefore, is whether the gift is protected by section 2. It is protected if it is a provision for raising portions for children of any person taking an interest under the will. Now, Sarah takes an interest under the will. Therefore these are children of a person taking an interest under a will. It remains to say whether this benefit is properly described by the word "portion." Now, I apprehend that the word "portion," as generally understood, conveys the meaning of a sum of money secured to a child out of property either coming from, or settled upon, its parents. The benefit is none the less a portion, I think, because it is given not only to younger children, but to all the children, including the eldest. If that be a correct statement of the meaning of the word, this gift is within that. Now, there is authority upon the point in Beech v. Lord St. Vincent. I see no difference in principle between the two cases, except that the children who were in Beech v. Lord St. Vincent to be entitled, excluded an eldest son; but I do not see that there is any difference in the fact that all the children, and not only the younger children, are to take. I think, therefore, that this gift is protected by section 2 of the Thellusson Act.

The next question is whether the class of children who can take under this gift closed on the 19th of June, 1903, the day on which the eldest child attained twenty-one. Now, the rule which was laid down in Andrews v. Partington has been repeatedly stated to be merely a rule of convenience. In cases in which it has been adopted, the solution arrived at is in an endeavour by the court to reconcile two inconsistent directions, the one that the whole class of children shall take, and the other that the fund shall be divided at a moment when the whole class cannot be ascertained. The court has cut that knot by saying, we will close the class at that date, and then you can ascertain. You have got to choose between two alternatives.

But, again, as I shall show from the cases, the rule is never applied unless it is necessary. Where it is not necessary to resort to it, you give effect to the disposition as it is, and directly you find, as you do find in this case, that there is a direction to accumulate after the date at which the eldest child attains twenty-one—that is to say, where the fund to be divided is a fund to be aggregated and accumulated after that date, so that the fund to be divided is not known at that date, you are driven to the conclusion that the child who attains twenty-one cannot have that which is given to him at that date, because the sum to be divided is not known. Therefore, where you find a direction to accumulate to a later date, the rule in Andrews v. Partington does not apply. The same thing may be stated in a different way. The direction to accumulate until 1917 is inconsistent with the division in 1903. If you give effect to the direction to accumulate until 1917, you cannot divide in 1903. When you come, therefore, to the direction here to pay at twenty-one, you must read it as meaning that the payment is to be at the expiration of the period of aggregation and accumulation, or at twenty-one, if the beneficiary is, at that date, still an infant; in other words, that it means that you are to pay not before twenty-one—not that you are to pay at twenty one, although the aggregation and accumulation has not expired.

There are several cases bearing on the point. The first is that of In re Emmet's Estate, where the rule was applied. It was an ordinary case; there was no direction for accumulation and aggregation till a later date. The children were to be paid at twenty-one, and the decision was simply that the rule in Andrews v. Partington was to be applied, because you could not pay at twenty-one a share of an ascertained sum unless you knew among how many people you were to divide it. Therefore, it was held, you must close the class and determine the number of people among whom it was to be divided.

The next case is that of Watson v. Young, which is, I was going to say, exactly, or as exactly as any case can be, the present case. The gift there was to one for life, and after his death to his children who should attain twenty-one, and the issue of children who should die under twenty-one, leaving issue who should attain twenty-one, "provided always that the rents of the trust premises should, during the term of twenty-one years from the day next before the day of the testator's death be accumulated by way of compound interest, and the accumulated fund should be held in trust for the child, if only one, or all the children equally, if more than one, of R. who should attain twenty-one." What was held was that all the children of R. who were born during the period of accumulation, and who attained twenty-one, were entitled to take. Pearson, J., who decided the case, said: "But in the present case, where there is an accumulation directed, and no one can, therefore, enter into the the actual enjoyment of his share until the period of accumulation has come to an end, I do not see that there is any consideration of convenience, or of lesser inconvenience, which obliges me to shut up the class until the period of accumulation comes to an end."

In re Wenmoth's Estate, decided by Chitty, J., is reported as a decision that the rule as to closing the class does not apply to gifts of income. I cannot think that that case is satisfactorily reported. To understand my difficulties I must state a few dates. The testator died in 1871, and the eldest child attained twenty-one in 1883. The directions of the will were that the shares of the grandchildren were to be invested by the trustees during the minority of the grandchildren and form part of the trust, so that from 1871 to 1883 the shares of the income were to be invested, and in 1883 there was an aggregate sum resulting from so doing. At that moment there were seven children; four years later, in February, 1887, there was born an eighth child. The direction was "to apply the income unto and equally between the grandchildren on their attaining twenty-one." It is quite obvious that in 1883, when the first attained twenty-one, the question arose, Was he entitled to one-seventh of the income which had accumulated during this period, and thenceforward to one-seventh of the income, or was he not? And, further, when another child was born in 1887—four years later—was he still entitled to a seventh of the income, or was his share of the income cut down to an eighth? Chitty, J., held that the eighth child took. If so, did he take a share in the income which was there in 1883, and which accrued to 1887, or did he not? Did you divide in sevenths until he was born, in 1887, and then did you divide in eighths, or what did you do? It was obviously a question of difficulty which required a decision. Chitty, J., is reported as saying: "Where, however, as in this will, the distribution is of income and not of corpus, there is nothing which requires the application of the rule, and the difficulty does not arise." I confess I do not understand that. It seems to me that it does arise, and that the difficulty can only be got over by a subsequent sentence which I find in the learned judge's judgment, which makes it plain if I understand it rightly. He says just below: "Each member of the class, as soon as he becomes entitled, takes his share of the income, and there is no reason why the rule should be applied beyond each periodical payment." If you read the two sentences together, and understand the learned judge to mean that as each periodical payment falls due, you are to divide it upon the then existing state of things, that is to say, in sevenths, and when another periodical payment falls due, after another child has been born, you are to divide it in eighths, I understand it. But the order, as drawn up, is a declaration that the income is divisible in eighths—not that the income after the birth of the eighth was divisible in eighths, but that all the income was divisible in eighths. If that is so, it seems to me that the difficulty does arise as to what is to happen, and I can only suppose that the decision of the learned judge must have been asked only on the question of income which accrued after the birth of the eighth. If so, the matter becomes plain; if not, I confess I have great difficulty in understanding the decision.

The last case referred to is In re Knapp's Settlement, where it was held that the class closed. In that case there was no direction for accumulation. North, J., referring to Watson v. Young, a case which appears to me to govern the present, distinguishes it from the case he was then deciding, and points out the ground of the decision. I adopt his view, as it seems to me to be the true one. He says: "Although (in Watson v. Young) the tenancy for life had expired, a further term had to elapse during which the rents had to be accumulated, and till that period came to an end there could be no distribution, and therefore in that case the period for distribution and fixing the class was not the death of the tenant for life, but the expiration of the further period that had to run to make up the twenty-one years." Directly you have, as here, a direction to aggregate and accumulate for a further term, in my judgment, the rule in Andrews v. Partington does not apply.

I hold, therefore, that the aggregation and accumulation is to be continued for the period named by the testator, and that the fund does not become divisible until that period of accumulation has expired.

Solicitors, A. H. Arnould & Son, for Kilby & Collinge, Banbury.

Chan. Div. } Oct. 28.
Buckley, J. }

In re HAY.
KERR v. STINNEAR. (a.)

Will—Codicil confirming will—Unattested alteration made before execution of codicil—Construction—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 21.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where unattested alterations have been made in a will after the execution thereof, and the testator has afterwards executed a codicil confirming the will, it is in all cases a question of the construction of the codicil whether he has confirmed the will as originally executed or as subsequently altered. A "will" means an instrument executed in conformity with the requirements of the Wills Act; consequently, where the codicil purports to confirm the "will," no effect is to be given to the subsequent alterations.

A testatrix gave legacies to A., B., C. Afterwards, by her directions, the legacies were crossed out. The obliteration was not executed in the manner required by the Wills Act for the execution of the will. Subsequently she executed a codicil to her "will" revoking the legacy to B., and in other respects confirming her said will.

Held, that the legacies to A. and C. were valid, and payable to them.

Adjourned summons.

This case raised the question as to the effect of the confirmation by a codicil of a will in which there were unattested alterations made subsequently to the execution of the will.

By her will dated the 1st of February, 1901, Marianne Louisa Hay, after appointing executors and trustees, and referring to a power of appointment which she did not exercise, bequeathed her real and personal property to her trustees, upon trust for conversion, and to stand possessed of the proceeds of such conversion and of her ready money upon trust to pay certain legacies—amongst others "[to Miss Christina Stewart, of Orich, Nither Lochaber, £200]," "[to Miss Elizabeth McKenzie, daughter of Colonel John McKenzie, who at one time held] a command at Tynemouth Castle, £500," "to [Mrs. Stinnear, of Oxford-terrace, Christchurch, New Zealand, £3,000]," and to stand possessed of her residuary estate upon divers charitable trusts.

On the 24th of May and the 23rd of July, 1901, she made two codicils, neither of which is material to the present purpose.

From the affidavit of Emily Miles, the housemaid of the testatrix, which was incorporated in and forms part of the probate of the will and codicils, it appeared that on the 19th of October, 1901, the testatrix directed her to cross out the legacies to Miss Stewart, Miss McKenzie, and Mrs. Stinnear, and that she accordingly drew a pen through the words which are, in the will as above set out, enclosed between square brackets.

The obliterations were not signed by the testatrix or attested.

By a third codicil to her will, dated the 21st of October, 1901, she said: "This is a third codicil to the last will and testament of me, Mrs. Marianne Louisa Hay, which will bears date the 1st of February, 1901," and two codicils . . . "I revoke the legacy of £500 which I have given to Miss Elizabeth McKenzie, daughter of Colonel John McKenzie, who at one time held a command at Tynemouth Castle." And after bequeathing divers legacies she concluded, "In all other respects I ratify and confirm my said will and two codicils."

The testatrix died on the 28th of December, 1901. Probate was granted of the will in facsimile.

The above-mentioned facts were stated by his lordship in his judgment. It also appeared that on the 20th of October, 1901, she instructed her solicitor to draw the third codicil, and told him that she wished to revoke the legacy to Miss McKenzie, but did not refer to the others. He did not know of the obliteration, having drawn the codicil from a draft copy of the will. Some time prior to, or at the time of the execution of the third codicil, as the result of a conversation which the testatrix had with one of the executors on the subject of the legacy to Mrs. Stinnear, she said to him, "Let it stand."

The present summons was taken out by the trustees to determine the question whether the legacies in favour of the persons originally named in the will, but whose names were obliterated therefrom, were now payable.

Section 21 of the Wills Act provides that, "No obliteration or other alteration made in any will after the execution thereof shall be valid or have any effect, except so far as the words or effect of the will before such alteration shall not be apparent, unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as hereinbefore is required for the execution of the will."

Birrell, K.C., and J. B. Howard, for the trustees.

Astbury, K.C., and T. T. Blyth, for Mrs. Stinnear.—The codicil confirms the will as originally executed—that is to say, without the unattested obliterations. In the Goods of Hall, 19 W. R. 897, 2 P. & D. 256, shows that strong evidence is required to establish the fact that unattested obliterations are intended to be final. Such evidence was forthcoming in In the Goods of Heath, [1892] P. 253, 40 W. R. Dig. 204, and in that case they were held to have been incorporated in the will and confirmed by the codicil. In the present case the circumstances are in our favour.

Finlay, for Miss Christina Stewart.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.—Tyler v. Merchant Taylors' Co., 15 P. D. 216, is an authority for the proposition that where there is an unattested alteration in a will, and a subsequent codicil confirming the will, effect is given to the alteration. It is only in cases where the alteration is shown by the evidence to be deliberative and not final that the rule laid down in In the Goods of Hall can apply. Here the circumstances show that the obliteration was meant to be final. Confirmation of the will means confirmation of the whole of the document purporting to be the will, not merely of so much of the document as is her will according to the strict construction of the Wills Act.

BUCKLEY, J., after referring to section 21 of the Wills Act, stated the facts, and continued: Now it is plain, having regard to section 21 of the Wills Act, that an alteration of a testamentary gift, made after the execution of the will, cannot be effective, unless the alteration be executed in like manner as is required for the execution of the will. The first step is to see whether, in the third codicil, she has by that instrument altered a previously duly executed instrument so as to give effect to an alteration which the statute says shall be of no effect unless executed as a will. That is a question of construction. You have to read the third codicil and say what it is that she thereby confirms. That which she confirms may be either unattested or duly attested. The third codicil, being a duly attested instrument, whatever it is that she confirms by it will become part of her will. I cannot doubt what was the instrument which she intended to confirm. The first question, then, is one of construction. What did she mean when she spoke of her will? She begins by referring to her "will which bears date the 1st of February, 1901." It is the will without the alterations which she confirms.

It is not necessary that I should base my decision on that circumstance alone. There is a clause of revocation in the third codicil, a revocation of the legacy of £500 to Miss Elizabeth McKenzie. She therefore treats the will on the footing that the three legacies are subsisting and then revokes one of them.

It is unnecessary to consider the cases which have been referred to, and which are said to to have been decided differently according as the alterations were regarded as deliberative or final. All the cases appear to be reconcileable. The true view seems to me to be that in all cases it is a question of construction as to what is the instrument which the testator by his codicil intends to confirm. In the present case what is intended to be confirmed is the original will—the instrument of the 1st of February, 1901, as unaltered. I think, therefore, that no effect ought to be given to the alterations, and that under the will the three legacies were good. One of them was taken away by the codicil, but the others remain, and I hold that they are now payable.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Bubb & Co., Cheltenham; Blyth, Dutton, Hartley, & Blyth; Markby, Stewart, & Co.; Solicitor to the Treasury.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } July 8, 9, 18, 1903.

In re DENTON'S ESTATE.

LICENSES INSURANCE CORPORATION AND GUARANTEE FUND (LIMITED) v. DENTON. (a.)

Insurance—Insurance of mortgage debt—Surety for part of debt—Liability—Co-sureties.

In a mortgage deed the mortgagor and D. jointly covenanted to pay the principal and interest, D.'s liability not to exceed £1,000. In the same deed the mortgagor covenanted to insure the mortgage debt against loss in the name of the mortgagees with plaintiffs. The mortgagor had, previous to the date of the mortgage, made a proposal that the plaintiffs should insure the said mortgage debt. In reply to this proposal, on a date subsequent to the completion of the mortgage deed plaintiffs issued a policy of insurance to the mortgagees. It was by this instrument agreed that upon the payment by the plaintiffs of the amount which might become due under the policy the mortgagees should transfer to the plaintiffs the mortgage debt and interest and all securities. On default by the mortgagor, and the subsequent sale of the mortgaged property, there was a loss to the mortgagees of £984 12s. 6d., which was made good by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed to recover the whole deficiency from D.

Held, that the mortgage and the insurance were one transaction in two parts, that the plaintiffs and D. were in the position of persons subject to a common liability which had been discharged by one of them, and that accordingly they must contribute in proportion to their liability.

This was a summons taken out by the Licenses Insurance Corporation and Guarantee Fund (Limited) asking for a declaration that the estate of George Denton, deceased, was indebted to the said plaintiff corporation in the sum of £984 12s. 6d.

On the 2nd of November, 1899, Maude Hannay mortgaged the "Lord Palmerston" public-house at Highgate to mortgagees (a bank) to secure the repayment of £4,000 and interest. The mortgage contained a joint and several covenant of the mortgagor and of one George Denton, as surety, with the mortgagees for the repayment of £4,000 with interest thereon, and also of all such further sums as should for the time being be due from the mortgagor to the mortgagees for moneys advanced on her behalf for rents, rates, taxes, repairs, licences, &c. The liability of the said George Denton under the above covenant was not to exceed £1,000. There was also a further proviso that the mortgagor should insure the said debt against loss in the name of the mortgagees with the plaintiff corporation.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Maude Hannay had, in accordance with the last proviso, made a proposal to the plaintiff corporation on the 28th of October, 1899, for the insurance of the said mortgage debt, and in this proposal it was stated that George Denton would join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of £1,000 of the principal money.

On the 7th of March, 1900, the plaintiff corporation issued a policy of insurance to the mortgagees in which it was agreed that the said proposal should be the basis of the contract of insurance thereby intended. This document was headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy." It was witnessed by this policy that the plaintiff corporation agreed with the mortgagees (subject to certain indorsed conditions) that if the mortgagees should become entitled under their power of sale to sell the mortgaged property, and should give notice thereof in writing to the plaintiff corporation, the plaintiffs would, after the expiration of six months from the receipt by them of a claim in writing by the mortgagees requiring payment, pay the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage, with interest thereon. It was further agreed by clause 9 that upon the payment of the amount which might become payable under the above policy, the mortgagees should transfer to the plaintiffs the mortgage debt and interest, and all securities held by the mortgagees for the same.

The mortgagor made default in the payment of the principal and interest, and eventually the mortgagees, in virtue of their power of sale, sold the property for the sum of £4,044 4s. 9d.

At the time of the sale the sum of £5,028 17s. 3d. was due to the mortgagees, including interest, sums paid for repairs, and law costs, so that after the sale there still remained due the sum of £984 12s. 6d. The latter sum was paid to the mortgagees by the plaintiff corporation in pursuance of the said policy of insurance, and on the 23rd of July, 1902, all the estate and interest of the mortgagees in the property, including the benefit of the covenants, was transferred by them to the plaintiffs.

The surety, George Denton, died on the 15th of November, 1899, and the defendant was his executrix.

Everett, K.C., and Owen Thompson, for plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs were not sureties. They were in the position of underwriters: Dane v. The Mortgage Insurance Corporation, 42 W. R. 227, [1894] 1 Q. B. 54; Finlay v. The Mexican Investment Corporation, [1897] 1 Q. B. 517, 45 W. R. Dig. 76. In any case they were not co-sureties with the defendant: Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160.

Eve, K.C., and J. Henderson, for the defendants, argued that plaintiffs and defendants were co-sureties, and were liable to contribute in proportion to the amount of their respective liabilities.

SWINFEN EADY, J., stated the facts and proceeded: It will be observed that the issue of the policy by the corporation and the joinder of George Denton as surety in the mortgage were not separate and distinct transactions, but the same transaction divided into different parts. Each of them—the corporation and Denton—acted with the privity of the other. In the proposal in writing referred to in the policy as the basis of the contract, it is stated that Mr. G. Denton will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of £1,000 of the principal money. In the mortgage to which Denton is a party the mortgagor covenanted to insure and keep insured the principal moneys and interest against loss in the name of the bank (the mortgagees) with the corporation. The corporation and Denton were also bound for the same principal on the same engagement, although Denton's liability was restricted to £1,000 and interest. At one time it was contended on behalf of the corporation that their engagement was different from Denton's, as the corporation were only liable for the principal moneys originally advanced on the mortgage (£4,000) with interest, while Denton was liable for further advances and for moneys paid by the mortgagees on behalf of the mortgagor for rent, rates, taxes, repairs, licences, and insurances; but the liability of the corporation under the policy is to pay "the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage," and is not limited to so much of the original principal sum of £4,000 as remains unpaid. In order to ascertain the amount of "the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage," reference must be had to the deed which determines what sums the mortgagee is entitled to claim as principal. By clause 9 of the conditions, upon payment of the amount which may become payable under the policy the insured is to transfer to the corporation the mortgage debt and interest and all securities; this means the whole of the mortgage debt, and not merely so much thereof as may represent principal money originally advanced with interest thereon. Indeed, if the contention of the corporation had been well founded in this respect, and they were only bound to pay, and thereupon entitled to have transferred to them so much of the original mortgage debt with interest as remained unpaid, their claim to prove against Denton's estate would immediately have failed except as regards £18 2s. 8d., as this latter sum is the only amount they have actually paid for either principal or interest in respect of the original advance of £4,000, the mortgaged premises having realized by sale the full sum of £4,000. I treat the corporation, therefore, as bound by the same engagement as Denton, and I treat the sums properly paid by the corporation for rent, costs, repairs, and otherwise as covered by their policy. If these had been paid by the bank, the bank could first have deducted these sums from the £4,000 proceeds of sale, and thus left a corresponding deficiency of the principal moneys, which the corporation would have been liable to pay. These various sums appear, in fact, to have been paid by the corporation direct, and not by the bank in the first instance and then repaid by the corporation; but this is mere form, as the payments were certainly made by the corporation by reason of their liability under the policy, and to assist in realizing the property to the best advantage so as to diminish as far as possible the ultimate loss.

Under these circumstances the question is, What are the respective rights of the parties? The corporation claim that they are not in the position of sureties or co-sureties, but are entitled as transferees of the bank to throw the whole of the loss upon Denton's estate as it does not exceed £1,000 and interest, the limit of his liability. In my opinion this claim cannot be sustained. Denton was surety only, and could, with equal and perhaps greater force, have claimed that upon payment of the deficiency he would have become by operation of law entitled to enforce all the rights of the bank, including the right to proceed against the corporation under the policy for the full extent of deficiency. In the absence of any express contract as between the corporation and Denton with regard to the incidence of any loss, I am of opinion that their position is that of persons subject to a common burden or liability which has been discharged by one of them. That one is entitled in equity to enforce contribution from the other, upon the principle established and expounded in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Cox 318. It was contended that the corporation were not in the position of sureties strictly and properly so called. I am not satisfied that this contention is well founded. The policy contains a recital of a proposal for guaranteeing the said mortgage debt and interest, and then it provides that if the insured shall become entitled to sell the mortgaged property—that is, if the mortgagor shall make default in the payment on demand of the principal money and interest—the corporation will, after six months' notice, pay the principal money and interest. In other words, if the principal does not pay, the corporation will pay. It was argued by the corporation that they were merely in the position of persons insuring against a loss, but this argument is founded on their instrument being headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy," and without regard to the terms of the instrument itself. It is not merely an insurance against loss. The corporation is liable, after the expiration of six months, to pay the full principal and interest if the mortgagor does not, and even although there may not ultimately be any loss whatever on the mortgage. After transfer the corporation may ultimately realize from the security the full amount of principal, interest, and costs, and instead of there being any loss there may ultimately be a surplus for the mortgagor. The corporation may, under condition 7, require the insured to realize the securities, but they may not be capable of immediate realization. The corporation is liable to pay the full amount, irrespective of the securities not being realized. The policy is in a different form from that considered in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation, [1894] 1 Q. B. 55; but whether the contract of the corporation is a contract of insurance or a contract of suretyship does not seem to me to be material. The corporation and Denton were subject to a common burden or liability to which they must respectively contribute. The question then remains, In what proportions are they to do this? They will contribute in the proportion which the whole liability under the policy bears to £1,000. There must be a reference to chambers to settle the amount, as the figures are not agreed upon.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Jennings, Son, & Allen.

Solicitors for defendants, Loxley, Elam, & Gardner.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) } May 25, 1903.

SALT (Appellant) v. SCOTT-HALL (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Bye-law as to new buildings—No exempting power reserved therein—Bye-law not unreasonable—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49) s. 16.

By a bye-law with respect to new buildings made by a rural sanitary authority it was provided that "Every person who shall erect a new building shall cause such building to be enclosed with walls constructed of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly bonded and solidly put together (a) with good mortar compounded of good lime and clean sharp sand or other suitable material, or (b) with good cement, or (c) good cement mixed with sharp sand."

Held, that the bye-law was not unreasonable and ultra vires, because it did not reserve to the rural authority any discretion to permit the erection of any new building in exceptional circumstances other than in accordance with the requirements of the bye-law. On proceedings being taken under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, in respect of an offence against the above bye-law, the justices have discretion under section 16, though the charge is proved, to dismiss the summons if they think the offence is of a trifling nature and that punishment would be inexpedient.

This was a case stated by the justices for the county of Anglesey.

On the 8th of October, 1902, an information was laid by John Salt, the appellant, an inspector of nuisances for the Valley Rural District Council, the sanitary authority for the parish of Llanfaelog, against the Rev. W. E. Scott-Hall, the respondent, for that he on the 1st of October, 1902, unlawfully did break a certain bye-law made by the guardians of the Holyhead Union in accordance with section 23 (3) of the Public Health (Amendment) Act, 1890, with respect to new streets and buildings in that he did unlawfully cause to be erected a bungalow without causing such building to be enclosed with walls of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly bonded and solidly put together contrary to the said bye-laws.

The said bye-law was as follows: "Every person who shall erect a new building shall cause such building to be enclosed with walls constructed of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly bonded and solidly put together (a) with good mortar, compounded of good lime and clean sharp sand or other suitable material, or (b) with good cement, or (c) with good cement mixed with sharp sand."

By bye-law 98 it was enacted that every person who shall offend against the foregoing bye-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of £5, and in the case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of ten shillings for each day after written notice of the offence from the sanitary authority.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were either proved or admitted:

The structure in question was erected by and was the property of the respondent, and was intended to be used in the summer months as a dwelling-house or bungalow.

The foundation was of stone, the chimney and breastings of brick, and the rest of the building of wood, except the roof, which was of slate.

All the rooms of the bungalow were on the ground-floor, and the windows were French-windows.

The parish of Llanfaelog, where the building was situated, is a rural parish adjoining the sea.

The bungalow was an isolated building in the country, the two nearest houses thereto being respectively 450 and 200 yards distant therefrom.

Bungalows of similar character were frequently built and there were five bungalows erected in the appellants' district.

The cost of building a bungalow was less than the cost of building a stone or brick house of similar accommodation.

A bungalow made of wood similar to the one erected by the respondent was as healthy as it would have been if erected of bricks or stone or other hard and incombustible materials.

The bye-laws adopted by the appellants were in the form of a set of model bye-laws prepared by the Local Government Board for urban districts.

Since the adoption of such bye-laws the Local Government Board had prepared a set of model bye-laws for rural districts, but they had not been adopted by the appellants.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The above bye-law was properly made and confirmed by the Local Government Board in accordance with the Public Health Acts.

The appellant contended that on the above facts an offence against the bye-law had been proved and that the respondent should be convicted.

For the respondent it was contended that the bye-law was unreasonable in a thinly populated parish like Llanfaelog or in a thinly populated rural district like that of the appellants, inasmuch as it absolutely prohibited the erection of bungalows under any circumstances whatever, and however isolated, and did not reserve any discretion to the appellants to permit the erection of such bungalows under any circumstances.

The justices were unable to agree, and the information was in consequence dismissed.

The question for the determination of the court was whether on the facts of the case the justices were right in dismissing the information for the reason that the bye-law was unreasonable and ultra vires, or whether they ought to have convicted the respondent.

It was admitted, before the Divisional Court, that for the purposes of this case the rural sanitary authority had the powers of an urban sanitary authority under the Public Health Act, 1875.

H. C. Davenport (Ellis Griffiths with him), for the appellant.

J. Bryn Roberts, for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—No doubt it would be more satisfactory if there was a power in the bye-laws enabling the local authority to exercise their discretion under exceptional circumstances. We are asked to say that this bye-law is unreasonable and wholly void, because there is here no such provision. I think we cannot go as far as that. In the first place, this bye-law is in identically the same terms as the bye-law which has been treated as reasonable in the case of Batley v. Cuckfield Rural District Council, 59 J. P. 584. It was stated—I do not know exactly upon what authority—that they are the model bye-laws which have been adopted in urban districts with the sanction of the Local Government Board, and of course there must be many places in which such a bye-law as the one we are dealing with would be most salutary and prudent, therefore when I say it would no doubt be more satisfactory if there was such a dispensing power, I mean to say that such a provision under many circumstances might be most useful and salutary and most reasonable; but I hesitate to hold that this bye-law is unreasonable. It seems to me that the consequence of such a decision would be very serious, not only as practically overruling the case of Batley v. Cuckfield Rural District Council, but as having a very far-reaching application with regard to a great many other bye-laws in the country.

We are asked by the magistrates whether they were right in dismissing this action against the respondent for the reason that the bye-law was unreasonable and ultra vires. I think that they were wrong in dismissing this summons on these grounds.

It has been conceded, and, I think, rightly, on behalf of the respondent that this rural authority had the powers of an urban authority, therefore the question of its being made under section 23 of the Public Health Act of 1890 disappears. Of course we have already indicated in the course of the argument that we do not think there was the power to make these bye-laws under that section. Taking section 157 and the other sections of the Public Health Act, we think the bye-laws are not ultra vires, nor can we say that they are unreasonable.

The only other matter I have to deal with is whether the justices were bound to convict the respondent of the offence with which he was charged. It is true that these bye-laws apparently contain no exempting power, but the proceedings are taken under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and the magistrates have power under section 16 of that Act, if they think fit, to dismiss the summons. I think this case must go back to the magistrates with a direction that the bye-law is not unreasonable or ultra vires, and that they should deal with the case having regard to their powers under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. They certainly should exercise their discretion and deal with the matter as they think fit on the merits of the case.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I should just like to add a few words to explain the view I take of the matter.

It seems to me that all bye-laws relating to the construction of buildings ought to contain something in the nature of a dispensing power, enabling the local authority or surveyor to say that a particular building is of an exceptional character, and that the hard-and-fast rules laid down by the bye-laws as to the mode of construction ought not to apply to that particular building. But if we were to hold that every set of bye-laws that did not contain some such power was bad, it would follow that we should have to hold that these bye-laws could not be enforced. Having regard to the principle upon which bye-laws are now dealt with—namely, that the court does not interfere to set aside bye-laws which a local authority has deliberately adopted, because it is held that they ought to be the best judges of whether a particular bye-law is required in their own district or not, it seems to me it would be mischievous to hold that every set of bye-laws which purported to lay down a hard-and-fast rule for all buildings was necessarily bad because no dispensing power was contained therein. I think the proper way to treat such bye-laws is to say that they must not be set aside entirely as unreasonable, because the magistrates must be trusted to exercise the powers which they have in fact got of dealing with exceptional cases, when such cases do arise, in an exceptional way, and either inflict a perfectly nominal penalty, or, if they think fit, say that the particular offence is of too trifling a nature to require any punishment or any penalty to be inflicted. It is because magistrates have those powers that it is unnecessary to say that bye-laws which unfortunately omit to provide specially on their face for exceptional circumstances must necessarily be set aside, because exceptional cases may arise. I think that is the best way of dealing with such an objection to the bye-law.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for appellant, T. D. Jones, for T. R. Evans, Holyhead.

Solicitors for respondent, Horne & Birkett, for Gold, Edwards, & Co., Denbigh.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 12.

DOWDEN & POOK (LIMITED) v. POOK. (a.)

Restraint of trade—Covenant—Validity—Reasonableness—Province of judge—Province of jury.

The old rule that the question of the reasonableness of a covenant in restraint of trade is for the judge and not for the jury has not been altered by recent decisions.

A contract whereby the plaintiffs agreed to employ the defendant as the manager of their cider business contained a covenant by the defendant not to carry on the business of a cider merchant for the term of five years after leaving the plaintiffs' service. The capital invested in the plaintiffs' business was not more than £9,000. Most of their customers resided in the South of England, though there were also some in Scotland and Ireland. The plaintiffs intended to extend their business, and had opened agencies in various places. In an action to enforce the covenant,

Held, that, having regard to the nature and condition of the plaintiffs' business, the covenant, being unlimited as to space, was unreasonable, and therefore void as being in restraint of trade.

Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a jury.

The action was brought for damages for breach of a covenant on the part of the defendant not to carry on a certain business, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing further breaches of the covenant.

The defence was that the covenant was void as being in restraint of trade.

The plaintiff company was formed in 1902 for the purpose of acquiring the business of a cider merchant which had been carried on before 1895 by the defendant and subsequently by another company in and about Newton Abbot, in the county of Devon, and the business of a manufacturing chemist and cordial compounder which had been carried on by one Dowden in London.

By an agreement in writing, dated the 14th of June, 1902, between the plaintiff company and the defendant, it was agreed that the defendant should be the manager of the Newton Abbot department of the plaintiff company's business at a salary of £104, and that he should also receive a one-fifth share of the profits of the department. The agreement contained the following covenant: "The said Robert Gidley Pook shall not either solely or jointly with or as manager or agent for any other person or persons or company, directly or indirectly carry on or be engaged or concerned or interested in the business of a cider merchant, manufacturing chemist, or cordial compounder, nor permit or suffer his name to be used or employed in carrying on or in connection with the said business for the term of five years after leaving the service of the company, and in case the said Robert Gidley Pook shall commit any breach of the foregoing stipulations he shall pay to the company immediately on every such breach the sum of £100 as liquidated damages in respect thereof."

In September, 1902, the defendant was dismissed from the service of the plaintiff company.

The plaintiffs complained that the defendant had since his dismissal committed breaches of the above covenant by carrying on business as a cider merchant.

The evidence given at the trial as to the nature and condition of the plaintiff company's business was that it had a total capital of not more than £9,000, that the plaintiffs intended to extend the cider business and make it a wholesale business, that they had opened agencies in various places, that their cider was drunk in all parts of England, that most of their customers resided in the South of England, though there were also some in Scotland and Ireland, and that they were also doing a certain amount of export trade.

Grantham, J., left to the jury the question whether the covenant, being unlimited as to area, was wider than was necessary to protect the plaintiffs in their business.

The jury answered that the covenant was wider than was necessary.

The learned judge, notwithstanding this finding of the jury, gave judgment for the plaintiffs, granting the injunction which was asked for.

The defendant by way of appeal applied for judgment.

Clavell Salter, for the defendant.—The proper way of dealing with a covenant in restraint of trade is, first, to interpret the covenant itself, and then to consider whether the covenant so interpreted goes so far in restraint of trade as to be unreasonable. Further, the court will not sever the covenant for the purpose of upholding so much of it as may be reasonable unless it finds in the covenant itself some ground for making the severance: per Chitty, J., Mills v. Dunham, reported in Court of Appeal only, 39 W. R. 289, [1891] 1 Ch. 576. This covenant has no limitation as to space. None is expressed, and there is no warrant for reading any such limitation into it. The natural meaning of it is that the defendant is to be prevented from carrying on any such business as that of the plaintiffs anywhere for five years. Such a covenant must be held to be unreasonable: Allsopp v. Wheatcroft, 21 W. R. 102, L. R. 15 Eq. 59. The old rule that a covenant in restraint of trade, unlimited as to space, is void as being contrary to public policy is still law, though the tendency of recent decisions has been more and more to make reasonableness the chief test: per Vaughan Williams, L.J., Underwood v. Barker, 47 W. R. 347, [1899] 1 Ch. 300. The reasons which induced the House of Lords in Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., [1894] A. C. 535, to hold an unlimited covenant to be not unreasonable have no application to this case. This covenant is clearly unreasonable as being wider than could by any possibility be reasonably required for the protection of the plaintiffs' business: Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548; Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438. This covenant is not such as to enable the court to separate what is unreasonable in it from what is reasonable as in the case of Mallan v. May, 11 M. & W. 631. The decision of the learned judge, therefore, is erroneous. Secondly, the finding of the jury is conclusive in the defendant's favour. Reasonableness, which recent decisions make the chief test (see Roussillon v. Roussillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 357), is the same thing as necessity. The question whether the covenant was wider than was necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs' business was a question of fact, and was rightly left to the jury. The point has not arisen recently, as actions of this kind are now usually brought in the Chancery Division. But where there is a jury the question whether the covenant is wider than necessary ought, like any other question of fact, to be answered by them.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Foote, K.C., and Simey, for the plaintiffs.—The onus is on a defendant who objects to a covenant in restraint of trade to satisfy the court that the covenant is more than could under any circumstances be necessary for the protection of the plaintiff's business. The learned judge was rightly of opinion that this onus had not been discharged by the defendant. The only test to be applied in this class of case is that of reasonableness: Roussillon v. Roussillon; Haynes v. Doman, [1899] 2 Ch. 13, 47 W. R. Dig. 174. Assuming that the area of restriction extends to the whole world, there is nothing unreasonable in this covenant, having regard to the nature of the business which is to be protected: Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co.; Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.), 391. The business was acquired by the plaintiffs with the intention of extending it and converting it into a wholesale business. They are opening agencies in all parts of England, they have customers in Scotland and Ireland, and they also do some business outside the United Kingdom. The possibilities of the business, and not merely its actual present condition, ought to be taken into consideration. The finding of the jury may be disregarded. There have been many common law cases as to restrictive covenants, such as Mallan v. May and Tallis v. Tallis, 1 E. & B. 391; but the question whether such a covenant was enforceable has never been left to a jury. All the cases show that, whether that question is to be considered a question of law or a mixed question of law and fact, it is in either case for the judge and not for the jury. Where a contract is proved, and a breach is proved, but the defendant craves in aid the doctrine of public policy, the question arises whether the contract is so much at variance with the interests of the King's subjects that the court will not enforce it; and that must be a question for the court itself and not for the jury. The province of the jury in such cases is the same as in cases of malicious prosecution, where questions of fact as to reasonable and probable cause may be left to the jury, but it is for the judge to say whether the facts found amount to reasonable and probable cause. At any rate, no question ought to be left to the jury unless there is some evidence of unreasonableness; and here there is no evidence of unreasonableness.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action on a covenant contained in an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, by which the plaintiffs undertook to employ the defendant as the manager of the Newton Abbot department of their business. The covenant sued on is as follows: [His lordship read it.] The defendant was dismissed from his employment, and the plaintiffs proved that after his dismissal he carried on business as a cider merchant not far from their place of business. The defendant took the point that the covenant was void as being in restraint of trade. The view put forward on his behalf was that the covenant was wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs' business. The jury took that view, finding that, being unlimited as to area, it was wider than could possibly be required for the purpose of carrying on the plaintiffs' business. The learned judge, however, came to the conclusion, first, that the case did not really raise any question for the jury at all; secondly, that on the true construction of the covenant it was not more than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs' business. He accordingly granted an injunction restraining the defendant from further breaches of the covenant.

Now, is the question whether a particular restrictive covenant is reasonable or unreasonable a question for the jury or a question for the court alone? It seems to me, on going back to the old authorities, that it has never been doubted that this is a question of law and is one for the court and not for the jury. No doubt facts may have to be ascertained in order to enable the court to decide on the reasonableness of the covenant, and questions as to such facts may properly be left to the jury, but it is outside their province to decide the question whether the covenant is reasonable or unreasonable. In Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.), 391, Lord Macclesfield laid down the law thus: "In all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears, the law presumes them bad; but, if the circumstances are set forth, that presumption is excluded, and the court is to judge of those circumstances, and determine accordingly." The expression "the court" in that passage must mean the judge in contradistinction to the jury. Again, in Mallan v. May it was expressly decided that the reasonableness of a restriction was a matter of law, and could not be left to the jury. This was followed in Tallis v. Tallis. It is suggested that the current of recent authorities is to the contrary of this view, and that the law on the subject has been changed. In my opinion there is no ground for this suggestion. There have been numerous recent cases as to the validity of covenants in restraint of trade, and I think that some change in the law has taken place by which the area of possible validity has been enlarged. But these cases do not throw any light on the question as to the respective provinces of judge and jury. In olden times the idea was entertained that a restriction which was universal and unlimited was void. One view was that an unlimited restriction created only a vehement presumption of unreasonableness; another view was that it created an irrebuttable presumption. It seems to me that the modern view that a restriction, though unlimited, may under particular circumstances be reasonable, has not altered the law as to the question of reasonableness being for the judge and not for the jury. The authorities on that point are still authorities, and therefore the question whether this covenant was reasonable was for the judge.

Then does this court agree with the learned judge in the conclusion to which he has come? In my opinion the evidence as to the nature and condition of the business was all relevant and was rightly admitted. If that evidence had raised any controversy, there would have been a question for the jury. But there was no controversy in this case, as the books of the plaintiffs' business spoke for themselves. Quite apart from the finding of the jury it is clear to my mind that the business is not a large business, and that the great majority of the customers reside in the south of England, though there are a few elsewhere. Can a restrictive covenant, having an area of restriction extending over the whole world, be necessary for the protection of such a business? In my opinion, under all the circumstances of the case, the restriction is so wide as to be unreasonable and to invalidate the covenant. I cannot arrive at the same conclusion as Grantham, J., came to on this question, and I think his decision should be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the defendant.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Mann & Crimp, for Hacker, Michelmore, & Bewes, Newton Abbot.

Solicitors for the defendant, Dunn, Baker, & Baker, for Dunn & Baker, Exeter.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) May 12, 1903.

BOUCAS v. COOKE AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Copyright—Photograph—Made "for or on behalf of" another—"Good or valuable consideration"—Photograph taken at request of sitter—Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), s. 1.

Where a photographer takes a photograph of a person at the latter's request in circumstances which raises an implied promise on the part of the sitter to pay for the photograph, the negative of the photograph is "made or executed for or on behalf of" the sitter "for a good or valuable consideration" within the meaning of section 1 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, and the copyright in the photograph belongs to the sitter, though he may not have bought the negative from the photographer.

Pollard v. Photographic Co., 37 W. R. 266, 40 Ch. D. 345, approved.

Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., [1895] 2 Ch. 531, 44 W. R. Dig. 45, commented on.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Ridley, J., and a common jury.

The plaintiff was a photographer, and the defendant Cooke was a mission hall preacher, seventeen years of age, known as the "boy preacher." The action was brought to recover damages for infringement of copyright in a photograph, and for an injunction and penalties.

It appeared that in January, 1902, the defendant Cooke went to the plaintiff's studio, accompanied by a friend as a guarantee of his responsibility, Cooke being under age. Cooke asked the plaintiff to take a silver print photograph of him, saying that he wanted to advertise his meetings and to distribute the photographs there. The plaintiff accordingly took the photograph, and, according to the plaintiff's evidence, Cooke said that if the negative was good he might buy it. According to Cooke's evidence he said that he would buy the negative if it was good. The negative remained in the possession of the plaintiff, who supplied Cooke at his request with eighteen copies of the photograph. Cooke approved of the photograph, but they were unable to agree upon a price at which the plaintiff should supply Cooke with several thousand copies, and the plaintiff refused to accept a proposal by Cooke to pay for the eighteen copies supplied. Cooke then sent a copy of the photograph to the defendant Reynolds for reproduction, and several thousand copies were printed and sold. On the 30th of January, 1902, plaintiff registered the copyright in the negative in his name, and Reynolds also registered the copyright in his print.

Ridley, J., asked the jury whether upon the evidence the negative was to be Cooke's in any event, or only in the event of his paying for it. The jury found that the negative was the property of the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at £20 and the penalties at £5. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff accordingly, and granted an injunction restraining the defendants from further publishing the photograph.

Sir Arthur Collins, K.C., and Trickett, for the defendant Cooke.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and Turrell, for the defendant Reynolds.

Scrutton, K.C., and Colam, for the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action brought by a photographer to restrain a breach of alleged copyright in a photograph taken by him, and for damages and penalties. At the trial the verdict passed for the plaintiff. The questions are whether there was misdirection by the learned judge which resulted in the verdict being wrong; whether the verdict was against the weight of the evidence; and lastly, whether there was any reasonable evidence to support the verdict. The defendant Cooke, who is known as the "boy preacher," came to the plaintiff's place of business for the purpose of having his photograph taken. He was accompanied by a friend. It was the ordinary case of a customer having his photograph taken at his own request. There was primâ facie a contract made for a good or valuable consideration, and the onus was on the photographer to show that there was not. The plaintiff said that he was not paid for taking the photograph. According to the plaintiffs' evidence Cooke said that if the negative was a good one he might buy it; according to Cooke's evidence he said that if it was good he would buy it. That being the evidence, the learned judge summed up the case with reference to section 1 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862. That section provides that "The author, being a British subject, or resident within the dominions of the Crown, of every original painting, drawing, and photograph which shall be or shall have been made either in the British dominions or elsewhere, and which shall not have been sold or disposed of before the commencement of this Act, and his assigns, shall have the sole and exclusive right of copying, engraving, reproducing, and multiplying such painting or drawing, and the design thereof, or such photograph, and the negative thereof, by any means and of any size, for the term of the natural life of such author, and seven years after his death; provided that, when any painting or drawing, or the negative of any photograph, shall for the first time after the passing of this Act be sold or disposed of, or shall be made or executed for or on behalf of any other person for a good or a valuable consideration, the person so selling or disposing of or making or executing the same shall not retain the copyright thereof, unless it be expressly reserved to him by agreement in writing signed at or before the time of such sale or disposition, by the vendee or assignee of such painting or drawing, or of such negative of a photograph, or by the person for or on whose behalf the same shall be so made or executed, but the copyright shall belong to the vendee or assignee of such painting or drawing, or of such negative of a photograph, or to the person for or on whose behalf the same shall have been made or executed; nor shall the vendee or assignee thereof be entitled to any such copyright, unless at or before the time of such sale or disposition an agreement in writing, signed by the person so selling or disposing of the same, or by his agent duly authorized, shall have been made to that effect."

The question turns upon the words at the beginning of the proviso. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the only matter dealt with, there is a sale or disposition of the negative, and that is the view which Ridley, J., took, and in accordance with which he directed the jury, telling them in effect that the test of the right of the party to the copyright in the photograph was whether he had bought the negative; and that if the sitter had not bought the negative, the author of the photograph had the copyright in it. It is said that in this case the negative was not bought, and that, therefore, the copyright in the photograph remained in the photographer, and that the plaintiff, who took the photograph, can sue any person for reproducing or multiplying copies thereof. It seems to me that that view of the law cannot be supported. It is contrary to the express words of this section. It ignores the second of the two alternatives which primâ facie takes the copyright out of the photographer, thus ignoring the distinction between the purchaser of the negative and the person for or on whose behalf for a good or valuable consideration the photograph is taken. The Act regards this latter person as a different person from the vendee or assignee, because, having placed the copyright in these various persons, the Act proceeds to deal with the vendee and assignee as distinguished from the other, and imposes conditions upon them which are not imposed upon him. The Act thus draws a clear distinction between them. That being my view of the construction of the section, I turn to Scrutton on Copyright, where this result of the decisions is compendiously stated. He says (4th ed., pp. 193, 194): "In the ordinary case of photographs taken for a paying customer the photographer will be restrained from multiplication of copies both on the ground of copyright, if the sitter is registered as proprietor, the photograph being taken on his behalf for a valuable consideration, and even if he is not registered, on the ground of implied contract or confidence. Where the photographer asks for the sitting, and the sitter pays nothing for it, or for copies of the photograph, the copyright will clearly be the photographer's, if he is the author, as explained above. . . . The question in each case is: 'Was the negative taken for or on behalf of the sitter for a valuable consideration?' If so, the copyright is the sitter's; if not, it is the author's. And it would seem that if the photograph is taken at the request of the photographer, even though the sitter afterwards pays for copies, it is taken on behalf of the photographer, and the copyright is his." That seems to me to be a perfectly fair summary of the law. The question is, not whether the negative was bought or sold, but whether it was taken for or on behalf of the sitter for a good or valuable consideration. The evidence on that point seems to be all one way. A person came to the plaintiff's shop and asked to have his photograph taken, which was done. That raised an implied promise to pay for it, upon which the photographer could sue the sitter. There was a good and valuable consideration. The defendant Cooke said that if he was pleased with the negative he would or might like to buy it. That is all. That is the point upon which the learned judge was misled. He treated the contract mentioned in the section as a contract for good or valuable consideration to buy the negative, and that if there was no such contract the copyright was in the photographer. He treated that as the test. In so treating the case he was dealing with it under the first branch of the proviso only. The evidence shows that the plaintiff always intended to charge for the photograph, and the defendant Cooke said that he understood he would have to pay for it. Ridley, J., in his summing up, followed some observations of Kekewich, J., in Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., [1895] 2 Ch. 531, 44 W. R. Dig. 45, and made the test to be whether the sitter had arranged with the photographer to buy the negative of the photograph. He directed the jury in effect that unless there was a consummated bargain for the purchase of the negative by the sitter the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. That was the standard or test which he put to the jury, and the jury returned their verdict upon that direction. The decision itself of Kekewich J., was, no doubt, right; but this court is bound to consider whether those observations are sound in law. I think that they are not. They ignore the distinction between the person buying the negative and the person for or on whose behalf the photograph is taken for good or valuable consideration. There was therefore clearly a misdirection; and the only remaining question is whether we should send this case for a new trial or whether we should enter judgment for the defendants upon the ground that there was no reasonable evidence upon which a jury could find that the contract was other than the ordinary contract which arises when a customer employs a photographer to take his photograph. Frequently a photographer solicits attendance of some well-known person to sit for his or her photograph without making any charge with the view of multiplying copies and selling them for his own profit. That is not the present case. Here the defendant Cooke went in the ordinary way to have his photograph taken, and I can see no reasonable evidence that there was other than a bargain for valuable consideration to take the defendant's photograph. We must therefore enter judgment for the defendants.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls. In my opinion the law is correctly laid down by North. J., in Pollard v. Photographic Co., 37 W. R. 266, 40 Ch. D. 345. He held that where a photographer in the ordinary way takes a photograph at the request of the sitter upon the terms that the sitter is to pay the photographer for the photograph, the copyright in the photograph is in the sitter, even though the property in the glass negative is in the photographer, and further, that it is part of the bargain that the photographer shall not be at liberty to sell copies of the photograph or make use of the negative for any purpose without the authority of the sitter. The case is different when a person's photograph is taken at the photographer's request for the photographer's own use, and without any bargain being made with the sitter. All the cases such as Ogden v. Ellis, 11 Times L. R. 50, and Ellis v. Marshall, 11 Times L. R. 522, are consistent with this view. The only authority which conflicts with it is Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., before Kekewich, J. It is to be observed that there the photograph was taken at the request of the photographer and no charge was made for it. The decision itself was right in those circumstances, but certain observations were made by the learned judge which, if taken literally, would support the view contended for by the plaintiff here. The learned judge said: "It seems to me that a man cannot be said to make a photograph for or on behalf of another when that other is not entitled to have the negative of the photograph when made." If that observation is to be taken apart from the particular circumstances of the case and treated as an absolute statement of the law, I am unable to agree with it. At the same time, I think that the decision itself is correct. In the present case I think that the learned judge attached too much weight to the fact that the title to the negative remained in the photographer, and omitted to give sufficient weight to the fact that the photograph was taken at the request of the defendant Cooke, and that the latter would in the ordinary course have the right of control over the use of the negative by the photograper. I have felt some doubt whether we ought not to send the case for a new trial, but I do not differ upon this point from my brethren.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that judgment should be entered for the defendant, and that there is no need of submitting the case, which seems to me to be perfectly clear, to another jury who can only find one way. Ridley, J., in summing up the case to the jury followed the statement of the law in the judgment of Kekewich,

J., in Melville v. Mirror of Life Co., and the learned judge gathered from that judgment what he conceived to be the true test in these cases—namely, the purchase of the negative, and as the defendant Cooke had not bought the negative, the copyright was in the photographer. The true test seems to me to be plainly stated in the section—namely, the sale or disposal of the negative, or the photograph being taken for or on behalf of the sitter for good or valuable consideration. The defendant Cooke came to the plaintiff's shop to have his photograph taken. It was the usual and ordinary transaction between a photographer and a sitter. To take the photograph it was necessary that a negative should be taken, and it was taken for good or valuable consideration. A photographer invites persons to come to his shop and have their photogrhphs taken, and he makes a living by it. The photographer is as much entitled to payment as a bootmaker from whom a pair of boots is ordered. The defendant Cooke, who was somewhat of a celebrity, asked for a silver print photograph of himself to be taken from the negative for the purpose of circulating copies at his meetings. The photographer clearly foresaw that copies would be produced from that print. The plaintiff, having produced the negative for good and valuable consideration within the meaning of the section, can be prevented from making use of it except with the consent of the defendant. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, C. V. Young & Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Beckinsale, Greenwood, Tucker, & Cross.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } July 28, 1903.

In re SOMERVILLE AND TURNER'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Title—Equitable estate in copyholds—Sale by administratrix—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 1.

The equitable estate in copyholds vests, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, in the personal representative, and not in the customary heir.

Adjourned summons.

On the 17th of March, 1901, S. T. Chatt, who was the owner of the equitable estate in a copyhold cottage, 29, Rosedale-street, Sunderland—the legal estate being outstanding—died intestate.

Letters of administration were granted to his widow, Ada Blanche Chatt.

On the 12th of November, 1901, Mrs. Chatt, as administratrix, conveyed the said copyhold cottage to James Edward Somerville to hold unto the use of the purchaser according to the custom of the manor and subject to a ground-rent and certain conditions. And it was agreed and declared that the person or persons in whom the legal estate of inheritance in the said premises was then vested, his, her, or their heirs, sequels in right, and assigns should stand seised thereof according to the custom of the manor, subject as aforesaid, in trust for the purchaser, his heirs and assigns.

On the 10th of October, 1902, J. E. Somerville entered into an agreement with George Turner for sale to him of the equitable interest in the said copyhold cottage.

The purchaser delivered a requisition objecting that Mrs. Chatt had no power to sell or convey this property as personal representative of her husband, because the property did not vest in her.

The vendor replied that under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, the estate vested in her, thus giving her a right to sell and convey.

The purchaser took out this summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for the determination of this question.

Section 1 (1) of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, provides that "where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, it shall on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representatives or representative from time to time as if it were a chattel real vesting in them or him."

Section 1 (4): "The expression 'real estate' in this part of this Act shall not be deemed to include land of copyhold tenure or customary freehold in any case in which an admission or any act by the lord of the manor is necessary to perfect the title of a purchaser from the customary tenant.

Section 2 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, provides that "land shall not be registered under this Act unless it is of freehold tenure or is leasehold held under a lease which is either immediately or mediately derived out of land of freehold tenure; but for the purposes of this Act customary freehold, in any case in which an admission or any act by the lord of the manor is necessary to perfect the title of a purchase from a customary tenant, shall not be deemed to be land of freehold tenure.

Gatey, for the purchaser.—Section 1 (1) of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, does not apply to copyhold land at all. The expression "land of copyhold tenure" in section 1 (4) includes copyhold land whether held by legal or equitable title, and therefore all copyhold land is excluded from the "real estate" which is dealt with by section 1 (1). The words following "customary freehold" must be held to refer to customary freehold and not to "land of copyhold tenure" in analogy to the canon of construction laid down in Wolverton v. Attorney-General, [1898] A. C., at pp. 554 and 555. In the Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 2, similar words refer to customary freehold only. In some Acts, such as the Fines and Recoveries Act, s. 50, and the Trustee Act, 1893, s. 12, sub-section 3, where a distinction has been drawn between the legal and equitable estates in copyhold land, it has been done with great accuracy. In the Land Transfer Act, 1897, no distinction has been drawn, and the presumption is that the equitable estate was intended to devolve according to the same rules as the legal estate, which clearly would not devolve upon the personal representative.

Methold, for the vendor.—The words "land of copyhold tenure" in sub-section 4 refer only to legal estates in copyholds. The words following "customary freehold" in the sub-section apply both to "land of copyhold tenure" and to "customary freehold." In the Fines and Recoveries Act and the Trustee Act a distinction was drawn between the legal and equitable estates in copyholds for the reason that in dealing with the legal estate in copyholds the rights of the lord would be interfered with, but in dealing with the equitable estate no act of the lord is necessary, therefore there is no reason why the equitable estate should not devolve upon the personal representative. To hold otherwise would be to cut down the obvious intention of the Legislature.

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question for decision arises in this way: the vendor accepted a conveyance from a personal representative of a deceased person of land of copyhold tenure, not of the legal estate but only of the equitable estate. If the present vendor, having purchased from the personal representative of a deceased owner, obtained a bad title he cannot force that title on the purchaser. On that there arise two questions, both undecided, upon the construction of Part I. of the Land Transfer Act, 1897. The object of Part I. of that Act was to establish a real representative. As a matter of history it was deemed inconvenient that freehold estates in land should vest in the heir, whereas leaseholds vested in the legal personal representative of a deceased, and it was deemed desirable that both should be placed upon the same footing. Accordingly it was provided by the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 1, that "where real estate is vested in any person, it shall on his death become vested in his personal representatives as if it were a chattel real vesting in them." There was no new real representative established, though it is said that the Act is for the establishment of a real representative, but the personal representatives are constituted real representatives, and the Act expresses the intention in clear language that as regards vesting in personal representatives real estate is to follow chattels real; in other words, the law respecting leaseholds.

The first question that arises is, Does this apply equally to legal and equitable estates? I see no reason why it should not apply to equitable estates as well as to legal estates, and to hold that it did not apply to equitable estate as well as to legal estates would, in my opinion, be to cut down the value of the section and deprive it of its proper meaning. It is common knowledge that a very large proporsion of estates, including freeholds, are held by equitable titles, some outstanding estate in a mortgage has been sometimes forgotten, and where the legal estate is outstanding, all the other estates are necessarily equitable. It may be vested in the trustee of an old settlement or will, and never have been conveyed, and sometimes difficult questions arise in consequence as to the devolution of real estate. But the court is accustomed in considering questions affecting the title to property to deal with them in precisely the same manner whether the estate is legal or equitable. And, further, the devolution of an equitable estate is governed by the same rules as the legal estate. It is impossible to conceive that when the Legislature provided for real estates being vested in the personal representative, it was intended that equitable estates should not be affected. Personal representatives take chattels real whether legal or equitable, an equity of redemption as much as an original lease. Therefore, in answer to the first question, section 1, sub-section 1, applies both to the legal and the equitable estate in property which under that section vests in the personal representative.

In the present case the vendor purchased an equitable estate from an administratrix, and this equitable estate would clearly have vested in her if it had been an equitable interest in freeholds, but it was an equitable interest in copyholds. It is said that by section 1, sub-section 4, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, the equitable estate in copyholds is taken out of the operation of Part I. of the Act. It is said that all land of copyhold tenure is excepted from the expression "real estate" in section 1, sub-section 4, but that depends upon how sub-section 4 is read. It was urged that the words of the sub-section following "customary freeholds" must be held to apply to "customary freeholds" only, and not to "land of copyhold tenure." It is possible to read the sub-section in this way if it were necessary in order to give it a rational meaning, but in my opinion it is not necessary. "Real estate" is "not [to] be deemed to include land of copyhold tenure or customary freehold in any case"; grammatically that means either "land of copyhold tenure or customary freehold in any case"; and unless the words that follow show on the face of them that they are inapplicable to both they must be held to extend to both. I see no reason why the words should not apply to both. The words "customary tenant" would seem to refer to customary freeholds, but a tenant of copyhold land is tenant according to the custom of the manor, and the words are therefore quite applicable to both; moreover, the phrase "in any case" seems to me to apply both to customary freeholds and to lands of copyhold tenure. There seems to me good reason for the exception contained in sub-section 4, for when the land descends to the heir according to the custom of the manor it is not convenient to interfere with the relations which exist between the lord of the manor and the tenant. There is a peculiar relation between them, and to introduce the personal representative in that case would be to introduce a novelty which would cause difficulty. But that does not arise in the case of an equitable interest, therefore one gets a very good explanation of the restricted meaning of the exception. It is said that the other interpretation must be sound because this is an Act passed to amend the Land Transfer Act, 1875, in section 2 of which we find that the same words only qualify "customary freeholds," but land of copyhold tenure is not mentioned; that is not the alternative which we have in sub-section 4. But when the alternative "land of copyhold tenure or customary freehold" is used, the Act of 1875 ceases to have application to a large extent. That being so, and this not being a case in which the act of the lord is necessary, because the equitable interest may be conveyed without the lord's intervention, I think that the equitable estate in this copyhold passed to the personal representative from whom the present vendor bought, and his title is therefore good.

Solicitors, S. Gissing Skelton, for W. Murray Humphrey, Sunderland; J. & R. Gole, for T. Thorburn Nesbitt, Sunderland.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } July 23, 1903.

In re O'CONNELL.

MAWLE v. JAGOE, A. S. C. LEMPRIERE, AND OTHERS. (a.)

Marriage settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Property bequeathed to wife with general power of appointment, subject thereto to herself absolutely.

Where property is given subject to a general power of appointment, and subject thereto to the donee absolutely, then it will be caught by a covenant previously entered into by the donee to settle after-acquired property.

Steward v. Poppleton, W. N. (1877) 29, followed.

Adjourned summons.

By a settlement, dated the 14th of December, 1881, made on the marriage of G. B. Lempriere and A. S. C. Lempriere it was agreed that if the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere then was, or if during the said intended coverture she or the defendant G. B.

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lempriere in her right should at one and the same time and from the same source (whether under or by virtue of the trusts or provisions of the hereinbefore-mentioned articles for a settlement, dated the 8th of March, 1842, or any appointment made or to be made or executed under any power or provision therein contained, or from any other source) become seised or possessed of or entitled to any real or personal property of the value of £200 or upwards for any estate or interest whatsoever in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy (except jewels and certain other articles therein mentioned), then and in every such case the defendant G. B. Lempriere and the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere and all other necessary parties should assign and assure the said real or personal property to or otherwise cause the same to be vested in the trustees of the settlement upon the trusts thereby declared.

Frances E. O'Connell, the mother of A. S. C. Lempriere, by a settlement made on her marriage in 1842, covenanted to assure to the trustees of the settlement two-thirds of certain real and personal estate on the trusts therein mentioned, and after her death the trustees were to stand possessed of the said two-thirds of the trust estate in trust for all and every the child or children issue of the said marriage in such shares and proportions as the said F. E. O'Connell should by her last will and testament in writing or any codicil thereto direct or appoint, and as to the remaining one equal third part of the trust premises the trustees should stand possessed upon trust for such persons and for such trusts as the said F. E. O'Connell should by any deed or instrument in writing appoint.

There was issue of the said marriage several children, of whom the defendant Anne Sophia Campbell Lempriere was one.

By her will, dated the 7th of May, 1888, the said F. E. O'Connell, after reciting the effect of the said indenture of settlement of the 8th of March, 1842, directed that the trustees of the said indenture should stand possessed of such parts of the said trust premises over which she had a power of appointment, and she devised and bequeathed the same in trust as to a moiety of the residue to the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere, her executors, &c., and she further gave to the executors named therein all income which might be owing to her at her death, and all other (if any) of the real and personal property belonging to her at her death which she might have power to dispose of (except the property comprised in the appointment hereinbefore mentioned) unto the executors therein named upon trust for such persons and purposes and in such sums and manner in every respect as her daughter, the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere, should, notwithstanding coverture, in writing appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere for her sole and separate use, it being the expressed intention of the testatrix that the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere might be able, by exercising her power of appointment, to defeat the operation of the agreement and declaration contained in her ante-nuptial settlement for the settlement of her after-acquired property of the value of £200 or upward.

By a codicil to the above will, dated the 26th of August, 1898, the testatrix directed that the trustees of her marriage settlement should stand possessed of one-fourth of the sum of £2,000 and the investments representing the same upon trust for such persons and purposes and in such sums and manner in every respect as her said daughter, the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere, should, notwithstanding coverture, in writing appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere for her sole and separate use, it being the expressed intention of the testatrix that she (the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere) might be able, by exercising her power of appointment, to defeat the operation of the agreement and declaration contained in her said ante-nuptial settlement for the settlement of her after-acquired property of the value of £200 and upwards.

By four deeds-poll A. S. C. Lempriere purported to exercise the powers of appointment given her respecting the residue and her fourth share in the £2,000 by appointing in favour of herself absolutely two sums of £199, part of the residue, and two sums of like amount, part of her fourth share in the £2,000.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, trustees of the settlement of the 8th of March, 1842, desired to have the decision of the court as to whether they ought to pay the two appointed sums (part of the said legacy of £500) to the defendant A. S. C. Lempriere for her own benefit, or whether they should pay the whole of the said legacy of £500 to the trustees of the marriage settlement of A. S. C. Lempriere. And the executor of the will and codicil of the said F. E. O'Connell asked for a similar decision in respect of the two appointed sums part of the residue of the estate of F. E. O'Connell.

E. D. Robertson, for the trustees of the wills, stated the case to the court.

Christopher James, for the trustees of the marriage settlement.—Both funds are caught; both funds, if they are not appointed by Mrs. Lempriere, then Mrs. Lempriere takes them absolutely. General principles show that they are caught by the covenant, as Mrs. Lempriere cannot derogate from her own grant: Attorney-General v. Selborne, 50 W. R. 210, [1902] 1 K. B. 388; Stewart v. Poppleton, W. N. (1877) 29; Lord Gerrard's case, 58 L. T. 800; Ewart v. Ewart, 11 Hare 276; Bower v. Smith, 19 W. R. 399. The interest she takes in each case is hers absolutely. By the settlement for value she contracted to settle after-acquired property. No distinction as to the source whence the property comes exists. She has contracted to assign it to trustees on her mother's death. She cannot be allowed to defeat the equitable interest of the trustees by an exercise of the power.

Adams, for Mrs. Lempriere.—It is a question of contract; the matter rests in contract. Mrs. Lempriere is bound to give effect to her contract and no more. The only thing she contracts to settle is a defeasible interest, and if it is defeated by the exercise of the power in favour of others or of herself, then the covenant as to after-acquired property does not affect it. In the case of Stewart v. Poppleton neither Ewart v. Ewart nor Townshend v. Harrowby, 27 L. J. Ch. 553, is alluded to. This latter case is clear authority that where a power of appointment is given, the donee should not be prevented from exercising it as he or she thinks fit.

KEKEWICH, J.—Mrs. O'Connell had some property which was her own and which she could dispose of as she pleased, and some which was not her own but over which she had a power of appointment under her marriage settlement. She died, and by her will and codicil purported to exercise her power of appointment in favour of her daughter Mrs. Lempriere in a manner which is familiar to conveyancers. She wanted to give her daughter a power of appointment over the property and also the property itself. She could have done that in three ways: (1) given it to trustees on trust as daughter should appoint, and in default of appointment to her daughter absolutely; (2) given it straight to daughter; (3) to the daughter absolutely or as she should by deed or will appoint.

These are some of the methods by which she might have given the property that I have mentioned, although she has not followed the exact phraseology of one of them. But she has followed them in substance, and there is no distinction in principle, if the intention is clear that the daughter is to have a power of appointment and subject to that, is to take absolutely. Now this power of appointment was put in for some purpose. Why was it put in here? It was put in because Mrs. O'Connell knew that her daughter Mrs. Lempriere was bound by her marriage settlement to settle after-acquired property, and she desired to enable her daughter to evade that obligation —that is, in the proper sense of that term; she says so herself in so many words. It is a fact that Mrs. Lempriere had bound herself to settle all her after-acquired property and there is a particular reference in her covenant to property which might come to her under her mother's marriage settlement, but I put that aside. The point is that Mrs. Lempriere has covenanted to settle all after-acquired property to which she may become absolutely entitled, and the only question is whether or not this property is caught by that covenant, Mrs. Lempriere having been given a power of appointment over it practically before it is given to her absolutely.

I think there is no advantage in distinguishing between the different portions of property which Mrs. Lempriere gets. Substantially it is the same whether she gets her shares under Mrs. O'Connell's will and codicil by virtue of the exercise by Mrs. O'Connell of her power of appointment or directly. All are disposed of in the same way and are governed by the same considerations.

Curiously enough it is said that there are no direct authorities on the point, although the industry of counsel has succeeded in discovering some that are of assistance; and it is truly said that there is a conflict of authority. In the case of Bower v. Smith a lady by her marriage settlement covenanted to settle after-acquired property, and money was subsequently bequeathed to her upon such trusts as she should appoint, and Lord Romilly held that the money was not caught by the covenant. But there was a gift over in default of appointment, not to the lady herself, but to a stranger, so that it was impossible to say that the lady by exercising the power could defeat a gift over to herself which would be caught. That case was originally imperfectly reported and was subsequently corrected by Sir G. Jessel in Steward v. Poppleton, which is, I think, a direct decision on the point. It is unfortunately, however, only reported in the Weekly Notes. If it had been more fully reported we might have known exactly what were Sir G. Jessel's reasons for his decision that the share was bound by the covenant. There the case was like what we have here, a devise and bequest and then a power of appointment, an absolute gift for the lady's separate use, and then as she should appoint; and the question was whether she could, by the exercise of her power, take the property out of her covenant to settle after-acquired property, and the Master of the Rolls held that she could not, and his decision acquires strength because he distinguished the case then before him from that of Bower v. Smith on the ground that the gift over in Steward v. Poppleton was to the same person to whom the power was given, whereas in Bower v. Smith it was to a stranger.

The next case is that of In re Lord Gerard. Now, I cannot say that North, J., did not understand that case, but I certainly cannot understand him, which, no doubt, is my fault. He seems to have thought that Bower v. Smith conflicted with Steward v. Poppleton, but I do not think it does. In the former case there was a gift over to a stranger, in the latter there was not.

There is one other authority I must refer to in the case of Townshend v. Harrowby. The head-note in the Law Journal is not explicit, although the report is. There property was given to a lady with a power of appointment and in default of appointment to her for her life, and subject to that to her absolutely. Kindersley, V.C., broke up the gift into three parts—the power, the life estate, and the absolute interest—he thus found distinct gifts and held that what was true of the last was not true of the first two gifts—that is, that although the ultimate interest was affected by the covenant, the power was not; and there was no coalescing or merger. The lady was free to exercise her power of appointment so as properly to evade her covenant to settle after-acquired property. Now it seems to me that if Steward v. Poppleton is sound, then Townshend v. Harrowby is wrong, for I cannot see how the intervention of a life estate makes any difference, if by exercising her power she defeats the destination of the ultimate gift. I do not go so far as to say that Kindersley, V.C.'s, elaborate and skilful judgment was wrong, but, nevertheless, he breaks the gift up there into three separate parts and bases his decision on that, and doesn't proceed on the simple lines of Steward v. Poppleton. I think, therefore, that Steward v. Poppleton is a distinct decision which I ought to follow. Townshend v. Harrowby is not precisely in point, and is therefore distinguishable. I think, therefore, following Steward v. Poppleton, that I must declare that this property is all bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property.

Solicitors, G. Slade; Bell, Brodrick, & Gray.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Nov. 21, 25.

In re SMITH.
EASTWICK v. SMITH. (a.)

Will—Construction—Trustee—Power—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 10 (3), 22, 37.

A power given to trustees, which enables them to deal with trust property, is primâ facie given them ex officio as an incident of their office, and passes with the office to the holders or holder thereof for the time being. The mere fact that the power is one requiring the exercise of a very wide personal discretion is not enough to exclude the primâ facie presumption. The testator's reliance on the individuals to the exclusion of the holders of the office for the time being must be expressed in clear and apt language.

Originating summons.

This was an originating summons by two of the present trustees of the will of Job Smith.

The testator, by his will, dated the 15th of December, 1894, appointed his wife, Mary A. Smith, his brother Charles, and his friend Robert Bell executors and trustees.

He devised and bequeathed "unto my said trustees all the real and personal estate of whatever kind or nature to which I shall be entitled or possessed of at the time of my decease upon trust . . . to permit and allow my said wife to receive and enjoy the rents and income arising therefrom, she keeping my dwelling-houses in repair, and with my furniture and effects insured against loss or damage by fire; and with full power for my said trustees to sell the whole or any part of my said real and personal estate as they in their absolute discretion may think fit and apply the proceeds arising therefrom for the sole and absolute use and benefit of my said wife for and during the term of her natural life."

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died in January, 1895.

The executors Charles Smith and Robert Bell were both dead, and the widow, M. A. Smith, had appointed new trustees.

The question to be determined was whether the defendant M. A. Smith, as the survivor of the three trustees named in the will, or the plaintiffs (the two new trustees) and M. A. Smith together could now sell the real and personal estate, and whether on any such sale the defendant M. A. Smith and the plaintiffs together could apply the proceeds of sale for the benefit of M. A. Smith during her life.

The Trustee Act, 1893, provides: Section 10.—(3) Every new trustee so appointed, as well before as after all the trust property becomes by law, or by assurance, or otherwise, vested in him, shall have the same powers, authorities, and discretions, and may in all respects act, as if he had been originally appointed a trustee by the instrument, if any, creating the trust.

Section 22.—(1) Where a power or trust is given to or vested in two or more trustees jointly, then, unless the contrary is expressed in the instrument, if any, creating the power or trust, the same may be exercised or performed by the survivor or survivors of them for the time being.

Section 37.—Every trustee appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction shall, as well before as after the trust property becomes by law, or by assurance, or otherwise, vested in him, have the same powers, authorities, and discretions, and may in all respects act as if he had been originally appointed a trustee by the instrument, if any, creating the trust.

J. G. Woods, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., for the defendant Mrs. Smith, referred to Byam v. Byam, 3 W. R. 95, 19 Beav. 58; Crawford v. Forshaw, 39 W. R. 484, [1891] 2 Ch. 261; Brassey v. Chalmers, 4 D. M. & G. 528; Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27; Gude v. Worthington, 3 De G. & Sm. 389; Hargrave's note, 113 A., note 2, Co. Lit.; and the Trustee Act, s. 22.

Jenkins, K.C., and Humphrey, for the defendant Mrs. Halls.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is a question of construction to be determined on the words of this will, but I must of course be guided by general principles of law and the reasoning in other decided cases on similar lines. The testator begins by appointing his wife Mary, his brother Charles, and his friend Robert Bell executors and trustees, and devises and bequeaths all his real and personal estate to "my said trustees" on trust to pay the income to the widow for life. [His lordship referred to the will.] The brother Charles and the friend Robert Bell are both dead, and the widow has appointed new trustees, and the question now arises whether the present trustees can exercise the power above quoted of applying capital for the benefit of the widow, and this depends on the question whether the power is given to the individuals or annexed to the office.

Now the provision is undoubtedly one requiring the exercise of great discretion, involving as it does the transference of capital from the beneficiaries named by the testator to the widow, and it is no doubt worthy of observation that the donees of the powers include the widow, who will profit, and one of the beneficiaries, who will suffer, by its exercise, and that all are described by the relation in which they stood to the testator—my wife, brother, and friend. On the other hand, the devise is to "my said trustees," and it is clear that this would take effect, although one or two of the trustees predeceased the testator, and the power follows immediately after the devise, and is expressed in the same terms. Unless, then, I am justified in inferring from the nature of the power that "my said trustees" in the power means something different from "my said trustees" in the devise, I must hold that the power is annexed to the office and estate of the trustees, and can be exercised by the survivors or survivor or other the trustees or trustee for the time being: and after considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that that is the true view, and that there is not enough to justify me in holding that the power is given to the three individuals; and that, if I were to take the latter view, I should really be guessing at what I might suppose that the testator may have intended, rather than construing the words that he has actually used.

My hesitation has been mainly caused by a statement in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27. He says (p. 44), "I conceive that whenever a power is of a kind that indicates a personal confidence, it must primâ facie be intended to be confined to the individuals to whom it is given, and will not except by express words pass to others, to whom by legal transmission the same character may happen to belong." The decision in that case turned on the words of the will, which was long and not very lucid. But the Master of the Rolls states a general principle, which would be applicable to the present case, if it had been adopted by later cases. The principle, however, is open to the criticism that it is expressed in loose and general terms. All, or nearly all, powers necessitate the personal confidence of the testator in the donees thereof, and it is very difficult to draw a line—e.g., powers of leasing, selling, and investing, powers of maintenance and advancement of children, all require the exercise of discretion, but the principle could hardly be applied to them. I find it impossible to formulate any rule by which the court can say that certain powers are and others are not of such a nature that they must necessarily be given only to individuals known to the testator. There is no standard of measurement, but the more or the less become a mere matter of conjecture affording no basis for judicial determination.

Further, the Court of Appeal in Crawford v. Forshaw, [1891] 2 Ch. 261 (where Cole v. Wade was cited), declined by necessary implication, although not in express terms, to adopt the principle. There the testator who conferred the power in that case obviously showed great personal confidence in his executors therein named, for he allowed them to select the charities which were to be the objects of his bounty; but the Court of Appeal nevertheless held the power was annexed to the office; and the passage in Bowen, L.J.'s, judgment at p. 368 is inconsistent with the dictum of the Master of the Rolls in Cole v. Wade: "Even if you find in a will a power given to executors in their official capacity there may be such an indication of reliance on the just judgment of the individuals as would make it impossible if one or more renounced for the others to act, but I think such reliance must be expressed in clear and apt language." In other words, the personal confidence in the individuals must be expressed and cannot be inferred from the mere nature of the power.

To the same effect is the case of Byam v. Byam, 19 Beav. 58, where the power involved the exercise of a very delicate discretion permitting the withdrawal of the trust funds settled by marriage articles and the payment thereof to the wife herself; and this was held to be annexed to the office. It is true that the court there was dealing with an executory document and (as pointed out by Wood, V.C., in Peover v. Hassel, 1 J. & H. 341) there is a great distinction in the mode of construing executory and executed instruments, but Lord Romilly, although he refers to the fact, does not rest his judgment upon it, and in that case the words "trustees . . ." and in Crawford v. Forshaw the words "my executors herein named" lent much more value to the argument in favour of a personal confidence than the words in this will. The result of the authorities and of sections 22, 10 (3), and 37 of the Trustees Act is, in my opinion, this: Every power given to trustees which enables them to deal with or affect the trust property is primâ facie given them ex officio as an incident of their office and passes with the office to the holders or holder thereof for the time being; whether a power is so given ex officio or not depends in each case on the construction of the document giving it; but the mere fact that the power is one requiring the exercise of a very wide personal discretion is not enough to exclude the primâ facie presumption, and little regard is now paid to such minute differences as those between "my trustees," "my trustees A. and B.," and "A. and B., my trustees." The testator's reliance on the individuals to the exclusion of the holders of the office for the time being must be expressed in clear and apt language. I therefore hold that the power in this will can now be exercised by the present trustees.

Solicitors, Helder Roberts; Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson, for Danby, Palmer, & Danby, Great Yarmouth.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Nov. 4, 5, 18.

In re THE CHURCH PATRONAGE TRUST.
LAURIE v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Advowson—Charity—Will—Trust to present fit and pious person.

The devise of an advowson on trust to present "such fit and pious person of godly life and conversation, being in holy orders, capable of accepting and holding the same, as the trustees" shall think fit, does not constitute a charitable trust, the trust being only to do that which every owner of an advowson is in all events bound to do.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application under section 8 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), made by the trustees of the Church Patronage Trust, that the court might sanction their retaining the advowson of the vicarage of the church of Battesford, otherwise Battisford, in the county of Suffolk, coming to them under the codicil to the will of Louisa Woodcock, and a subsequent deed of appointment; the application was made on the assumption that the advowson had been thereby assured "to or for the benefit of a charitable use" within the meaning of section 5 of that Act.

By the codicil, dated the 18th of April, 1902, to her will, the testatrix devised the advowson to such uses as her three sisters or the survivor of them should "within twenty-one years from the date of the testatrix's decease appoint, for the purpose of carrying out the express wish of my late husband that the said advowson should be made over to and vested in the Church Patronage Trust Society by all lawful means, but if the said society decline to accept the said patronage, the said advowson and perpetual presentation shall belong to my said three sisters as joint tenants in fee simple."

The testatrix died on the 14th of May, 1902, and by the deed of appointment which was dated the 14th of February, 1903, the advowson was appointed and confirmed unto and to the use of the trustees of the Church Patronage Trust, their heirs and assigns. And it was thereby agreed that the trustees and the persons deriving title under them should stand possessed of the advowson upon the trusts and subject to the powers, so far as applicable, comprised in and forming the ninth schedule to an indenture of the 21st of December, 1871.

The last-named indenture was the trust deed of the Church Patronage Trust.

The trusts contained in the 9th schedule were, so far as they are material, as follows: 1. "Upon trust that from time to time, as often as the said vicarage and parish church of —— shall become vacant by the death, resignation, deprivation, or cession of the incumbent or otherwise, the trustees for the time being of these presents do and shall nominate, appoint, and present to the same vicarage and parish church such fit and pious person of godly life and conversation, being in holy orders, capable of accepting and holding the same, as the trustees for the time being of these presents, or the major part in number of them shall determine upon. . . ."

4. "That only such persons shall be eligible to the office of trustees as shall be, or shall be well known or reputed to be, of godly life and conversation and shall profess themselves members of the Established Church of England, and shall be known to be zealously attached to the great principles of the Reformed faith contained in the Liturgy and Articles of the said Established Church."

The summons was taken out within a year from the death of the testatrix. When it was first heard the year had expired.

It was apprehended that, assuming the devise and appointment to have been charitable, the advowson had then, by the operation of section 6 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands.

At his lordship's suggestion the hearing was adjourned to enable the official trustee to be made a party.

Montague Barlow, for the trustees of the Church Patronage Trust.—There was a good charitable trust. The trust of an advowson is charitable not only when it is for a particular parish, but also when it is for the purpose of appointing fit and proper persons: In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street, 36 W. R. 837, 39 Ch. D. 492; Attorney-General v. Bishop of Lichfield, 5 Ves. 825. In the 9th schedule there is a trust for securing a fit and proper person as the incumbent of such parish of which the advowson is held. If a private patron presents an improper person, the only protection for the parishioners is the possible refusal of the bishop to institute. In the case of patronage held on trusts such as these there is a double remedy; for proceedings may also be taken against the trustees in respect of any improper appointment.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.—In general it is the duty of the Attorney-General to contend that there is a charity. But he is bound to submit the effect of the authorities to the court. An advowson may be the subject of a charitable trust, (1) if the trust be in respect of the advowson of a particular parish (In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street); and (2) if the trust be to present persons of a definite persuasion: In re Hunter, 45 W. R. 610, [1897] 2 Ch. 105, where the decision of Romer, J., 45 W. R. 344, [1897] 1 Ch. 518, to the contrary effect, was reversed. This point was not affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Hunter v. Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 673, [1899] A. C. 309, by which the judgment of Romer, J., was restored. The present case, however, which is merely that of a trust to present fit and proper persons, comes within neither of these categories. A trust merely to do that which the trustee is by law already bound to do cannot be charitable.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Official Trustee of Charity Lands, submitted to the directions of the court.

Montague Barlow replied.

BUCKLEY, J., after referring to the codicil and the indenture of the 14th of February, 1903, read paragraph 1 of the 9th schedule to the trust deed, and continued: I am unable to find here any direction to do anything further or other than the owner of an advowson is bound to do. He ought to present a fit and pious person of godly life, being in holy orders, capable of accepting and holding. There is no trust expressed other than such as is involved in the duty of an owner of an advowson. If I turn on to paragraph 4 of this 9th schedule, which is also included, having regard to the contents of the deed, I find there a definition or indication of the class of persons who are to be trustees. [His lordship read paragraph 4, and continued:] Assuming, as I do not think to be the case, that I could evolve from the description of the character of the trustees that they were bound to appoint a person of the particular religious persuasion which is pointed to by that clause, I do not find that any class of thought in the Established Church of England is there defined or pointed to. The trustees are simply to be persons of godly life, members of the Established Church of England, and attached to the principles of the reformed faith contained in the liturgy and articles of the Established Church. In other words, the trustees by this definition must be people of such religious convictions as the person to be appointed to the advowson is to be. He must be a member of the Church of England, and the trustees must be members of the Church of England. There is no occasion that the trustees should be of any particular class of thought in the Church of England. Therefore, I cannot get out of that clause, even if I could under any circumstances do so, any indication that the persons to be appointed to the advowson must be of any particular type of religious conviction included within the pale of the Church of England. Under these circumstances, is there any charitable trust? I think not. There may be a charitable trust of an advowson; there is no question about that after the decision of the House of Lords in Hunter v. Attorney-General. Thus, for instance, an advowson may be held upon a charitable trust if it be held for the inhabitants of a particular parish, as was decided by Kay, J., in In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street. Again, the advowson will be the subject of a charitable trust, if it is held upon trust to present from time a person who holds a particular type of religious thought in the Church of England. I say that for this reason, that Romer, J., in In re Hunter was of opinion that that was not so, but in the Court of Appeal I think they took a different view, and thought that if there had been a trust to present a person of a particular type of thought that might have been a good charitable trust. And Lord Davey, in the House of Lords, without deciding the point, assumed that that would be so. He says (at p. 321): "I assume, for the purposes of this case, that if applicable to the first purpose there would be a good charitable trust. The first is that only such churches or chapels shall be subscribed or contributed to wherein the service shall, in the opinion of the special trustees, be conducted in the particular manner prescribed." If, therefore, I could find here that the trustees were always to present a person of a particular type of religious thought, the case would be different; but I am unable to find any such trust. The trusts indicated are only that the persons who are the owners of the advowson shall do that which every owner of an advowson ought to do—namely, present a fit and proper person ordained in holy orders in the Church of England competent to hold preferment in that church. That is no indication of any charitable trust, and I hold that there is no charitable trust. I arrive at this conclusion with more confidence because, at my instance, the Official Trustee of Charity Lands has been brought here, and appears by Mr. Vaughan Hawkins. It would be his duty to argue that this was a charitable trust if he could do so; but, although he is willing to assist the court to the utmost of his ability, he is unable to refer me to any case in which such a gift as this has been held to constitute a charitable trust. I think, therefore, that the summons fails. The case does not come within the Act.

Solicitors, Bridges, Sawtell, & Co.; Solicitor to the Treasury.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Channell, J.) — May 28, 1903.

EMARY (Appellant) v. NOLLOTH (Respondent). (a.)

Criminal law—Sale of intoxicating liquor to child under fourteen—Delivery in vessel not corked and sealed—Sale by servant without master's knowledge and in disobedience to his orders—"Knowingly allows any person to sell"—Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), s. 2.

Section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, provides that "every holder of a licence who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of intoxicating liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such intoxicating liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only," shall be liable to certain penalties.

B., acting within the general scope of his employment as a barman to a person licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, in breach of his master's express orders and without his knowledge, knowingly sold to a child under fourteen years of age a pint of porter in a bottle neither corked nor sealed. The licence-holder had not delegated the charge or control of his licensed premises to B.

Held, that the licence-holder could not be convicted under the above section of "knowingly allowing" the sale.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by G. Paul Taylor, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Southwark police-court.

On the 17th of July, 1902, an information was laid by John Nolloth, the respondent, against Alfred Emary, the appellant, under section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, charging that he, being a person licensed for the retail sale of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the Licensing Acts, 1872 and 1874, did unlawfully and knowingly allow a certain person, to wit, James Barnes, to sell intoxicating liquor for consumption off the premises to Alice Bastard, a person under the age of fourteen years, in a vessel which was not corked and sealed and which contained not less than one reputed pint.

Upon the hearing the following facts were proved:

At half-past one o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, the 13th of July, 1902, Alice Bastard, a child aged nine years, entered the appellant's premises and placed upon the counter in the bar an empty bottle and one penny and a half-penny to pay for a pint of porter. The bar was crowded with customers at the time. The appellant, who was then himself in charge of the premises, was present in another part of the bar, but did not see the said child and had no knowledge of any intoxicating liquor being sold to her.

James Barnes, a barman employed by the appellant, filled the bottle with porter and returned it to the counter, from whence it was taken away by Alice Bastard. The bottle was neither corked nor sealed.

The bottle in which the porter was supplied had the appearance of having been sealed on a previous occasion, and it was proved that on all previous occasions upon which the child had been served with intoxicating liquor at the said tavern she had been so served in bottles corked and sealed.

The appellant kept posted up in a conspicuous place in the bar a notice in the following terms:

"Notice to employees.—Every servant employed at this establishment is expressly forbidden to supply any intoxicating liquors either for consumption on or off the premises to any child who is in his or her opinion under fourteen years of age except in sealed and corked bottles containing not less than one pint."

Prior to the sale complained of the appellant had given express instructions to James Barnes similar to the directions contained in the above notice and had required him to observe and obey the same.

The learned magistrate found that James Barnes in serving Alice Bastard was acting within the general scope of his employment as the appellant's barman, and he further found as a fact that James Barnes, in breach of the appellant's express orders and without his knowledge, had knowingly sold the said pint of porter for consumption off the premises to a person under the age of fourteen years in a vessel neither corked nor sealed, and which contained not less than a reputed pint; and he was also satisfied that the appellant had not connived at the sale.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that he had adopted all reasonable means to prevent sales taking place upon his premises in contravention of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, and that the sale complained of had been effected while the appellant himself was in charge of the house without his knowledge and in disobedience to his express orders and directions by an employee to whom the appellant had not delegated the charge of superintendence of the licensed premises, and that accordingly he could not be convicted of the offence with which he was charged.

The learned magistrate was of opinion that this contention was not well founded in law, and that the appellant was liable under the statute under which he was charged for any act done in contravention thereof upon his licensed premises by his servant, provided such act was within the general scope of his employment, and that the circumstance that such servant acted without the appellant's knowledge and in disobedience to his orders afforded no ground of defence.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the learned magistrate was right in law in so holding.

The Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), provides as follows: Section 2. "Every holder of a licence who knowingly sells or delivers or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of intoxicating liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such intoxicating liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantity not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for the first offence, and not exceeding five pounds for any subsequent offence; and every person who knowingly sends any person under the age of fourteen years to any place where any intoxicating liquors are sold or delivered, or distributed, for the purpose of obtaining any description of intoxicating liquor, excepting as aforesaid, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, shall be liable to like penalties."

Danckwerts, K.C. (Bruce Williamson with him), for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. Before the appellant can be rightly convicted of "unlawfully and knowingly allowing" the barman to sell in contravention of the section it must be found as a fact that he "knowingly" allowed the barman so to sell. The learned magistrate, however, has found as a fact that the sale was effected without the appellant's knowledge. Knowledge on the part of the licence-holder is a necessary ingredient of the offence. Brooks v. Mason, 51 W. R. 224, [1902] 2 K. B. 743, is not in conflict with this proposition. In that case the charge was for actually delivering the bottle not corked and sealed as required by the Act, although believed to be so, not merely of permitting the delivery. The word "knowingly" applies to the offence itself. The cases decided under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872, are in point. That section enacts that if any licensed person permits drunkenness or sells liquor to a drunken person he shall be liable to a penalty. In Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207, it was held that the prohibition was absolute, and that knowledge of the condition of the person served with liquor was not necessary to constitute the offence. The case of The Commissioners of Police v. Cartman, 44 W. R. 637, [1896] 1 Q. B. 655, is to the same effect. There the charge was for selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person. The licence-holder gave orders to his servants that no drunken persons were to be served. During his absence one of his servants sold intoxicating liquor to a drunken person, and it was held that the licence-holder was guilty, the act of the servant being within the scope of his employment. In Somerset v. Wade, 42 W. R. 399, [1894] 1 Q. B. 574, which followed Somerset v. Hart, 32 W. R. 594, 12 Q. B. D. 360, it was held that a licensed person cannot be convicted under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1892, of permitting drunkenness to take place on his premises, where the evidence shows that a person who was on the premises was in fact drunk, but the licensed person did not know that such person was drunk. Knowledge, therefore, is not necessary under that section as to the "selling," but it is necessary as to the permitting. Where a licensed person, who has not delegated his authority to a servant, is charged with permitting or allowing an offence, knowledge on his part is essential to a conviction. A person cannot permit that which he has no knowledge of. In Worth v. Brown, 40 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 515, it was held that the servant was not merely the licensee's agent for certain purposes only, but was his agent in the further sense of being his alter ego. The knowledge of the servant, however, is only the knowledge of the master where the servant has had delegated to him the master's authority.

Macmorran, K.C. (Arthur Gill with him), for the respondent.—The conviction was right. The case finds that the barman had knowingly sold the liquor. That knowledge on the part of the barman is sufficient to support the conviction of the appellant. No doubt the appellant was in charge of his premises, but the facts of the case show that he had delegated the charge of that portion of them where the sale took place to his servant The servant was acting within the scope of his employment. In Bond v. Evans, 36 W. R. 767, 21 Q. B. D. 249, where gaming had taken place upon licensed premises to the knowledge of a servant of the licensed person, who was in charge of the premises but without any knowledge or connivance on the part of the licensed person, it was held that the licensed person had suffered gaming to be carried on on the premises within the meaning of section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872. In Bosley v. Davies, 24 W. R. 140, 1 Q. B. D. 84, it was held that constructive knowledge was sufficient to support a conviction for suffering gaming. In that case Cockburn, C.J., said, at p. 87, "a man may be said to 'suffer' a thing to be done if it is done through his negligence."

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. No doubt the scope and object of this Act was to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor to small children unless with certain precautions.

Now if this is a criminal statute for this purpose, it probably was and is a casus omissus, that the Legislature have not included within its scope the case of the sale by any person on licensed premises, but have only provided for the case of a sale by the holder of a licence. In all probability, if the Act is to have the effect that is desired, some amendment in order to include a sale on licensed premises by a person other than the holder of the licence should be made in it. We have to consider whether, under the circumstances of this case, the holder of the licence, who did not know of, and did not connive at the sale, and has not delegated his authority, can be convicted. Now, this case has proceeded on the basis that the offence imports knowledge. The words of section 2 are practically these: "Knowingly sells or delivers, or either unlawfully or knowingly allows any person to sell or deliver"—that word "allows" importing knowledge. The whole point is whether or not for this particular offence the knowledge of the person who in fact sells, and who is the agent of the licence-holder, is sufficient in order to convict the licence-holder. It is unnecessary to go through all the cases that have been cited, and I do not think I should serve a useful purpose by attempting to do so; but there seems to be derived from them three principles. If the Act is prohibitive in itself the knowledge is immaterial, as, for instance, in the case Brooks v Mason, where the bottle of beer was not in fact sufficiently corked and sealed, but was believed to be so. In that case it was attempted to be argued that that knowledge was material to the offence, but it was held that it was not; and in the other instance of the same kind, where there was a prohibition against selling, we held that knowledge was immaterial. Then there is the class of case in which the licence-holder is charged with knowingly allowing, permitting, or suffering an offence to have been committed. There knowledge has been held to be essential, but it has been held, and I should say rightly held, and this is the second principle to be derived from the cases—that where a licence-holder delegates his own authority, and puts somebody else in charge, and, if I may adopt what my brother Channell said, "has delegated his own power to prevent," and the person put in charge commits the offence, the licence-holder is responsible for permitting or suffering it. That seems to me to be a reasonable and logical conclusion so as to prevent the Acts of Parliament being defeated. Now, the third matter we have to consider is what is to be the result where, under such circumstances as appear in this case, there has been no delegation of authority, and the licence-holder is himself at the time controlling the business, and has given direct instructions to the people employed there and to himself—to use the expression—by a public notice that he himself is not going to allow any infraction of the Act. Of course, if there has been a delegation of authority, then the private prohibition, as has been pointed out in the two cases of The Commissioners of Police v. Cartman and Bond v. Evans may become immaterial. I think, having regard to the particular facts of the case before us, of the licence-holder in charge keeping control and not delegating his authority, the fact of one of his servants disobeying his orders does not make any offence in the licence-holder. In order to cure that particular blot, the Act, if desirable, could be amended by making a person who knowingly sells on licensed premises contrary to this section, though he is not the licence-holder, subject to the provisions of the Act. I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the conviction quashed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Appeal allowed, with costs; conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Maitlands, Peckham, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Wontner & Sons.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) — May 20, 1903.

REX v. WESTMINSTER HIGH BAILIFF. (a.)

Land Clauses Act—Acquisition of land—Compensation—Offer of a certain sum by undertakers—Acceptance after part hearing before jury—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), ss. 38, 51—London County Council (Improvements) Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. cclxvi.), s. 20.

The offer which the promoters are required, by section 38 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to make in a notice of their intention to summon a jury to decide the purchase-money of land taken by them, need not be accepted within the ten days mentioned in the section. It is therefore open for any landowner, after he has carried in his claim before a jury, to accept the offer at any period of the trial before verdict.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

On the 4th of March, 1902, the London County Council under powers conferred on them by the London County Council (Improvements) Act, 1899, served notice on the claimants to treat in respect of certain premises required for the new street from Holborn to the Strand, and in that notice claimed under section 28 that the premises were in an insanitary condition.

On the 27th of March, 1902, the claimants delivered to the council a notice of claim.

On the 5th of November, 1902, the council delivered to the claimants a sealed offer of £1,600 for the premises under section 38 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (which Act was incorporated by the Act of 1899), and on the 18th of November, 1902, the offer was refused by letter.

On the 22nd of November the London County Council issued a warrant to the High Bailiff of Westminster to summon a jury to settle the question whether the premises were insanitary and the amount of compensation.

At the hearing the jury first of all found that the premises were insanitary, and the claimants thereupon stated they were prepared to accept the amount of the sealed offer. This was objected to on behalf of the council on the ground that the case was in the hands of the jury, and, therefore, their verdict must decide the amount of compensation.

The deputy high bailiff held that the claimants were entitled to accept the offer, and withdrew the case from the jury and discharged them. No judgment was recorded.

A rule was then obtained on the motion of the London County Council calling upon the high bailiff of Westminster to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue to him commanding him to summon a jury to determine the amount of the compensation.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the claimants, showed cause against the rule.—The question is, after what stage of the proceedings is it not open to the claimants to accept a sealed offer, made under section 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. There has been a regular practice to treat such an offer as a standing offer down to the time of the verdict of the jury: Reg. v. Manley Smith, In re Church and London School Board, 40 W. R. 333. There is no provision requiring its acceptance within a definite time; nor can it be withdrawn. The deputy bailiff ought to have directed the jury to find an amount, but his not doing so at the utmost can but be regarded as an irregularity, and therefore a mandamus ought not to go: Reg. v. Smith, In re Westfield and Metropolitan Railway Co., 12 Q. B. D. 481.

Dickens, K.C., and Corrie Grant, in support of the rule.—The claimants can only accept the offer within the ten days prescribed by section 38 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The whole procedure depends upon this statute and section 51 clearly contemplates the acceptance within that period. The object of the notice is to give the claimants an opportunity of considering whether they will accept the offer or embark in litigation. The ten days gives the claimant reasonable time: see per Cockburn, C.J., in Hayward v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 4 B. & S. 787. The section gives no intimation that the sealed offer is to remain open after the case has gone to the jury. If the offer can be accepted up to verdict, the promoters in many cases will be put to the cost of getting up their case before the jury, all of which must necessarily be thrown away, and thus the parties put to needless expense.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a point of considerable interest, and my wish is to dismiss from my mind, as far as possible, my recollections of past experience; in the first place, because they are never altogether trustworthy, and in the second, because the incidents they recall may have been exceptional. All I have to say, therefore, is that if the view propounded by counsel for the London County Council be the right one, a very large number of cases have in practice been decided upon an entirely different view; and if the sealed offer does not bind the purchasing authority, but can be withdrawn so as to allow of their taking a verdict of a jury which may be less in amount than the sum contained in the sealed offer, it would give rise to such a remarkable state of things that it is singular that the question should not have formed the subject of, or been referred to in, the decisions already given. By section 38 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, it is, in order to avoid summoning a jury, provided that the promoters of the undertaking are, before summoning a jury, to give not less than ten days' notice to the other party, and that they shall in such notice state what sum of money they are willing to give for the land. But that is an offer which is not open for ten days only. Mr. Dickens has pressed upon us the argument that the offer must be accepted within ten days because if it were not accepted within that time the promoters would incur costs in getting up their case which would be thrown away if the claimant were to change his mind when before the jury and accept the sum named in the sealed offer. But the necessities of this argument force him to overlook the position of the claimant, the vendor of the property, who was never intended to be placed in a worse position with regard to expenses and costs than the promoters. The vendor claiming compensation is in precisely the same difficulty; he knows quite well that if he goes to trial and incurs the expense of it, and fails to obtain from the jury a verdict which exceeds the sealed offer, but on the contrary gets a verdict for a less amount, he will not only have to bear his own costs, but will have to pay over to the promoters some portion of what may be called the joint costs of the trial. Section 51 is clear as to this. It provides that "on every such inquiry before a jury, where the verdict of a jury shall be given for a greater sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking, all the costs of such inquiry shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, but if the verdict of the jury be given for the same, or a less sum than the sum previously offered by the promoters of the undertaking . . . one half of the costs of summoning, impannelling, and returning the jury and of taking the inquiry and recording the verdict and judgment thereon, in case such verdict shall be taken, shall be defrayed by the owner of the lands, and the other half by the promoters of the undertaking, and each party shall bear his own costs, other than as aforesaid, incident to such inquiry." So it is not only a question of promoters' costs; but the claimant must also be considered, for by going up to trial he takes up or renders himself liable to a burden which the argument of Mr. Dickens has overlooked. I agree with what Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., said in Reg. v. Smith, 12 Q. B. D. 481, at p. 487: "The promoters are taking a person's property adversely to his benefit, and it does not seem an unreasonable thing that before they are allowed to take from him that which he does not desire to part with they should make him an offer by which they are bound to abide, and upon which he can take the advice of his surveyor and come to a conclusion whether or not he will accept it or embark upon costly litigation with the promoters." I am therefore of opinion that under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the sealed offer was intended to exist as an offer down to the time when the verdict of the jury is given. There is, therefore, in the present case, under the statute an offer binding on the promoters up to the time the jury gave their verdict, and the claimant is entitled to say that he will accept that offer subject to this: That he cannot be in a better position as to costs than if the jury had given a verdict for a sum amounting exactly to the sum named in the sealed offer.

The only remaining question is whether section 20 of the London County Councils (Improvements) Act, 1899, makes any difference. I agree that it is difficult to see how the question is to be worked out. Apparently there is to be a sort of first issue to be decided as to whether the property falls within a particular class. Section 20 sets up two standards of compensation. In this case the promoters had, by the terms of their notice to treat, alleged the existence of a state of things that would entitle the claimants to receive compensation upon the lower scale only. But it is impossible to suggest that the promoters have a greater right to withdraw an offer under section 20 of the Act of 1899 than under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, which is incorporated in the later Act. Mr. Dickens said that practically it would be a hardship if this view were adopted, because in the offers there was a considerable margin allowed. It seems to me that the argument applies just as strongly to the Land Clauses Acts as to the Act of 1899. For the purposes of section 51 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, there would have to be a margin allowed, whether the property was taken under one Act or the other. The claimants are therefore entitled to accept the sealed offer notwithstanding the circumstances of the summoning of the jury and the partial hearing of the case. The only thing they render themselves liable for by adopting this course is the payment of their own costs and half the costs of summoning the jury, and so on.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the claimants, Lewis & Lewis.

Solicitor for the county council, Blaxland.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). July 7, 1903.

IGOE v. SHANN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing law—Renewal of licence—Value of house—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 45.

Section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which requires premises to be of a certain annual value as a qualification for being licensed for consumption of intoxicating liquor thereon, does not apply to a house which was licensed at the time of the passing of the Act, and also at the time when the renewal was applied for, even in the case of there having been a break in the continuity of the licence.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 38, [1902] 2 K. B. 740) reversed.

Freer v. Murray, [1894] A. C. 576, distinguished.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J., Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting) (reported 51 W. R. 38, [1902] 2 K. B. 467), reversing a judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, J.) (49 W. R. 559, [1901] 2 K. B. 740). The appellant was the tenant and occupier of the Council Inn, and was licensed in respect thereof for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises. On due notice of objection the respondents, who were the licensing justices for the city and county of Manchester, in September, 1900, refused to renew the appellant's licence on the ground that the premises were not of the necessary annual value. The Council Inn was originally licensed in 1868, and, with the exception of a break of two days, was continuously licensed until September, 1900, and it was found in the case stated that the annual value of the house exceeded £15, but was less than £30 The Court of Appeal held that as there had been a break in the continuity of the licence by the renewal having been refused since the Licensing Act, 1872, the requirement as to annual value (for Manchester £30 per annum) imposed by section 45 applied, and therefore upheld the refusal.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., Avory, K.C., and Randolph, for the appellant.

C. H. Russell, K.C., and T. F. Byrne, for respondents.

Freer v. Murray, [1894] A. C. 576, was referred to.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think it unnecessary to discuss Freer v. Murray, which was decided in this House, because it appears to me that the question which we have to determine is one entirely apart and distinct from the question which then arose. I am myself disposed to follow almost literally the decision of Cozens-Hardy, L.J. The question here, and the only question, has relation to the capacity of the house to receive a licence. The capacity of a house to receive a licence is settled by the Act of 1840. The question which arises here is whether that capacity to receive a licence has been altered by the Act of 1872. I have to look at both statutes, and unless I am able to fix an incapacity by statute upon this house it is obvious that the capacity to receive a licence remains where it was. I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., that there are no words which render this house incapable of receiving a licence except words from which this House is in terms excluded. The result, therefore, must be that the capacity to receive a licence remains. Apart from the questions—somewhat puzzling and difficult questions that arise under the other heads which have been brought by way of analogy before your lordships, it appears to me that upon the most ordinary principles of construction we are bound to construe these words as we find them; and, as the learned counsel very justly said, there is no justification here, where the language is clear and unambiguous, for introducing any other words into the statute than those which we find there. As a matter of general principles of construction I very much deprecate going outside the language of the statute to find some meaning for the words other than that which the words themselves in their ordinary and natural construction suggest. At the time of the passing of the Act, for some reasons (whether good or bad reasons is immaterial) the Legislature thought it right to draw a distinction between two different sets of houses, not as regards the jurisdiction of the magistrates in judging in respect of the goodness or badness of the tenant, or his fitness or unfitness, or of there being a want in the neighbourhood of licensed houses, but a distinction in respect of the material construction of the houses themselves. The Legislature determined that there should be two classes of houses, one of which should be capable of receiving a licence if the magistrates thought fit, and the other not. The simple question before us in this appeal is, Within which of those classes does this house come? It appears to me to be almost impossible to argue that, without introducing a considerable number of qualifying words into the language of the statute, you can say that this house is disqualified from receiving a licence if the magistrates so think fit. Under these circumstances, and for the reasons which I have given, I agree with Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, J., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J., and disagree with the learned judges who have taken the opposite view. The only objection which I entertain to the language of the Lord Chief Justice in giving his judgment is this: The Lord Chief Justice seems, in some way or other, to try to get over the interval of two days by saying that it was a substantial continuance. Now, if it was necessary to have a continuity of the licence there was no such continuity; it cannot be denied that there was a complete break. But the view which I entertain of this case is that, notwithstanding the complete break, the language of section 45 of the Act of 1872 is too clear to admit of doubt that this house was qualified within the meaning of that section. I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and the judgment of the King's Bench Division restored.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. The construction adopted by Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J., may produce a more reasonable result, and one more in harmony with the course of legislation on this subject, but the language of the Act seems to me too clear to admit of that construction. The second clause of section 45 of the Act of 1872 appears to divide houses in regard to which an application for a licence may be made into two classes. First, those in regard to which a licence was current at the time of the passing of the Act of 1872; and, secondly, those in regard to which no such licence was then current. As regards the second class, the standard of value was to be raised, while the houses in the former class were left as they were, and to have the benefit of the old standard. I do not think that the decision of this House in Freer v. Murray compels your lordships to depart from the literal meaning of the words in the second clause of section 45, or to introduce words which are not there.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I only desire to say that I construe the statutes as your lordships have done, and I therefore come to the same result.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree. The section seems to me to be perfectly plain in its terms, and to fix the date without reference to the continuance of the licence down to a certain time. It may be expedient or not to fix a date which may now have come to be pretty remote for the determining of the conditions under which a house shall be disqualified; but the conclusion is not a very formidable one, for the discretion of the magistrates remains, and all that is done is to leave this class of houses qualified to receive the consideration of the magistrates as under the Act of 1840. The argument of the respondents really rested upon two grounds: First, it was argued that, a licence being personal, it was necessary to consider the continuance of a licence in order to give effect to the statute, but the Act, in several of its sections other than that which we are now considering, expressly speaks of houses as being qualified as well as of individuals being qualified, and of houses being disqualified as well as of individuals being disqualified. The other, and the main, ground upon which the respondents' argument was rested was the judgment of this House under another section of a different Act. I understand the theory upon which that decision was pronounced, and I have only to say that the phraseology, upon which everything turns, which was used in that case does not occur in the present instance, and accordingly your lordships are entirely free to give effect to the plain terms of the Act now before you.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. When the Act of 1872 is looked at, and when the language of that Act and the language of the Act of 1869 are compared, it appears to me that the Freer v. Murray cannot be safely said to be case of applicable at all. The language of section 45 of the Act of 1872 runs thus—it is awkwardly expressed: "Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorising such sale unless" certain "conditions are satisfied." Now, unless it can be said that this house was at the time of the passing of the Act an unlicensed house, that provision cannot possibly apply. I agree with counsel for the respondents that, in construing section 45, you must also look at the definition of a "house." But what we have got here is a house which was licensed in 1872 and was licensed at the time when the renewal was applied for. Construing section 45 and the definition clause together, it appears to me impossible to say that this house is one of those in which the condition as to extra value has to be complied with. Then we come back to this question: Does that break which unquestionably occurred in 1886 render this house an unlicensed house ever since? I cannot so regard it. There may have been some irregularity, there may have been some oversight, there may have been even a technical want of jurisdiction; but a house which was licensed in 1868, and, with the exception of two days in 1886, has been licensed ever since, cannot, to my mind, be treated as an unlicensed house in 1872. The problem which we have to solve now did not rise in Freer v. Murray. In that case the house had not a licence when the renewal was applied for. The effect of a break, followed, as in this case, by a succession of new licences or renewals, was not before the House on that occasion, and had not to be considered. The case was a simple one of a new licence. Here there was a licence both when the Act passed and when application was made for a renewal: the difference, to my mind, is manifest.

Judgment appealed from reversed. Judgment of the King's Bench Division restored.

Solicitors for the appellant, R. B. Wheatley, Son, & Daniel, for Cobbett, Wheeler, & Cobbett, Manchester.

Solicitors for the respondents, Crowders, Vizard, & Oldham, for Hockin, Raby, & Beckton, Manchester.

Privy Council.

(From the Court of Appeal for Ontario.)

July 28, 1903.

GRAVES & CO. v. GORRIE. (a.)

Copyright — Fine arts — Pictures — United Kingdom — Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68).

The Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, confers on British subjects and persons resident in the British dominions copyright in pictures, drawings, and photographs in the United Kingdom, but not beyond that area. Nor is this altered by the Canada Copyright Act, 1875.

Printing such copyright pictures in Canada is, therefore, in no way prohibited by the Fine Arts Copyright Act; to obtain protection the pictures must be registered under the Canadian laws.

Appeal by special leave from the Court of Appeal for Ontario.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Haldane, K.C., Scrutton, K.C., and Beven, for the appellants.

Denton, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The appellants and plaintiffs in this case are the registered owners of the copyright of a picture called "What we have we'll hold." They acquired this copyright under the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, commonly called the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862. They have not complied with the Canadian Copyright Act, and have acquired no copyright in Canada apart from the copyright to which the statutes of the United Kingdom entitle them. The defendant is a printer and publisher in Toronto, and he has printed, published, and sold in Canada copies of the plaintiffs' picture without obtaining any licence from them. The plaintiffs complained of this as an infringement of their copyright, and they instituted legal proceedings in Canada against the defendant for an injunction and damages. The case was heard in the High Court of Ontario, and the plaintiffs' application for an injunction was dismissed with costs. An appeal to the Divisional Court was unsuccessful. A further appeal to the Court of Appeal met with no better fate. The courts in Canada decided that the plaintiffs had no copyright in Canada. The present appeal has been brought in order that this decision may be reconsidered and finally reviewed.

The question depends entirely on the true construction and effect of the Act of 1862 before referred to. Other statutes were called in aid by the appellants' counsel and will be noticed presently, but they do not extend the rights conferred by the Act of 1862.

The Act of 1862 begins by reciting (as their lordships believe, quite accurately) that the authors of paintings, drawings, and photographs had, as the law then stood, no copyright in such works, and that it was expedient to amend the law in that respect. Then follows section 1, which confers copyright in such works on their authors, being British subjects or resident within the dominions of the Crown. Copyrights in such works and assignments of such copyrights have to be registered in Stationers' Hall; and no one is entitled to the benefit of the Act until registration (section 4); penalties are imposed on persons who infringe such copyright (see sections 6, 7, and 8); facilities are given for obtaining injunctions (section 9); importations into the United Kingdom are prohibited (section 10); the remedy by action for damages is preserved (section 11); and the then International Copyright Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 12) is incorporated.

The Act of 1862 confers on British subjects and persons resident in British dominions copyright in pictures, drawings, and photographs. Such copyright extends to the whole of the United Kingdom. But there is not a word in the Act to indicate any intention on the part of the Legislature to extend the limits within which the copyright is to be enjoyed to any part of the British dominions outside the United Kingdom. There are clauses, especially section 4, relating to registration, and section 10, prohibiting importation, which negative any such such intention. In the absence of language clearly showing an intention to confer copyright in such dominions, their lordships are of opinion that the plaintiffs' contention cannot be supported.

This view of the Act is by no means new. It was adopted in Tuck & Sons v. Priester, L. R. 19 Q. B. D. 629, in which the effect of non-registration and of the penal clauses had to be considered. The appellants' counsel, however, called in aid some other statutes, and notably the Canada Copyright Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 53), s. 3, and the International Copyright Acts.

The Canada Copyright Act, 1875, does not by section 3 make the Canadian Act set out in the schedule an Imperial Act applicable to Canada. The section simply removes a difficulty which had arisen in Canada by reason of section 91 of the British North America Act and some Orders in Council. Copyright is placed by that Act under the Dominion Legislature; and, having regard to some Orders in Council, it was doubtful by whom the Act in the schedule should be assented to. The effect of the Act was considered by the Court of Appeal for Ontario in Smiles v. Belford, 1 Ont. App. Rep. 436, and it is plain from that case, and indeed from the Act itself, that it in no way assists the plaintiffs.

The International Copyright Acts, and especially the Act of 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), were relied upon with the view of showing that, unless the Act of 1862 were held to confer copyright not only in the United Kingdom, but also in the British dominions, unforeseen anomalies would arise, and those Acts would not have the effects intended under the Berne Convention. It is unfortunately true that the International Copyrights Acts and the Berne Convention give rise to many serious difficulties when they have to be applied to particular cases. But their lordships are unable to discover any language in those Acts which, without more, extends the area of the copyright conferred by the Act of 1862 on British subjects and persons resident in British dominions, to any country beyond the limits of the United Kingdom.

The short result is that those who want copyright in Canada for paintings, drawings, and photographs must obtain such copyright by complying with the laws of that country. There is no difficulty or expense worth mentioning in doing this.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty to dismiss this appeal, and the appellants must pay the costs.

Solicitors, Eardley Holt & Hulbert; Blake & Redden.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } May 6; July 26, 1903.

BOYCE v. MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND COUNCILLORS OF THE METROPOLITAN BOROUGH COUNCIL OF PADDINGTON AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Local government—Open space—Hoarding—Adjoining landowner—Access of light—Building—Right to sue without joining Attorney-General—Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 35). s. 1; 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), s. 5; 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32), s. 4—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), s. 3.

A local authority has, under the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, control over open spaces for limited purposes only. It cannot, for example, use its interest in a disused burial ground either for the purpose of compelling an adjoining owner to give the public a right of way elsewhere or to prevent the acquisition by an adjoining owner of any rights in respect of any new building he may erect.

B., an adjoining landowner, erected flats overlooking an open space. The local authority threatened to erect a hoarding in the open space which would interfere with B.'s lights. B. thereupon brought an action for an injunction to restrain the council from erecting any such screen as would interfere or cause damage to himself and the tenants of his flats.

Held, that B. was entitled to an injunction.

Judgment of Buckley, J. (51 W. R. 109), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Buckley, J. (reported 51 W. R. 109).

The facts, which are set forth fully in the report of the case in the court below, briefly were as follows:

The churchyard of St. Mary's, Paddington, had become a disused burial ground within the meaning of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts of 1877, 1881, and 1887, and of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884; and by virtue of those Acts, and of an indenture of April, 1892, made between the vicar of the parish (who was one of the defendants) and the Vestry of Paddington (who were the predecessors in title of the defendant borough council), and of a faculty granted by the Bishop of London in December, 1892, the defendant borough council had the control and management of the churchyard.

The plaintiff was the owner of land in the parish of Paddington, and he had lately erected blocks of flats adjoining the churchyard and containing numerous windows which overlooked the churchyard.

In January, 1901, the defendant borough council proposed to erect a hoarding or screen in the churchyard in front of the windows of the plaintiff's flats, which would have had the effect of darkening them.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting any screen, wall, or building in the churchyard so as to occasion nuisance, annoyance, or damage to the plaintiff and the tenants of the flats.

Buckley, J., dismissed the action. He held that the proposed hoarding was not a "building" such as the borough council were precluded from erecting within the meaning of the said Acts, and that the said Acts did not create any easement of light for the benefit of adjoining owners.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 6th of May, 1903, when the court ordered the matter to stand over, partly in order that the Attorney-General might be consulted, but chiefly in the hope that the parties might come to a settlement.

A settlement not having been arrived at, the matter again came before the court on the 26th of July, 1903; the Attorney-General being then joined as a co-plaintiff.

Astbury, K.C., and Mark Romer for the plaintiffs.—There is an express provision in the statutes that the vestry shall hold for the purpose of public enjoyment and for that purpose alone. They cannot hold it for the purpose of exacting an involuntary contribution from the owner of an adjoining building. (They referred to the Acts in question.)

H. Terrell, K.C., and T. A. Nash, for the borough council.—The local authority, under section 4 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, is bound to hold this churchyard so that it is accessible to the public as an open space. If the council have no power to prevent builders erecting huge blocks of buildings round this open space, then this open space as an open space is seriously injured. The Council's duty is to provide for access of air and access of light. The interests of the public are not interfered with by the erection of a screen, nor is such a screen a "building" within the terms of the Act.

C. A. Montague Barlow, for the Vicar of Paddington, when asked by the court whether he wished to disclaim any connection with the action, refused to disclaim, but urged that the injunction should not be directed against him.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I will deal in the first instance with the case made against the Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington. Now we know that he took no part as vicar in the threat to erect this hoarding. We think that as against him there is no cause of action, and therefore against him the action is dismissed. And we think that under the circumstances, we ought not to interfere with the order for costs made below as far as the vicar is concerned. That only refers to the proceedings below. As to the proceedings in the Court of Appeal we do not think that the vicar, having regard to what had happened here, ought to have any costs of the appeal, so that in respect of the appeal as between the plaintiff and the vicar there will be no costs on one side or the other.

I now propose to deal with the case as against the Borough Council of Paddington. We have got their defence and they tell us in the fourth paragraph that "the action of the defendants in threatening to erect the said screen has been taken solely in performance of their public duty as trustees by virtue of the said Acts, and the sole purpose of erection was to prevent the plaintiff, as the owner or occupier of land adjoining the said churchyard from acquiring any right of light or air which would diminish or injuriously affect the enjoyment by the public of the said churchyard as an open space."

Now, when that matter came on for trial, it was attempted to be set up on behalf of the plaintiff that the proposed erection by the borough council of this screen was an act which was not covered by their authority in the Acts which determine their duties as trustees, and also, it was suggested, that the erection of a screen of this sort would actually affect the enjoyment by the public of the churchyard as an open space. When that objection was made by the plaintiff it was said: "It does not lie in your mouth as a private individual to set up that case. It may be that what we are doing is beyond our power, having regard to the Acts of Parliament, and it may be that that which we are doing tends to interfere with and diminish the enjoyment by the public of this open space, but that is a complaint which a private citizen cannot make, and the Attorney-General is not a party to this action." When the matter came before us we were of opinion that this question of whether public rights had been interfered with or whether the borough council had exceeded their statutory duties, was an important question to be determined before we could decide this matter. After first making a vain attempt to get the matter settled as between the borough council and the plaintiff so as to avoid any further litigation, we thought it our duty to say that the Attorney-General ought to be approached in order that he might judge whether this was a case in which he thought he ought to be added as a plaintiff. And upon the Attorney-General being so approached, he was of opinion that he ought to be added, and he was accordingly added. Therefore we are now in a position to determine the question really as between the Attorney-General as representing the public and the borough council.

In our judgment, what the borough council are now threatening to do is inconsistent with their duties having regard to the statutes governing those duties. I will now deal with those statutes in so far as it is necessary in this case. I do not think I need touch upon the Act of 1877, except to call attention to the words of the 1st section, where the local authorities are "to hold" these open spaces "in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation." Then one comes to the Act of 1881 with its definition of an open space, and the sections dealing with the acquisition of land for the purpose of these metropolitan open spaces. Section 5 is the really important section, containing, as it does, the powers of the managers of these open spaces.

I think that in erecting these buildings the borough council are holding and administering this open space for a purpose other than the enjoyment of it by the public in an open condition. And, speaking for myself, I think that that which they are proposing to do would in all probability really interfere with the enjoyment by the public of this open space. I wish to add that I am not disposed myself to adopt the view which Buckley, J., did, and read the word "buildings" in the limited way in which he read it in his judgment. One has some sort of light thrown upon the limitation of the authority of these trustees when one comes to the words as to enclosure. The administrators of the open space are entitled to enclose the open space with proper railings and gates, and in my judgment they have no right to enclose it wholly or partly with a screen of this sort.

Under these circumstances, in my opinion, the plaintiff succeeds in this action, and ought to have the costs of this appeal and the costs below.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I only wish to add this: That I do not desire to base my judgment upon any view as to whether this screen or hoarding is or is not a building within the meaning of this section. It seems to me that this matter may be dealt with on much broader grounds than that. The district council or the borough council, as it is now, have control over this space for strictly limited purposes. It is to be held and administered by the council in trust to allow it for the use and enjoyment of the public in an open condition free from buildings and under proper control and regulations and for no other purposes, and the subsequent words which authorize the enclosure, draining, levelling, and so on, and the doing of all such other works and things, is further limited by the words at the end—"such as may be requisite for the purposes aforesaid." Under those words it would be, I apprehend, competent for the board to erect a tool-house for the gardeners or for anything which was requisite for the purpose of the enjoyment by the public of such open space, but it seems to me that it is not competent under the powers conferred by this section to use their interest in the disused burial ground either for the purpose of compelling the adjoining owner to give the public a right of way elsewhere or to prevent the acquisition by an adjoining owner of any rights in respect of any new building he may erect. It would not be proper on my part that I should go over the ground which has been covered by Vaughan Williams, L.J., but I may just say as to the form of order, we think that the injunction should go in this form: That the defendants should be restrained from holding, administering, or using the disused burial ground in question for any purposes other than the purposes pointed out in that behalf by section 5"—then putting this in—"and in particular from using the said ground for the purpose of erecting thereon any building or screen to prevent the access of light coming over the said ground to the plaintiff's windows, provided that nothing in this injunction is to prevent the defendants," from enclosing, and so on, following the subsequent words in the section.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Cheston & Sons; J. H. Hortin.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) | June 30; July 1, 1903.

ISLINGTON CORPORATION v. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD. (a.)

Local government—Lands taken compulsorily—Assessment for poor rate—Liability for deficiency in general rate—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 133—London Government Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 14), s. 10 (2).

Section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, under which the general rate and poor rate are to be made and levied as one rate as if it were a poor rate, does not increase the liability imposed by section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, on promoters of undertakings to make good the deficiency in the poor rate caused by their taking lands for the purposes of their undertaking, and they are only liable to make good the deficiency in that proportion of the general rate which represents the poor rate.

Decision of Wright, J. (51 W. R. 255), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. (reported, 51 W. R. 255, [1902] 2 Ch. 701).

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the court below, and it is enough to say here that the question was whether section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, which enacted that the general rate and the poor rate are to be made and levied as one rate as if it were a poor rate, imposed any fresh liability upon the defendants as promoters of undertakings under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, so as to make them liable to make good the deficiency, in the general rate as a whole, caused by their taking lands for the purposes of their undertaking, and not merely the deficiency in such proportion of the general rate which represented the poor rate as they were bound to make good under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wright, J., held that section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, did not impose any fresh liability, and that the defendants were only liable to make good the deficiency in that proportion of the general rate which represented the poor rate.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Ryde, for the appellants.

Avory, K.C., and Layman, for the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Wright, J., ought to be supported. I propose to say very little about the matter, as I adopt not only his judgment, but the reasons that he has given for it. Counsel for the appellants have both referred to Farmer v. London and North-Western Railway, 36 W. R. 590, 20 Q. B. D. 788, as a strong authority applying to this case. To my mind it only applies to this case in this sense—that it is a guide to us as to what we must look for in order to make section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, apply in the present case. The question that Field, J., and Wills, J., put to themselves in that case was with respect to the borough rate and the county rate. They asked themselves whether there was anything in the Acts of Parliament regulating these two rates which brought them respectively within the operation of the words of the Lands Clauses Act, and they found that which was sufficient to make section 133 apply to those rates. What they found was that when you looked at the Act of Parliament those rates were really poor rate—that is to say, were either poor rate or were charged as poor rate. It is a similar question which we have to ask ourselves here, and when I look at this section—though I do not mean to say that there are not arguments which might be and were properly addressed to us, inviting us to put such a construction on this section as that the whole of the general rate, irrespective of the purposes for which it was to be raised, ought to be considered poor rate for the purposes of section 133—still, in my opinion, there is not sufficient to extend the liability under the section of the Lands Clauses Act beyond the poor rate. It would have been very easy to have made this section perfectly clear, but that has not been done. If Parliament had said that the general rate was to be deemed the poor rate, no question could have arisen like that which has arisen in this case. When I pressed counsel for the appellants with that observation, his answer was that the modern practice of legislation is to wrap up a Bill which is wanted to be passed in such a way as to make it less likely that there will be obstruction. He meant that the words should be wrapped up in such a way that Parliament should not recognise what was being done. I deny that there is any such practice in Parliament at all as so to wrap up legislation that the members of Parliament and others cannot know what is being passed. It remains therefore that what might have been expressed in clear language has, if the argument of counsel is right, been expressed in such a way that it can only be inferred from a minute inspection of the words of the clauses.

I entirely agree with Wright, J., that "the form of sections 10 and 11 would be a strange form to adopt if the intention were to impose a novel burden of this kind, especially when it is remembered that section 133 of the Act of 1845 is not concerned with rating at all; for while sections 10 and 11 of the Act of 1899 are entirely concerned with rating, section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, is concerned merely with the making up of the deficiency in the rate." I entirely agree with that proposition. I cannot believe that if the Legislature had intended to impose a novel burden on promoters of undertakings, and to alter their liability in this very strong manner, they would not have expressed it in clear terms.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. Certainly the Act of 1899 did not, nor has the Islington scheme, expressly cast upon the defendants such an additional burden as is contended, nor ought it to be inferred that such an additional burden is cast upon them unless the inference is necessary, having regard to the scheme. To my mind such an inference is not necessary. After the elaborate criticism of Wright, J., with which I agree in substance, I do not think it necessary to go through the provisions of these Acts. I can only say that I agree with the concluding part of Wright, J.'s, judgment, where he says: "The true meaning of the enactments when read together is that the School Board must make up the deficiency of that part of the general rate which represents the poor rate, or represents anything chargeable on that rate."

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. By the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 133, the Legislature thought fit to impose on the promoters of an undertaking the liability to make good the deficiency in the poor rate. At the time of the passing of that Act other rates were known besides the poor rate. It may be said that that rate was a universal rate, while the other rates were local. Nevertheless, the existence of such rates was well known. The Legislature did not see fit to impose liability in respect of rates other than the poor rate. Prior to 1899 four rates were collected in the metropolis—namely, the sewers rate—the lighting rate, the general rate, and the poor rate, and by the London Government Act, 1899, provisions were made for effecting alterations in that respect; and in sub-section 1 of section 10 there is an express direction that a separate sewers and a separate lighting rate are to be discontinued, and sub-section 2 provides that the general rate and the poor rate shall be assessed and made and levied together as one rate. The language there is different. There is no provision for the discontinuance of either the general rate or the poor rate. All that is provided is that they are to be assessed, made, and levied as one rate. Then it is said that it is to be called the general rate. That is a mere name. Then it is said that it is to be collected as if it were poor rate. That does not make it a poor rate. Then comes this clause: "All enactments applying or referring to the poor rate shall, subject to the provisions of this Act as to audit, be construed as applying and referring also to the general rate." The question on that is whether, on the fair construction of that clause, the effect is to impose on promoters of undertakings a liability to make up a deficiency in the general rate as opposed to the poor rate. In my opinion that is not a fair construction. If it were impossible to give effect to the language of the section in any other way, it might be necessary for the court so to hold; but it is obvious that the language in itself has a wide application quite apart from the construction contended for, and I do not think that it was intended to have the effect of enlarging the meaning of the words poor rate in section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act. There is no authority to the contrary. Farmer v. London and North-Western Railway is not such an authority. I think that Wright, J., was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, A. M. Bramall; C. E. Mortimer.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) May 7, 1903.

MAYNARD v. CONSOLIDATED KENT COLLIERIES CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Transfer—Registration—Consideration not truly stated—Insufficient stamp—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 14, sub-section 4; s. 17.

Where, in a transfer of shares in a company, the consideration is not truly stated, and the stamp, though sufficient for the consideration as stated, is insufficient for the true consideration, the company are not bound to register the transfer.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Lawrance, J., and a special jury. The action was brought to recover damages for the refusal to register a transfer of shares in the defendant company.

The facts, so far as material to raise the question for which the case is reported, were as follows: Tucker was the registered holder of 1,300 £1 shares in the defendant company, which had been issued to him in exchange for shares in another company which had been taken over with other companies by the defendant company. These shares were credited with 17s. 7d. paid up on each share, leaving 2s. 5d. unpaid. The 2s. 5d. a share having been called up, in April, 1901, Tucker agreed to sell the shares to the plaintiff, who inquired from the defendant company how much was owing upon them. He was told that £158 8s. 3d. was due, and he paid this sum to the company, and a further sum to Tucker, and a transfer of the shares was executed by Tucker and the plaintiff. The transfer stated that the consideration therefor was £158 8s. 3d., and bore a stamp proportionate to that sum. The consideration so stated was admittedly too small, and if the consideration had been truly stated in the transfer, a stamp of a higher value would have been necessary. The company refused to register the transfer, but in March, 1902, they consented to register it. The shares in the meantime had considerably depreciated in value, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the wrongful refusal to register the transfer, contending that the company could not go behind the consideration stated on the face of the transfer, and that if the stamp was sufficient for the consideration so stated the company were bound to register the transfer. The jury found that the consideration was not truly stated in the transfer, and they assessed the damages provisionally at £150.

Lawrance, J., gave judgment for the defendants.

By the articles of association of the defendant company, under the heading "Transfer and Transmission of Shares," article 29 provides that the instrument of transfer of any share shall be signed both by the transferor and transferee, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain the holder of such share until the name of the transferee is entered in the register in respect thereof. By article 30, the instrument of transfer of any share is to be in writing and in the usual common form or in the following form [setting it out], which states that the transferee is to hold the shares subject to the several conditions on which the transferor held the same immediately before the execution of the transfer. [This was the form of the transfer in question.] By article 31, the board may decline to register any transfer of shares, not being shares fully paid, upon which the company has a lien, and may decline to register a transfer to a transferee of whom they do not approve. By article 32, every instrument is to be left at the office for registration accompanied by the certificate of the shares; and by article 33 all instruments of transfer which shall be registered are to be retained by the company.

By section 14, sub-section 4, of the Stamp Act, 1891, "Save as aforesaid, an instrument executed in any part of the United Kingdom, or relating, wheresoever executed, to any property situate, or to any matter or thing done or to be done, in any part of the United Kingdon, shall not, except in criminal proceedings, be given in evidence. or be available for any purpose whatever, unless it is duly stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time when it was first executed."

By section 17, "If any person whose office it is to enrol, register, or enter in or upon any rolls, books, or records any instrument chargeable with duty, enrols, registers, or enters any such instrument not being duly stamped, he shall incur a fine of £10."

Gore-Browne, K.C., and G. A. Bonner, for the plaintiff.

Hammond Chambers, K.C., and C. C. Scott, for the defendants.

COLLINS, M.R.—The arguments in this case have ranged over a wide area, but the question is now reduced to a short one. The action is brought to recover damages for the refusal to register a transfer of shares from Tucker to the plaintiff. Tucker was the registered holder of 1,300 £1 shares in the defendant company, with 17s. 7d. paid up on each share, thus leaving 2s. 5d. unpaid. The plaintiff agreed to take over the shares from Tucker, and he and Tucker went to the company's office and were informed that £158 8s. 3d. still remained due on the shares. A transfer wes accordingly executed, and it bore on its face the consideration of £158 8s. 3d., with a stamp proportionate to that amount. The transfer was sent to the company's office, and a receipt for the transfer was sent to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff demanded registration thereof. The company refused to register it, but ultimately, in 1902, tney registered it, and waived any claim for interest. The shares had then fallen considerably, and the plaintiff claimed damages for the refusal to register the transfer. The whole point turns upon the question whether the directors of the defendant company were entitled to withhold the registration of the plaintiff as transferee of the shares. The defendants in their defence alleged that they were justified in not inserting the plaintiff's name in the share register by reason of the consideration for the alleged transfer not being truly stated and the transfer not being properly stamped. The transfer on its face was for the consideration of £158 8s. 3d. The secretary of the company came to the conclusion that that sum, which was only the amount remaining unpaid on the shares, was not the true consideration, and that therefore the document was of no validity, by reason of section 14, sub-section 4, of the Stamp Act, 1891. Inquiries were accordingly made by the company and it was found that the consideration was not truly stated, and the company refused to register the transfer.

It is said that the company had no right to refuse to register. It is urged that the obligation of the secretary is defined by section 17, which provides that "if any person whose office it is to enrol, register, or enter in or upon any rolls, books, or records any instrument chargeable with duty, enrols, registers, or enters any such instrument not being duly stamped, he shall incur a fine of £10." It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the secretary does not come within the description of the person whose duty it is to enrol or register the instrument; and further, that, even if he does, he cannot go beyond the face of the document, and that he has no right to travel outside the consideration stated on the face of the document, and that, as the stamp was a proper stamp for the consideration stated on the face of the document, no objection can be taken to it. That is the principal point raised. But what is to be done where the directors have been informed that the consideration is wrongly stated on the face of the document? It is said that the directors can not in such a case go behind the document and take the objection. No decision has been cited in support of that proposition, and it seems to me that there is express authority the other way; and apart from authority, it is contrary to common sense. The instrument, not being stamped according to law, is void and cannot be made available for any purpose whatever. How is effect to be given to the statute if it is not possible to go behind the consideration stated on the face of the document? That put the directors of the company in the position of having to determine whether or not they would accept the transfer subject to its invalidity. It was a serious matter for them, because the company keep possession of a transfer as a justification for their taking one person's name off the register and putting another person's name on, and if the transfer is bad it will not be available for any purpose whatever, and will be no protection to them. If the transfer is not available for any purpose whatever, are they bound to register it? In my opinion they are not. It was the plaintiff's duty to tender a transfer in all respects right in point of law, and unless he did so the company were under no obligation to register it. That is the answer to the plaintiff's claim. There are other points raised none of which it is necessary to deal with. The judgment of the learned judge was right, and the application fails.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion the objection of the company that the transfer was not properly stamped owing to the consideration not being truly stated is a good objection in law. By section 22 of the Companies Act, 1862, shares in a company are capable of being transferred in manner provided by the regulations of the company. The articles of association of the defendant company provide that the transfer must be signed by the transferor and the transferee, and must be in a prescribed form, which says that the transferee is to hold the shares subject to the conditions on which the transferor held them immediately before the execution of the transfer; and by article 33 all instruments of transfer, which shall be registered, are to be retained by the company. The company has two objects in retaining the transfer—first, that the transfer may be used by the company as a means of enforcing the obligations of the transferee; and, secondly, because it is a document which, when acted upon, can be vouched by the company as a justification for altering the register, if the alteration is called in question in a court of justice. In these circumstances the company cannot be called upon to act upon a transfer which cannot be made available in a court of justice either for enforcing the obligations of the transferee or for defending themselves against an attack for having altered the register. The principle has been frequently acted upon in dealings between vendor and purchaser. The case of Whiting to Loomes, 29 W. R. 435, 17 Ch. D. 10, is an instance. That was a case of a contract for the sale of real estate, which had been mortgaged to secure an advance. The mortgage deed bore a 10s. stamp. The purchaser objected that the stamp was insufficient, and that the deed ought to be stamped with the full ad valorem stamp. This court held that the objection was a good one, and that the purchaser was entitled to take it, and that the deed must be stamped with the full ad valorem stamp. James, L.J., said: "The purchaser says, 'Here is a title-deed. It ought to be stamped with a proper stamp, and it is not so stamped.' As long as it is not stamped with a proper stamp he cannot use it for any purpose whether to defend his title or attack a wrongdoer. It is impossible to say he will not want it." Cotton, L.J., said: "The purchaser may clearly require this as a deed for certain purposes, even if he may not hereafter require it as a mortgage deed. Then can it be put in evidence? It cannot as a mortgage deed, because it is not properly stamped. But it is said it is sufficiently stamped as a deed, and therefore can be put in evidence. It is not a deed simpliciter, but what is described in the schedule to the Act as a mortgage deed, and when we look at the schedule we find that the only thing that can be properly stamped with a 10s. stamp is a 'deed of any kind whatever not otherwise described in the schedule.'" Lush, L.J., said that "the court is not entitled to speculate whether the purchaser may or may not have occasion to use the deed. A purchaser is entitled to have every deed forming a step in his title in such a shape that he can, if he needs it, give it in evidence." That principle applies in the present case, and the company are entitled to say that they ought to have a transfer in such a form that they can put it in evidence, if it becomes necessary to do so. It is said that the deed was properly stamped on the face of it, and that it is impossible to go behind the face of a document upon a stamp question. In my opinion, that is not in accordance with the law. The Master of the Rolls has already stated the reasons. I will only refer to the case of Field v. Woods, 7 A. & E. 114. That was an action against the drawer of a cheque payable to bearer. The plea was that the defendant did not make the draft in manner and form, &c. At the trial the draft was produced by the plaintiffs, unstamped, and the defendants' counsel proposed to prove that the draft was post-dated, and for that reason he contended that it could not be received in evidence, having no stamp. The judge rejected the evidence upon the ground that the post-dating was a defence which ought to have been pleaded. The Court of King's Bench held that the objection need not have been pleaded, and that the evidence was admissible. Lord Denman said: "The plaintiffs proceed upon an instrument which appears primâ facie good; but then, upon the evidence at the trial, something arises which makes a stamp requisite. In Dawson v. Macdonald, 2 M. & W. 26, the action was brought on a bill of exchange; the defendant had found that the bill was written on paper improperly stamped, and he attempted to plead that fact in addition to a plea of non-acceptance; but Parke, B., said: 'The only consequence of the wrong stamping is that the instrument cannot be given in evidence.' There can be no question that this defence is admissible under a plea that the defendant did not make the draft." Littledale, J., said; "Is the objection one which it is necessary to show in pleading? I think not. The Acts being prohibitory, the moment the cheque was produced, if the defect appeared, the judge would say that he could not allow the document to be received. Here, however, it was received; and the objection was not made apparent till the opening of the defendant's case, when he offered evidence to show the defect. The practice has been lately that, if a document was once read, an objection should not be taken to it afterwards, but that has been where the defect has appeared on the document itself, as where the stamp was too small compared with the forms of the instrument or the number of words; those are different cases from the present, where the objection arose on matter extrinsic, and the judge could do nothing, in the first instance, but admit the document subject to an objection to be raised afterwards by proof." Patteson, J., said: "Supposing therefore that the document here had been given in evidence, the Acts say that it shall not be available. But it was given only as evidence primâ facie and subject to the objection which was raised by extrinsic evidence." That is a clear authority that in a proper case where the defect of a stamp does not appear on the face of the document extrinsic evidence is admissible to show the defect. If therefore the company had accepted the transfer, extrinsic evidence might be given in a court of law to show that the transfer was not sufficiently stamped and was consequently of no validity. For these reasons I think that the company were not bound to register the transfer, and that therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Burnie & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Dale, Newman, & Hood.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. } Oct. 30, 31, 1902.

In re RICHARDSON.
PARRY v. HOLMES. (a.)

Will — Construction—Estate tail—Cy-près—Perpetual succession of life estates—Distribution per stirpes.

In a devise to A. for life, and after her death to her child or children, equally between them share and share alike if more than one, and if but one to such only child for life, and so to be continued and distributed in a descending line per stirpes from issue to issue for life so long as any issue should be living descended from A., the children of the parent dying taking their parent's share equally between them in all cases of decease, there being no gift over on failure of the issue of A.:

Held, that no estate tail, by the operation of the doctrine of cy-près, was given to A., and that the limitations subsequent to the life estate of A. being void for remoteness, there was an intestacy on the death of A.

Seaward v. Willock, 5 East 198, applied.

Mortimer v. West, 2 Sim. 274; Forsbrook v. Forsbrook, 16 W. R. 290, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 93; and Parfitt v. Hember, L. R. 4 Eq. 443, distinguished.

Augusta Ann Holmes Richardson died on the 24th of August, 1902, a spinster and intestate, and Mary Josephine Parry became her administratrix.

On an originating summons, taken out by the administratrix for the determination of certain questions concerning the estate of the deceased, an order was made directing, amongst other things, an inquiry what real estate the intestate was seized of or entitled to at the time of her death. The only real estate in which she had any interest was certain freehold property at Kentish Town, and the interest she had therein depended upon the construction of the will of her grandfather, William Holmes. The master adjourned the matter into court in order that the judge might construe the will.

By his will, dated the 11th of November, 1832, William Holmes devised unto his daughter Caroline, his son George, and his daughter Mary, certain property in Kentish Town upon the trusts and subject to the provisoes thereinafter declared concerning the same; and he declared that his said children and the survivors, or survivors of them, should stand seized of the said property upon trust after making certain payments thereout, to retain the rents thereof in equal shares during the term of their natural lives. The will continued as follows:

"Provided always, and I do hereby declare, that if any such of my said children shall depart this life unmarried, or being married without leaving any child or children, then the part or share of him, her, or them so dying, shall go and accrue to the survivor or survivors of my said children, to be equally divided between them, if more than one, share and share alike, and that the last survivor of my said children shall stand and be possessed of all my said freehold for his or her own absolute use and benefit, with full liberty and power to dispose thereof either by deed or will as his or her own absolute estate and effects. But in case such son or daughter so dying shall leave issue at his or her decease, whether before or after the age of twenty-one years, the share of such child so dying to go and be divided equally amongst his or her child or children, whether sons or daughters, for life, share and share alike if more than one, and if but one then the whole share to such only child for life, and to be paid and applied towards their maintenance and support during their minority, and so to be continued and distributed in a descending line per stirpes from issue to issue for life, so long as any issue shall be living descended from my said children, the children of the parent dying taking parent's share equally between them in all cases of decease."

The will contained a gift of the residue of the real estate. There was no gift over in default of issue.

The testator died on the 7th of March, 1835, leaving him surviving the above-named children, who during their joint lives shared the rents of the property in thirds.

George died in 1856, a bachelor and intestate, and the rents were then divided between the two surviving children in moieties.

Caroline married a Mr. Richardson and died intestate in 1874, leaving her surviving her husband (who died in 1899) and A. A. H. Richardson, the above-named intestate. The rents were thereafter shared by A. A. H. Richardson and Mary Holmes.

Mary Holmes died in 1890, a widow, having devised all her real estate to A. A. H. Richardson absolutely.

From 1890 to her own death in 1902 A. A. H. Richardson was in undisturbed possession of the whole of the property and the rents thereof.

On the 14th of July, 1892, A. A. H. Richardson, having been advised that she was tenant in tail of the property, executed a disentailing deed. She afterwards sold some of the property.

William Holmes, the defendant in the originating summons, was appointed to represent the heir-at-law of William Holmes, the testator.

It was admitted at the hearing (1) that the words of the will were sufficient to pass the fee; and (2) that on the construction of the will, and in the events which happened, only the moiety of the property passed to the last survivor. Mary Holmes.

Consequently the only question argued was as to the estate which Caroline Holmes, and through her A. A. H. Richardson, took in the other moiety.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. Herbert, for the heir-at-law of A. A. H. Richardson.—The question is whether the limitation of an indefinite series of life estates, which in itself would be void for perpetuity, will not be construed as an estate tail, by the application of the doctrine of cy-près. The principles on which the doctrine is applied are stated in Monypenny v. Dering, 16 M. & W. 418, 432. In Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 533, it is said that the present point is not covered by authority, but that the doctrine will not apply where the intention is to create only a limited number of life estates. In Humberston v. Humberston, 1 P. W. 332, where the limitations of successive life estates were executory, the court gave effect to them, as far as possible, by making all the persons in being life tenants and giving an estate in tail male to the first unborn son. In the present case, notwithstanding the departure from the terms of the will, the only way of giving effect to the limitations is to give an estate tail. In Mortimer v. West, 2 Sim. 274, where the limitations were almost identical with those in the present will, except that there was a gift over on the ultimate failure of the issue, it was decided that there was an estate tail. It is true that the Vice-Chancellor based his judgment on the fact that there was a gift over. That was because he relied on Seaward v. Willock, 5 East, 198, as establishing the proposition that a mere series of life estates is not by itself sufficient to show the general intent that all the children and their issue are to take, which is necessary to create an estate tail by implication. He said that a gift over on a general failure of issue coupled with the life estates showed the general intention that the gift was to last as long as there was issue of the children. In the present will there is contained in express words what may be gathered by implication from the gift over. Again, the current of modern authority is that an indefinite series of life estates does not need to be supported by a gift over in order to result in an implied estate tail. In Forsbrook v. Forsbrook, 16 W. R. 290, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 93, at p. 99, there is a dictum by Rolt, L.J., to the effect that the application of the doctrine of cy-près to a perpetual succession of life estates would produce an estate tail. In Parfitt v. Hember, L. R. 4 Eq. 443, at p. 446, Lord Romilly, M.R., said that the doctrine of cy-près was not to be confined to executory devises, but was a rule of construction, and he applied it to a gift in trust for devisees for their lives and their issue for their lives for ever. In Hampton v. Holman, 25 W. R. 459, 5 Ch. D. 183, 193, where the question was raised, but not decided, Jessel, M.R., said that he would have been bound, if necessary, to have followed the opinion of Rolt, L.J. The decision, therefore, in Mortimer v. West need not have been based on the gift over, but might have been based only on the successive life estates. It consequently covers the present case, and A. A. H. Richardson took an estate tail which she barred.

Birrell, K.C., and Harman, for the heir-at-law of W. Holmes, the testator.—As regards this moiety, there is an intestacy, unless, by the operation of the doctrine of cy-pres, for the void gifts of perpetual life estates with stirpital continuations is substituted for the absolutely dissimilar estate of an estate tail. The true limitations of the doctrine, which ought not to be allowed to run wild, are stated in Monypenny v. Dering, 16 M. & W., at p. 428: see also Jarman on Wills (5th ed.), p. 267. It does not apply to limitations of successive life estates to the issue of an unborn person, either for a definite or an indefinite series of generations: ibid., pp. 270, 271. The dictum of Rolt, L.J., is, apart from Mortimer v. West, the only authority to the contrary. In Mortimer v. West, the Vice-Chancellor held that the gift over was the circumstance which the judgment of Lord Eldenborough in Seaward v. Willock compelled him to decide the case as he did. Forsbrook v. Forsbrook is distinguishable from Seaward v. Willock, because the last lines in the will "indicate a series of inheritances and constitute words of limitation": see per Lord Cairns, L.J., at p. 97. And in Forsbrook v. Forsbrook there was no question of stirpital distribution. A possible reason for the importance attached to the gift over in Mortimer v. West is that, before the Wills Act, a devise to A. for life and then to his issue, and on failure of his issue over, conferred an estate tail on the principle explained in Jarman on Wills, at p. 521. The Vice-Chancellor, thinking that the gift over was on an indefinite failure of issue, may have implied an estate tail; and having found an estate tail, he may have rejected the life estates as a mere nullity: Reece v. Steel, 9 Sim. 233, 236. In Monypenny v. Dering, 2 D. M. & G. 146, 179, Lord St. Leonards commented on Mortimer v. West.

They also referred to Somerville v. Lethbridge, 6 T. R. 213; Beard v. Westcott, 5 Taunt. 393, 5 B. & Ald. 81; and Hugo v. Williams, 14 Eq. 225, 21 W. R. Dig. 258.

BUCKLEY, J., held that the dispositions of the testator were so worded as to pass the fee, and that on the construction of the will, the death of one of the children unmarried—namely, George, did not, in view of the fact that Caroline died leaving a child, operate to carry the whole of the property to the last survivor—namely, Mary, and, consequently, that on the death of Caroline the property so passed as that Mary and Caroline's child were each entitled to a moiety of it. His lordship said that there was no question as to the moiety of Mary, which passed under a disposition in her will to Augusta (Caroline's child). Dealing with the question as to what happened to Caroline's moiety, he read from the will the disposition of successive life estates, and continued: Now if those are what on the face of the will they purport to be, successive life estates, there is no question but that they are void after the life estate in favour of Augusta, who is now dead. But it is argued that the result was that Augusta, or her mother, took an estate tail, and that Augusta, having become entitled to an estate tail, purported to bar it by a deed of the 14th of July, 1892, and that she thus became entitled absolutely to the other moiety. Mr. Birrell, for the heir-at-law of the testator, says that there was no estate tail, that on the death of Augusta there was an intestacy, and that he is now entitled.

In my opinion, that contention must succeed. The question is whether I can so construe the limitations of this will, having regard to the decisions to which I will refer, as to be able to arrive at the conclusion that effect is to be given to the paramount intention of the testator by giving an estate tail, although, in point of fact, his language is that there shall be successive estates for life.

Before going to the cases, let me say under what circumstances this doctrine of cy-près, as it seems to me, is applicable. If you find a number of successive limitations to persons indicated, or pointed to, who would take thereunder an estate tail, if you construe them as being an estate tail, but who cannot take by reason of the limitations as they stand being void, then it may be possible, under certain circumstances, to apply the doctrine of cy-près, and to say that, instead of the estates purported to be given by the will, the court will hold that an estate tail has been created; because if you do that, every person indicated will in his turn occupy and enjoy the property for his life, in the sense that he cannot enjoy it after his death, although it is true he will enjoy it, not as tenant for life, but as tenant in tail. The result will be that, if the estate tail is not barred, the persons indicated will in succession each enjoy the property during his life. To put it in the language of Rolfe, B., in Monypenny v. Dering, 16 M. & W., at p. 428, "By these means, the estate, if left, as it were, to itself, will go in the precise course marked out by the testator, though it will be (contrary to what he intended) liable to be diverted from that course by the act of the first taker." Each successive person will enjoy it so long as he is alive, but, of course, the estate tail, if barred, will defeat the intention of the testator; otherwise, if you leave it alone, it will go the right way. In such a case you may apply the doctrine of cy-près, and say that an estate tail will, in substance, give effect to the paramount intention. But directly you find that the persons to benefit are a class larger than those who would take under an estate tail, that the estate tail, if left alone, will not reach the intended beneficiaries, but only some of them, then the matter is a totally different one; and here the whole point of the case, as it seems to me, lies in this, that, as you pass from generation to generation, the children of the parent dying are to take their parent's share equally between them. As you come to each generation, it is not the heir in tail who is to take, but the heir in tail and all his brothers and sisters are to take equally between them. That is a direction hopelessly inconsistent with an estate tail, and you cannot, by giving an estate tail, give effect to that intention at all.

Now, passing from that to the authorities, I want to see under what circumstances the court can, in any case, merely from a succession of life estates, infer that an estate tail is given. Now on that the decision of Lord Ellenborough in Seaward v. Willock seems to me to be a plain decision, that from a mere succession of life estates you cannot infer an estate tail. It is true that, in that case, the successive life estates were given only down to the tenth generation, and not indefinitely, which, of course, is a cardinal and important fact. But Lord Ellenborough did not rely upon that fact at all. The ground upon which he puts his decision is this. He says: "His" (the testator's) "meaning clearly was to give estates for life only to his grandson, and after him to his sons, and after them to their sons down to the tenth generation, for he has added the words 'during his or their natural lives' to each limitation." I pause there to say that that is exactly the case in the present will—a life estate is expressly mentioned in each case. "But," continues Lord Ellenborough, "this he could not do by law, inasmuch as the law will not allow of a successive limitation of estates for life to persons unborn. Can we, then, make another will for the testator giving to his devisees different estates than those he meant to give to them, because the estates he intended cannot by the rules of law take effect? This, I conceive, would be assuming a power which does not belong to us, of turning a legal devise into an executory trust." Then a little lower down, after reading the devise as he says it should be read, he proceeds: "And so reading it, we find no words showing a general intent to give an estate tail in contradiction to the express estates for life, so precisely given to each description of persons who are to take under the will." It appears to me that the reasoning of Lord Ellenborough there is exactly applicable to this case. This is not an executory trust; these are dispositions in favour of the children, and they are simply dispositions of successive life estates, and, as I pointed out, the successive takers of the life estates are to be a larger class of persons than ever could take under an estate tail.

But there are cases in which a disposition simply giving successive life estates, with something more, may be, and have been, construed as creating an estate tail. I refer to Forsbrook v. Forsbrook. But the point there is that the limitations were in each case to the eldest son of C., and the eldest son of T., and so on—"the eldest son of each of the two families to inherit the same for ever," so that the persons who were to take were confined to the persons who could take under an estate tail, and the great point of difficulty here, that all the brothers and sisters take, did not arise. But, as I read Lord Cairns' judgment, he was not differing at all from Seaward v. Willock, and I think he would not have decided the case in the way in which it was decided if the limitations had been equivalent to those in Seaward v. Willcock, because he relies upon this fact, that after giving to persons successively for life, and so on, the testator says, "And so on, the eldest son of the two families of the name of Forsbrook to inherit the aforesaid property for ever"; and Lord Cairns says: "These last words clearly indicate a series of inheritances, and constitute words of limitation." So there you have got, not merely successive life estates, but that which the court held to be words of limitation giving an estate of inheritance. There they held that there was created an estate tail.

Another case which falls, I think, at this point for consideration, is Parfitt v. Hember. There you have got words which might have created the difficulty which arises in the case before me—namely, similar words; that it is to go to the "nephews and niece, and the survivors of them, for their respective lives and the life of the longest liver of them, and to the issue and issues of them respectively for their respective lives for ever, as tenants in common." The testator was, therefore, contemplating a plurality of persons who were to take. They are words to some extent similar to "children taking their parent's share equally between them"; but it was possible to give effect to those words without creating the difficulty, because what was being spoken of was a number of stocks. It was the nephews and niece and the survivors of them for their lives, and the issue and issues of them respectively for their respective lives; therefore you could give effect to the plurality by the idea of plurality of stocks, without necessarily inferring that it meant a plurality of persons in the stocks. Moreover, in that case there was this further, that the then testator spoke of the estate which he was creating as an entail. He says, "The before-stated entails to my nephews and niece and their respective issues as aforesaid." So that in that case there were the means of coming to the conclusion, and the court did come to the conclusion, that the cy-près doctrine might be adopted so as to create an estate tail.

Now, excepting cases of that class, so far as I can see, but for the case of Mortimer v. West, to which I must come, there is no ground for inferring an estate tail in a case of this kind.

I find that Mr. Jarman (5th ed., p. 271), after referring to this doctrine of cy-près, says: "It has been decided" that the doctrine "is inapplicable where an attempt is simply made to limit a succession of life estates to the issue of an unborn person, either for a definite or indefinite series of generations."

In Humberston v. Humberston, the case which lies to some extent at the root of this, the point decided was that, the trust being merely an executory trust, the court would give effect to it by directing a settlement to be executed so as to carry out that which the court found to be the intention of the party. The order was that "the master should see a settlement made of the trust estate pursuant to the will with limitations" in a particular way, giving an estate tail. But that decision has no application here, where the trust is not executory, but where the estates are created by the will itself.

With that I pass to Mortimer v. West, the case which creates the great difficulty here. In Mortimer v. West the language of the will was to a very great extent identical with that of the will before me. The gift was, after the decease of the children of Martha leaving issue, "the share of such child so dying to go and be divided equally between his or her children . . . share and share alike . . . and so to be continued and distributed, in a descending line, per stirpes, from issue to issue, for life, so long as any issue shall be living descending from the said Martha Davies, the children of the parent dying to take such parent's share equally between them." I have here exactly the point to which I called attention just now; the class to take is larger than the class which could take under an estate tail. But there was in that case a gift over; "and for default of any such issue descending and proceeding from the children of Martha Davies," then over. I pause there for the moment to say that Mortimer v. West is not the case before me, because here there is not a gift over; there is a gift of residue, but that is not, of course, equivalent to a gift over. Then what is the decision? It is the decision, and the principle of the decision, which binds me. The Vice-Chancellor says this: "In this will there is an evident and expressed intention that all the children who take in the first instance, and their children, should take estates for life. Now, in Seaward v. Willock the court was compelled to say that, as there was a single intent to create a succession of life estates, which was not warranted by law, Thomas Southcomb took an estate for life only in the property devised to him and his descendants." If I stop there, I understand the Vice-Chancellor to say, that there is a decision in Seaward v. Willock which would dispose of this case in a way the contrary of that in which he was going to decide it, and which he should have to follow but for a circumstance which he was going to mention; and he goes on: "But here, besides the intention to give life estates, there is an intention that the estates shall not go over until there is a general failure of issue. That circumstance, according to the judgment of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in Seaward v. Willock and the decision in Jesson v. Wright, compels me to hold that the persons who are to take under this will take estates tail in the freeholds and copyholds."

Now it is not necessary for me to stop to consider why the presence of this gift over should make all that difference. If I had a case which was on all fours with Mortimer v. West I should follow Mortimer v. West, but as it appears to me it does not govern the case before me, for the reason that the cardinal circumstance on which the Vice-Chancellor decided the case, namely, that there was a gift over, does not here occur. As I read his judgment, in the absence of that, he would have decided it the other way on the footing of Seaward v. Willock. I ought so to decide it on the other cases which have been referred to. I am very sorry to come to this decision, because, as I understand, a disposition of the property has been made on the footing that the lady (Augusta), did take an estate tail, and that she barred it. The matter has never come before the court to decide, and I can only decide it as seems right to me.

I decide it on these grounds, that there are here simply successive limitations of life estates, not followed, as in Forsbrook v. Forsbrook, by anything indicating estates of inheritance, and that, apart altogether from that point, the beneficiaries who are to take are not such as would take under an estate in tail, but are a larger class—namely, all the children of every generation. I agree that that circumstance occurred in Mortimer v. West. How it was got over I do not pretend to understand, but inasmuch as there is not present here that which was relied on in Mortimer v. West, the presence of a gift over, I think it does not apply. Therefore I do not follow it.

I think I am bound to decide it according to my own judgment. I hold that on the death of Augusta there was an intestacy, and the heir-at-law of William Holmes, the testator, is entitled.

I ought, perhaps, to add that in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 D. M. & G., at p. 179, Lord St. Leonards refers to Mortimer v. West in terms which I will simply read without commenting upon them. He says: "The other case referred to was Mortimer v. West, before the the Vice-Chancellor, in which, though there were void estates for life, his honour relied upon a general gift over (whether properly or not I need not now consider); but it is no authority on which I can act for the general proposition which I do not think can be maintained." The general proposition will be found stated at the head of p. 178 in these words. He says: "It has also been argued here very ingeniously that wherever you find an estate tail given to the parent, either under an actual limitation which would admit of no difficulty, or by implication (as, for example, to A., and if he dies without issue to B., where an estate tail arises by implication from the gift over) if the preceding or following limitations in the will are to the children of that person, they may be rejected, and that it is utterly unimportant that successive estates are by these limitations attempted to be raised which would be void for perpetuity." "I know," says Lord St. Leonards, "of no such rule, and must deny that any such exists."

Solicitors, Vandercom & Co.

Chan. Div. } June 22, 23, 24, 25, 29; July 4.
Joyce, J. }

HODSON v. DEANS. (a.)

Mortgage to friendly society—Sale by mortgagees—Purchase by official of society—Sale set aside.

In a sale by mortgagees, who were the trustees of a friendly society, the mortgaged property was purchased by a member of the investment committee which had charge of realising the mortgage securities. At the sale the mortgagor had bid more than sufficient to cover principal, interest, and costs. In an action by the mortgagor against the mortgagees and the purchaser,

Held, that under the circumstances under which the sale was carried out the plaintiff had not been fairly treated; that the onus lay on the defendants of proving the bona fides of the transaction, and that as this onus had not been discharged the sale must be side aside, following Farrar v. Farrars, 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395, and Martinson v. Clowes, 30 W. R. 795, 21 Ch. D. 857.

Action by mortgagor to set aside sale of mortgaged property by mortgagee.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Hodson, was the wife of a gardener, and the defendants were, the trustees of the London United District of the Ancient Order of Foresters, and Drew, the purchaser of the mortgaged property from the society, who was also a member of the investment committee of the society which had the superintendence of the investment and re-investment of the funds of the society, and also of the getting in and the realization of all mortgage securities.

(a.) Reported by A. C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 6th of April, 1899, the plaintiff mortgaged five leasehold houses in Islington to the trustees of the London United District of the Ancient Order of Foresters to secure the sum of £1,300 and interest repayable by instalments. The plaintiff having fallen into arrears with her payment of instalments under the mortgage, the society recovered judgment against her for £82. A receiver was subsequently appointed, and the investment committee ultimately decided to sell the property, which was put up for sale by auction and sold for £1,475 to the defendant Drew, a member of the said investment committee. Shortly afterwards Drew obtained from the society an advance of £1,450 upon this property, coupled with a small collateral security. Notice of the intended sale was not given to the plaintiff, and she only heard of it by accident shortly before it took place, neither was she told what the reserve price was. Under these circumstances the plaintiff brought this action claiming a declaration that the sale was not binding on her, that she was still entitled to claim redemption of the mortgaged property, and an account of what was due under the mortgage.

Beddall, and S. R. Earle, for the plaintiff.—A mortgagee cannot sell to himself nor to his solicitor, whether he acts for himself or as an agent for a third party, nor to anyone connected with the sale on his behalf, and he must act in good faith: Kennedy v. de Trafford, 45 W. R. 671, [1897] A. C. 180. Drew knew the reserve price, and intended to buy the property for himself, while the plaintiff was left in ignorance. It is impossible to say that on the facts the sale took place in good faith, and it is therefore bad as against the plaintiff: see Martinson v. Clowes, 30 W. R. 795, 21 Ch. Div. 857. In an ordinary case the onus rests upon the mortgagor of proving absence of bona fides, but if there are suspicious circumstances the onus is shifted, and the burden of upholding the sale is thrown upon the mortgagee: Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395. The property was sold at an undervalue, and the sale was chilled by the presence of many foresters and the fact that Drew, as member of the committee, was the principal bidder: Twining v. Morrice, 2 Bro. C. C. 326, at p. 331; Nelthorpe v. Pennyman, 14 Ves. 517. The investment committee could not have sold the property by private contract to themselves nor to one of their number: Parnell v. Tyler, 2 L. J. Ch. 195; Tennant v. Trenchard, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 537, 17 W. R. Dig. 172; Guest v. Smythe, 18 W. R. 742, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 551.

Hughes, K.C., and Martelli, for the defendants other than Drew.—So far as the trustees are concerned the sale was in good faith and perfectly proper. The fact that Drew was a member of the investment committee was immaterial unless it can be shown that he purchased on behalf of the committee. The fact that the sale took place by auction made the sale good, which might have been doubtful if it had taken place privately. The only duty that a mortgagee who is selling owes to the mortgagor is to act in good faith: Kennedy v. de Trafford; Farrar v. Farrars (Limited).

G. Lawrence, for the defendant Drew.—Drew is in the same position as the other defendants. The trustees were the true vendors. The plaintiff has failed to prove absence of bona fides. Martinson v. Clowes was a different case; it only decides that a mortgagee cannot sell to an agent employed to conduct the sale. A mortgagee can sell to an agent acting in other matters: Nutt v. Easton, 47 W. R. 430, [1899] 1 Ch. 873.

Beddall replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 4.—JOYCE, J.—The plaintiff in this case is a married woman of some business capacity, but of imperfect education. The mortgagees are an artificial person, a friendly society, and the hand by which they have acted in dealing with this mortgage is the investment committee. The defendant Drew, who is described as a builder, was a member of that committee. Immediately after a receiver had been appointed of the plaintiff's five houses, Drew, without informing his colleagues, privately made a careful inspection of the houses, which he decided to buy and make a profit out of for himself. On the 20th of June Drew called on the plaintiff, and there is a conflict of evidence as to what took place on that occasion. I see no reason to doubt the veracity of the plaintiff, her story being corroborated by evidence called on behalf of the defendants, and I am clearly of opinion that the defendant Drew's account cannot be accepted. The plaintiff says he came to see her under the name of Deans; he told her that a receiver had been appointed of the five houses, and that it was the duty of the society to buy them in. Drew denies that he said anything about buying in, but I am sure he did because of his own evidence. What was his motive in going to see the plaintiff? He says he went to put her on her guard, purely out of a friendly feeling for her, and that he had no idea of buying the property for himself. In my opinion all this is untrue. I think Drew went to the plaintiff in order to get the property for himself without a sale, but in this he did not succeed. On the 3rd of July there was a meeting of the investment committee, when it was decided to put the property up for sale. The society were entitled to sell, but they were under a duty to realize the property to the best advantage. According to the minute-book, which was not disclosed, although it is very important, on many occasions when mortgagors had fallen into arrears the society had allowed payment of the instalments representing principal to stand over. I think in this case the society would have been satisfied with the payment of the interest without proceeding to a sale. Who, then, instigated the sale? Two officials of the society could not swear it was not Drew who proposed it. In my opinion Drew proposed the sale and also nominated the auctioneer; at any rate, he was present when the instructions were given to the auctioneer. The reserve price was fixed, on the 17th of July, at £1,350. Some witnesses for the defendants have said that the reserve prices were always fixed by the trustees. I am satisfied that is not the case, and that the reserve prices are fixed by the investment committee, and I am confirmed in this by the entries in the minute-book. I think it is highly probable that Drew himself, directly or indirectly, fixed the reserve price at what he was prepared to give for the property. The sale was fixed for the 28th of July, but no notice of the sale was sent to the plaintiff; she only heard of it by the merest accident three days before it took place. Drew had informed the secretary that he was going in for the property, and he was the only member of the investment committee present at the sale. There were also many ordinary members of the society at the sale, a leaflet having been issued inviting them to attend. Drew was the principal bidder, with the result that the sale must have been discouraged. The bidding eventually resulted in a competition between Drew and the plaintiff, and it was eventually knocked down to Drew for £1,475, although the plaintiff had bid more than sufficient to cover the principal, interest, and costs of the mortgage. Drew knew what the reserve price was, but the plaintiff did not know. If she had known she could have stopped the sale immediately the reserve price was passed. After the sale Drew said to the plaintiff: "I am sorry for you, but I told you I should have to buy them in." The plaintiff thought the property had been bought in on behalf of the society. Her solicitors subsequently applied for the name of the purchaser, but this was refused.

What is the law with reference to this case? It is true that a mortgagee is not a trustee for sale in the ordinary sense; he has rights of his own, but he is also under obligations to the mortgagor. The mortgagee in this case is not an individual, but an artificial person, a society acting through a committee, and an agent acting in the sale cannot as against the mortgagor sell to himself. In Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), 37 W. R. 196; 40 Ch. D. 395, Lindley, L.J., at p. 409, said: "It is perfectly well settled that a mortgagee with a power of sale cannot sell to himself, either alone or with others, nor to a trustee for himself . . . . nor to anyone employed by him to conduct the sale. . . . A sale by a person to himself is no sale at all, and a power of sale does not authorise the donee of the power to take the property subject to it at a price fixed by himself, even although such price be the full value of the property. Such a transaction is not an exercise of the power." He also approved of Martinson v. Clowes, 30 W. R. 795; 21 Ch. D. 857, where the circumstances, although not precisely the same as the present case, were analogous. In that case North, J., said: "It is quite clear that a mortgagee exercising his power of sale cannot purchase the property on his own account, and I think it clear also that the solicitor or agent of such mortgagee acting for him in the matter of the sale cannot do so either." Then as to agents for sale, Lord Cottenham, In re Bloye's Trusts, 1 M. & G. 488, at p. 494, said: "If the principal is incapacitated, can the agent do that which the principal could not? The question arose (though I am not aware that it was the subject of decision) and was matter of observation by Lord Eldon in the case of Downes v. Grazebrook, 3 Mer. 200. There Lord Eldon laid it down, not as a new proposition, but as a necessary result of the doctrine of the court, that an incumbrancer with a power of sale was in the first instance a trustee for sale and being such was affected with all the disability of purchasing which any other trustee would be. That was the case there, and the only point calling for decision; but Lord Eldon alludes to the fact of the attorney purchasing, and asks the question (in a way in which those who are familiar with Lord Eldon's mode of putting a question may know what answer he would have given if he had been called upon to answer it) whether the attorney could do that which the principal could not; whether, if a party is incapacitated from purchasing, he can employ an agent to do that which he could not do himself; and whether that agent had a power to purchase which his principal had not—it would be the most absurd distinction in the world."

In this case I am satisfied, and find as a fact, that the property was sold at an undervalue, not of itself so great as to invalidate the sale, but still at an undervalue.

In my opinion the investment committee could not have sold privately to themselves either as a committee or as individuals at a price fixed by themselves, and the suggestion that this defect was cured by the fact that the sale was a sale by auction is not well founded. The fact that Drew was bidding probably chilled the sale; if he had ceased bidding the plaintiff would have purchased the property and the mortgage would have been paid off. The investment committee in fact sold to one of themselves after the plaintiff had bid more than sufficient to cover the principal interest and costs of the mortgage. I think that the principle laid down in Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), applies to this case, and, therefore, the onus is thrown upon the defendants of proving that everything connected with the sale was fair and bonâ fide. Has that onus been discharged? Although no fraudulent conspiracy has been proved, there appears to have been a total absence of bona fides on the part of Drew. Whenever his interest was in conflict with that of the plaintiff, he preferred his own, and the defendants have not satisfied me that there was no collusion between the members of the committee and Drew. Under all the circumstances the case is a very suspicious one, and I distrust all the persons who were mixed up in the sale. I do not think the plaintiff has been fairly treated, nor that all the proceedings were bonâ fide. Therefore, the sale must be set aside and the defendants must pay the costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Churchman & Winser.

Solicitor for the defendant Drew, G. H. Daniell.

Solicitors for the defendant trustees, Whittington, Son, & Barham.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Aug. 5, 6, 12, 1903.

In re MARQUIS OF ANGLESEY.
DE GALVE v. GARDNER. (a.)

Practice — Receiver — Equitable execution — Subsequent mortgagees and judgment creditors — Stop order — Charging order—Priority.

An order appointing a receiver prevents the debtor from dealing with the moneys, over which the receiver has been appointed, to the prejudice of the execution creditor, and prevents any subsequent execution creditor from gaining priority over the creditor obtaining the order, if at the date when the order appointing the receiver was obtained, the property of the judgment debtor can not be taken in execution or made available by any other legal process.

Persons obtaining charging orders or stop orders on a fund in court paid in subsequently to the date of the receiving order do not obtain a priority.

Summons to vary the master's certificate.

By his will, dated August, 1898, the fourth Marquis of Anglesey, bequeathed his residuary personal estate to the plaintiff, the Countess de Galve, and appointed the defendant Gardner his executor.

On the 13th of October, 1898, the testator died; on the 1st of May, 1899, an order for the administration of his personal estate was made in a creditor's action. The personal estate was paid into court to the credit of the action.

On the 18th of July, 1899, Hartog obtained an order appointing a receiver of the plaintiff's interest in the residuary personal estate, without prejudice, to the rights of prior incumbrancers. The receiver was directed to apply any moneys received by him in satisfying two judgments obtained by Hartog against the plaintiff in June, 1899. Notice of this order was given to the executor on the same day, and it was served on his solicitors.

On the 9th of February, 1901, an order on further consideration was made, directing that the amount of the testator's debts as certified by the master's certificate should be paid.

On the 10th of June, 1901, an order was made for general administration of the personal estate and (if necessary) of the real estate.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 5th of June, 1902, an order was made in the creditors' action directing that the net residue after certain payments should be carried over to the credit of the present action, subject to restraints imposed by stop orders and charging orders obtained subsequently to the order on further consideration, by certain mortgagees and judgment creditors of the plaintiff.

On the 27th of February, 1903, the master made his general certificate, by which he gave Hartog priority in respect of his receivership order over the subsequent mortgagees and judgment creditors who had obtained restraints.

Poitevin, a judgment creditor who had obtained a stop order and a charging order, took out a summons to vary the master's certificate by postponing Hartog's claim. The mortgagees and the other judgment creditors who had obtained restraints adopted and claimed the benefit of the summons on this point.

Austen-Cartmell, for the plaintiff.

J. G. Wood, for Poitevin.

Maugham, for Hartog.

Ashton Cross, Le Riche, Edward Bray, Ashworth James, Edward Beaumont, and William Baker, for other parties.

SWINFEN EADY, J., read the following judgment: Maurice Hartog, on the 18th of July, 1899, obtained an order appointing a receiver of the Countess de Galve's interest in the residuary personal estate of the late Henry, fourth Marquis of Anglesey, without prejudice to the rights of prior incumbrancers; and such receiver was ordered to apply any moneys received by him in satisfying two judgments obtained by Hartog against the countess for £2,744 6s. 9d. Notice in writing of this order was given on the same day to the executor of the marquis.

The effect of an order appointing a receiver, by way of equitable execution, has been often considered. It does not make the execution creditor a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1869-1883, and it does not create a charge: In re Dickinson, Ex parte Charrington & Co., 37 W. R. 130, 22 Q. B. D. 187; In re Potts, Ex parte Taylor, 41 W. R. 337, [1893] 1 Q. B. 648. If the judgment debtor is a company, and an order to wind up the company be made before the order appointing a receiver has been acted on, the execution creditor will not be a secured creditor in the winding up; nor, in the absence of special circumstances, will the court, in the exercise of its discretion under section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, allow the order to be further proceeded with: Croshaw v. Lyndhurst Ship Co., 45 W. R. 570, [1897] 2 Ch. 154. But, on the other hand, the order appointing a receiver operates as an injunction to restrain the judgment debtor from himself receiving the moneys over which the receiver is appointed (Tyrrell v. Painton, 43 W. R. 163, [1895] 1 Q. B., at p. 206, per Lindley, L.J.), and in my opinion it prevents the debtor from dealing with the moneys to the prejudice of the execution creditor; and it also prevents any subsequent execution creditor from gaining priority over the creditor obtaining the order, if at the date when the order was obtained the property of the judgment debtor cannot be taken in execution or made available by any other legal process. The case of Levasseur v. Mason & Barry, 39 W. R. 596, [1891] 2 Q. B. 73 (in the Court of Appeal), shows the advantage of obtaining such an order. In that case a judgment creditor had obtained the appointment of a receiver of certain copper, which was subject to a lien, and subsequently the debtors were adjudicated to be in judicial liquidation in France, and the plaintiffs were appointed liquidators. The order, as varied by the Divisional Court and affirmed by the Court of Appeal, did not contain any direction to pay the judgment debt; and, moreover, nothing whatever had been received by the receiver before the appointment of the plaintiffs as liquidators. It was nevertheless held by the Court of Appeal that the execution creditors and not the liquidators were entitled to the proceeds of the copper, Lord Esher stating (at p. 80) that the receivership order had the effect of giving to the judgment creditor a right to have the property in dispute handed to him, after a certain difficulty had been got rid of. At the time when Hartog obtained the appointment of a receiver there was no other method open to him of taking in execution the share of the Countess de Galve in the residuary estate of the marquis. The difficulty in his way was that the debts of the marquis, legacies, and costs must be paid before the residuary estate which belonged to the countess could be ascertained. The case of Dixon v. Wrench, 17 W. R. 591, L. R. 4 Ex. 154, shows that he could not have obtained a charging order under the statutes 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. And there was not any fund in court which could be affected by any charging order or stop order, as at that date only £40,000 had been paid into court in the creditors' action of Willmot v. Gardner, and that amount was not nearly sufficient to pay the testator's creditors, who had the first claim upon that fund. The question then arises: Has any other person subsequently obtained priority over Hartog? It is well settled that an execution creditor is not in the position of a purchaser, and the rule of obtaining priority by notice does not apply to him. An execution creditor takes subject to all prior equities: Scott v. Lord Hastings, 6 W. R. 862, 4 K. & J. 633; Arden v. Arden, 33 W. R. 593, 29 Ch. D. 702, at pp. 709, 710. Even in the case of mortgagees, if when they take their security they give proper notice of it to the trustees, and the funds are not in court, they will not be postponed by a subsequent incumbrancer obtaining the first stop order after the subsequent transfer of the funds into court: Livesey v. Harding, 23 Beav. 141. The effect of a garnishee order is to give the garnishor a lien on the debt (per Cotton, L.J., in In re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co., 38 W. R. 233, 43 Ch. D., at p. 104. But a garnishee order can only bind so much of the debt as the judgment debtor can honestly deal with when the order is obtained and served and does not affect the claims of creditors in whose favour he has charged the debt, though they have not given notice of their claim: In re General Horticultural Co., 34 W. R. 681, 32 Ch. D. 512; Badeley v. Consolidated Bank, 36 W. R. 745, 38 Ch. D. 238; Davis v. Freethy, 24 Q. B. D. 519, 38 W. R. Dig. 193. The same rule must be applied to charging orders obtained under the statutes 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82 as to garnishee orders. They are both processes of execution to enforce payment of money under a judgment or order, and the execution creditor can only obtain what the judgment creditor can honestly give him. The persons who have obtained charging orders or stop orders on the fund in court, all of which has been paid in since the date of Hartog's order, have not thereby obtained any priority over him. It follows that, in my opinion, Hartog has the first claim to be paid out of the fund now in court. His equitable right is prior in date to that of any other party. To decide otherwise would be to hold that an order appointing a receiver by way of equitable execution has no effect whatever and still leaves the property to be dealt with by the debtor as he pleases, as, of course, a residuary legatee may charge or incumber his interest before the net residue is ascertained. It was further urged on behalf of the applicant Leon Poitevin, No. 8 in the master's certificate, that he ought to be placed before No. 7 in the same certificate, John Blackburn, on the ground that his stop order was lodged at the Chancery Pay Office before Blackburn's stop order was lodged, but I have already pointed out that an execution creditor who obtains a charging order and a stop order does not gain any priority over a prior incumbrancer by lodging a stop order before the prior incumbrancer does so. The result is that the summons to vary fails; but as other incumbrancers have claimed the benefit of it, the proper order as to costs will be, to make the costs of the summons costs in the action.

Solicitors, Langford & Fisher; Munns & Longden; McKenna & Co.; Denton, Hall, & Burgin; Hubbard & Shepard; Warrens; Farrer & Co.; Harries, Wilkinson, & Raikes; Fraser & Christian.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 14, 1903.

ANDREW v. RAMSAY. (a.)

Principal and agent—Secret commission—Breach of duty—Right of agent to commission.

The relation of principal and agent implies that the agent will act solely on behalf of his principal. If, therefore, in breach of his duty as agent, he receives a secret commission from the other side, he is not only liable to refund the secret commission, but he is not entitled to any commission; and the principal is entitled to recover any commission that he has paid the agent.

Appeal by the defendant from the county court judge at Clerkenwell.

The following facts appeared from the statement of counsel:

The plaintiff was a builder, and the defendants were auctioneers and estate agents.

In June, 1902, the plaintiff instructed the defendants to find a purchaser for certain property of which he was the owner at the price of £2,500, and agreed to pay them £50 as commission if a sale was effected.

The defendants in July put forward a Mr. Clutterbuck as purchaser, and after some negotiation the price was fixed at £2,100. Clutterbuck paid the defendants £100 deposit, out of which they handed to the plaintiff £50 and retained £50 as their commission. Clutterbuck subsequently gave information to the plaintiff that the defendants had received from him a sum of £20 as secret commission. An action was then brought to recover that sum, and the defendants paid that amount into court.

The plaintiff then brought this action to recover the sum of £50 which had been retained by the defendants as their commission.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that he would have been justified in refusing to pay them their commission if he had been aware of the true facts.

The defendants appealed.

A. Neilson, for the defendants.—I admit that if the commission had not been paid the defendants could not have recovered it, but where the commission has been paid the plaintiff can only recover on a total failure of consideration, and that cannot be said to be the case here. The case of Salomans v. Pender, 13 W. R. 637, 3 H. & C. 639, is distinguishable, and the passage at the end of Martin, B.'s, judgment is in my favour.

Chester Jones, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — This is an action brought to recover the sum of £50, which had been retained by the defendant as remuneration for services rendered, or alleged to have been rendered, by him as agent to the plaintiff in respect of the sale of certain property. The claim is grounded on the fact that the defendant, in breach of his duty, accepted a secret commission of £20 from the purchaser. The first point taken on behalf of the defendant—that, as the plaintiff sued for and recovered the £20, the present action is not maintainable. I cannot accede to that view. The contract of sale entered into between the purchaser and the plaintiff is entirely distinct from the contract of agency between the plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff recovered the £20 as part of the price at which his property had been sold to the purchaser, and that does not prevent him in any way from recovering the £50 if the defendant has not faithfully discharged his duty as agent. It is next urged that there has been no total failure of consideration, as a sale was in fact arrived at through the agent. This argument takes no account of the decision in Salomans v. Pender, where it was held that though the agent had effected a sale yet, as in doing so he had been guilty of a breach of his duty as agent, he could not recover his commission, and though the breach of duty in that case consisted in the agent selling to a company in which he was himself interested, the decision did not turn on the technical rule that an agent may not contract with himself, but upon the general principle that an agent must act fairly and impartially by his principal, and that, if he does not so act, he is not entitled to any commission. The case itself affords only one illustration of that principle. Martin, B., there said during the argument: "The plaintiff was employed to sell the property upon the best terms he could"; and subsequently, after Bramwell, B., had given expression to the narrower view that the agent, by offering to sell the property, undertook that a third person should be the purchaser, Martin, B., in the course of his judgment, quotes and adopts the following passage from Story on Agency, s. 210 (9th ed.), p. 239: "In this connection also it seems proper to state another rule in regard to the duties of agents which is of general application — that in matters touching the agency agents cannot act so as to bind their principals where they have an adverse interest in themselves. This rule is founded upon the plain and obvious consideration that the principal bargains in the employment, for the exercise of disinterested skill, diligence, and zeal of the agent for his own exclusive benefit. It is a confidence necessarily reposed in the agent that he will act with a sole regard to the interest of his principal so far as he lawfully may; and even if impartiality could possibly be presumed on the part of the agent where his own interests are concerned, that is not what a principal bargains for, and in many cases it is the very last thing which would advance his interests. The seller of an estate must be presumed to be desirous of obtaining as high a price as can fairly be obtained therefor, and the purchaser must equally be presumed to desire to buy it at as low a price as he may." Where the agent of the seller does not act solely in the interests of his principal, no one can say that the price which he obtains is the best price obtainable. A faithful servant might have obtained a better. The principal is entitled to expect that the agent will act fairly and honestly for his exclusive advantage, and if the agent works for the other side or for himself so as to sacrifice his principal's interests, he is not entitled to any commission. The principle laid down in Salomons v. Pender clearly applies to this case, though it does not precisely cover it.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I adopt the reasons which have been given by my lord, but I think there is another reason why the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action. The £100 deposit was paid to the defendant by Clutterbuck as part of the purchase-money of the plaintiff's property. The plaintiff allowed the defendant to retain his commission of £50 out of the £100 so deposited, because he supposed that the defendant had duly earned his commission. If he had known that the defendant had been acting improperly, he might have insisted on his paying over the whole £100, and the defendant at best could only have set off a claim for £50 as commission. If the defendant had brought an action against the plaintiff for the £50, he clearly could not have recovered, and he ought not to be in any better position merely because he happens to be in possession of the money.

The defendant is not entitled to retain the sum in dispute, and must account for it to the plaintiff.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think there are many grounds on which the claim might be placed, but I am content to adopt those which have been stated by my learned brothers.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for defendants, Whittington, Son, & Barham.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Lewis & Sons.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) June 30, 1903.

KESLAKE v. THE BOARD OF TRADE. (a.)

Ship—Seaman—Master and servant—Illegal deductions—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 31, 221, 232.

No deduction from the wages of a seaman can be made for the offence of desertion, except by a court of summary jurisdiction, in accordance with sections 221 and 232 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; and any private arrangement with the seaman that such deduction should be made is illegal.

Case stated by the magistrate of Thames police-court.

The special case set out the following facts:

One Charles Mellen signed an agreement, as provided by 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60, s. 115, to serve as a fireman on board the steamship Saxony, owned by D. MacIvor, of Liverpool, on the 14th of June, 1902, for a voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate and back for a period not exceeding twelve months, at the rate of £4 per month. He received an advance of £3 10s.

On the 15th of July, 1902, at the arrival of the steamship Saxony, C. Mellen deserted the ship, and in consequence the owners were compelled to engage a fireman as substitute and to pay him the sum of £4 10s. per month, being the rate of wages prevailing at the port. In consequence of this breach the owners of The Saxony incurred a loss of 15s. 3d.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 21st of October, 1902, C. Mellen signed an agreement to serve as fireman on board the steamship Urmston Grange at Buenos Ayres, at the rate of £4 10s per month.

On the 15th of December, 1902, The Urmston Grange arrived at the West India Docks, and the appellant, W. Keslake, the master of the steamship Urmston Grange, was then made aware of C. Mellen's desertion by a letter from the Shipping Federation.

By that letter, after setting out the desertion and the penalty for desertion under section 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that it was the intention of the federation to prosecute in the present instance, if necessary, the appellant was requested on behalf of the owners of The Saxony to withhold payment of the wages due to Mellen pending the issue of proceedings which were contemplated. The letter further contained the following paragraphs:

"The amount of the owner's claim is 15s. 3d.; please give the above-named the option of agreeing to one of the following courses: (a) If the balance of wages due exceeds the amount of the owners' claim by £2 or more, give him the opportunity of voluntarily agreeing to the deduction of the claim from such balance of wages. (b) If the balance of wages is less than or does not exceed by more than £2 the amount of the owners' claim, give him the opportunity of voluntarily agreeing to the deduction of all but £2 from such balance of wages."

C. Mellen then agreed to 15s. 3d., the amount of the loss incurred by the owners of The Saxony, being deducted from his wages earned on board The Urmston Grange, and signed a form of authority which had also been read to him, and which he thoroughly understood.

In consequence of this agreement and authority, the appellant entered in the account of wages on the form approved by the Board of Trade under the heading "Other Deductions," the words following "Deducted by your Authority, 15s. 3d.," and handed the said amount of wages to C. Mellen in pursuance of section 132 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, who raised no objection thereto.

On the 11th of December, 1902, the appellant attended at the offices of the Board of Trade for the purpose of paying off C. Mellen and the other members of the crew of The Urmston Grange, in accordance with section 131 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and C. Mellen likewise attended.

The superintendent then read to the appellant sub-section 1 of section 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and expressed his view that the deduction of 15s. 3d. from the wages of C. Mellen was not legally made, and refused to accept the said wages with the deduction aforesaid, or to allow them to be paid to the said C. Mellen in his presence.

The superintendent then left the office, and the appellant, while still in the office, but in the absence of the superintendent, paid the balance after deducting the 15s. 3d. to C. Mellen, who signed the account of wages.

The magistrate was of opinion that a forfeiture for desertion of any part of a seaman's wages must be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of sections 221 and 232 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; that it could not be the subject of private arrangement, and that the deduction of 15s. 3d. from the seaman's wages was illegal. He accordingly convicted the appellant. He would not have so convicted him if he had not agreed with the view taken by the superintendent of mercantile marine, for if the appellant was legally entitled to have made the deduction from the seaman's wages, he should have held (as was contended by counsel for the respondents) that the superintendent should have afforded the appellant facilities for paying the wages less the deduction in his presence, and that the payment must be taken to have been so made.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the magistrate's determination, based on his construction of the aforesaid sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, was correct in point of law.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Noad with him), for the apellant.—This was simply a compromise by the owners of their rights under section 226 with the seaman and did not effect the rights of the Board of Trade under section 221 to take criminal proceedings. The superintendent was, therefore, wrong in refusing to be present.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Sutton and Howard Smith with him), for the Board of Trade, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion the decision of the magistrate was perfectly right, and for the reasons he has given. I only desire it should not be supposed that anything I may have said in the course of the case for the purpose of following counsel's argument is to be taken as in any way expressing what would be my own view in any other case.

In this case the captain was summoned for not paying the seaman his wages in the presence of the superintendent of marine, and if wages are paid otherwise than as provided by section 131, that is to say, through or in the presence of the superintendent of marine, the captain is clearly liable to a penalty. Those words are not merely formal words to show that it does not pass through the hand of a crimp or anybody who will deduct a portion of the money, but it is obvious the superintendent is there for another purpose. An account has to be delivered, and any deduction from the wages must appear in this account. Now, of course the superintendent would, on the face of the document, see nothing but "deducted by your authority, 15s. 3d." That might mean anything, but it was in fact a deduction made in pursuance of the bargain between the captain and the fireman, a bargain which I shall, for this purpose, assume he understood. That being so, what did the bargain amount to. By section 221 of the Merchant Shipping Act it is provided that if a seaman commits the offence of desertion he shall be liable to forfeit all or any part of the effects he leaves on board, and of the wages he has then earned, and also, if the desertion takes place abroad, the wages he may earn in any other ship in which he may be employed until his next return to the United Kingdom, and to satisfy any excess of wages paid by the master or owner of the ship to any substitute engaged in his place at a higher rate of wages than the rate stipulated to be paid to him. By section 232, "Where any wages or effects are under this Act forfeited for desertion from a ship, those effects may be converted into money, and those wages and effects, or the money arising from the conversion of the effects, shall be applied towards re-imbursing the expenses, caused by the desertion, to the master or owner, and, subject to that re-imbursement, shall be paid into the Exchequer and carried to the Consolidated Fund." Therefore, in any proceedings for desertion before the magistrate the claim of the owners of The Saxony would be a first charge upon any money the magistrate might think fit to direct should not be paid to the seaman, and any balance would be payable to the Exchequer. It is plain, therefore to my mind that this was not merely a bargain with reference to the claim of the owners of The Saxony, but one which placed the seaman in a different position with reference to the consequences of his desertion as provided for by sections 221 and 232; in other words, it dealt with his liabilities under the desertion without the sanction of the court. Now, having regard to what is shown on the face of the bill, I think the presence of the superintendent would have been to sanction certainly directly—I think, to a certain extent, directly—the legality of the deduction. That being so, the superintendent was right in saying, "I will not be a party to a deduction made upon the basis of this statement, and therefore I decline to be present when the wages are paid." The man is then paid without the superintendent being present, and, that not being a lawful payment, the captain took the responsibility of paying it. I only desire to add that what I said does not conflict in any way with anything in section 226. As to what may be the rights of the shipowner, apart from those reserved to him by section 226, I express no opinion. In my opinion those rights have no bearing upon sections 131, 221 and 232, under which this arrangement purported to be carried out. For these reasons I am of opinion the learned magistrate was right in the view he took.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also wish to limit my judgment to the facts of this case. Section 226 does undoubtedly preserve certain civil remedies to the owner, and whether there is any objection to their application in such a case as this I do not know; but it has been suggested that, even on that point, there might be a question, and as we have not had our attention directed to anything which might conflict with the primâ facie meaning of section 226, I desire to say that I express no opinion that under section 226 exactly what has been done here could be done, if there were nothing in the agreement amounting to a compromise of the criminal proceedings. That must be considered when it arises, but the present case is to my mind quite plain. The letter which has been read, and after reading which the seaman signed the authority, seems the clearest possible intimation that if he signed that authority the owners of The Saxony would not prosecute him for desertion, and inasmuch as they were the only people who were likely to prosecute, that is a pretty strong consideration leading him to agree to this, because by so doing he would get rid of the criminal proceedings. It is quite true that under section 232, sub-section 1, all that the owners of The Saxony would get would be the 15s. 3d., but it is also clear that if proceedings were taken under section 221 nothing could prevent the magistrate, if he thought right, from forfeiting the whole of the seaman's wages. Therefore the bargain is one by which he gets rid of the liability to criminal proceedings, which might result in a fine or the forfeiture of the whole of his wages. I think, therefore, the superintendent was justified in refusing to be present when the wages were paid under such circumstances; it is plain his functions under the Act are much more than merely to be present; they are of a different character to that. For these reasons I agree with the magistrate in the decision which he has arrived at.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the magistrate was quite right in saying that a forfeiture for desertion of any part of a seaman's wages must be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, and cannot be the subject of private arrangement. It is clear that these provisions as to forfeiture are in the nature of criminal proceedings. The forfeiture is a penalty according to the section, and it speaks about the offence, and so on. There can be no doubt about that part of the case. There can be equally no doubt that the private arrangement which was come to in this case was in the nature of an arrangement with respect to forfeiture of the seaman's wages. The document refers to that, and it refers not only to the wages earned in the first ship, but to those earned subsequently, and it asks the owners of The Urmston Grange if the man does not agree to the compromise to retain all his wages earned in the second ship.

The result, therefore, is, that it is an arrangement settling what is to be done with respect to that claim for forfeiture, though, no doubt, the seaman fully knew what he was doing.

As to the case which might arise, although it would not be so effective—namely, the Shipping Federation sending to the master of the second ship a notice to the effect that the seaman has committed a breach of contract, and would be liable to be sued in the county court, and requesting the seaman to agree that those damages should be deducted from his wages, I do not think it would be right for the court to express any opinion. All we do say is, it would be a very different case to the present.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Botterell & Roche.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) Oct. 28.

CHESTERFIELD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. NEWTON AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Extraordinary expenses of repairing highway—Action in High Court—Sum not exceeding £250 recovered—High Court costs—Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12, sub-section 1 (a).

By section 12, sub-section 1 (a), of the Locomotives Act, 1898, extraordinary expenses incurred in repairing a highway are not recoverable in a summary manner, but "may be recovered, if not exceeding £250, in the county court, and if exceeding that sum, in the High Court."

A local authority brought an action in the High Court to recover a sum exceeding £250 for extraordinary expenses in repairing a highway. At the trial the jury awarded a sum of £60, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs, with costs. The master taxed the plaintiffs' costs upon the High Court scale, and the judge at chambers refused to direct a review of taxation.

Held, that the High Court had jurisdiction to entertain the action, and as the trial was with a jury the costs followed the event, and the plaintiffs were entitled to High Court costs.

Appeal from an order of Walton, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs brought an action in the King's Bench Division against three defendants to recover the sum of £732 for extraordinary expenses alleged to have been incurred in respect of the repair of a highway owing to the damage caused to it by extraordinary traffic conducted by the defendants along it. In the statement of claim the sum claimed as against the defendant Newton was £634, and the balance against the other two defendants. These latter defendants settled with the plaintiffs, and the action proceeded as against Newton. At the trial, before Ridley, J., and a jury, the jury found that the weight was excessive and the traffic extraordinary, and they assessed the expenses at £120. Of this sum it was agreed that £60 was attributable to the traffic belonging to the defendant Newton, and judgment was entered for the plaintiffs against him for that sum with costs, the learned judge certifying for costs upon the High Court scale if it were necessary for him to do so. Upon the taxation the master taxed the plaintiffs' costs upon the High Court scale, and Walton, J., refused to direct a review of taxation. The defendant Newton appealed.

By section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, "where by the certificate of their surveyor it appears to the authority which is liable or has undertaken to repair any highway, whether a main road or not, that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same, or extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover in a summary manner" the amount of such expenses.

By section 12, sub-section 1, of the Locomotives Act, 1898, "Section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (which relates to the recovery of expenses of extraordinary traffic) shall be amended as follows: (a) Expenses under that section shall cease to be recoverable in a summary manner, but may be recovered if not exceeding £250 in the county court, and if exceeding that sum in the High Court."

G. A. Bonner (Hugo Young, K.C., with him), for the defendant Newton.—The judge at the trial has no power, when £250 or under is recovered, to award costs upon the High Court scale. Section 12, sub-section 1 (a), of the Locomotives Act, 1898, gives the county court exclusive jurisdiction up to £250. The words "may be recovered" mean "must be recovered." The right of a plaintiff to costs depends upon the amount recovered, not upon the amount claimed: Solomon v. Mulliner, 49 W. R. 364, [1901] 1 K. B. 76. This is not an action of tort within section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and that section does not apply to such a claim. The action is founded upon a statute. The user of the highway was not wrongful. The user was a lawful user subject to the statutory obligation to pay for the damage done to it.

Etherington Smith and T. H. Walker, for the plaintiffs.—The judge at the trial gave judgment for the plaintiffs "with costs"; and, apart from the certificate, the plaintiffs were entitled to costs upon the High Court scale. By ord. 65, r. 1, the action having been tried with a jury, the costs follow the event unless "good cause" is shown to deprive the plaintiffs of costs. No good cause was shown here. Nor is there any Act or rule to the contrary. Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not apply, because even if this was an action of tort, the amount recovered was not less than £20. There is no other statute that could be said to apply. The mere fact that the action might have been commenced in the county court does not of itself, apart from section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, affect the right to costs. The Locomotives Act, 1898, is silent as to costs. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to High Court costs. This is not like an ordinary action, as the local authority had to act upon the certificate of their surveyor and bring an action for the amount certified by him.

They also referred to section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890.

Bonner replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal fails. The action was brought by a local authority under section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, to recover the amount of certain extraordinary expenses incurred in repairing the damage done to a highway owing to the defendants sending extraordinary traffic along it. The main provisions of that section stand, but the remedy is dealt with by section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, which by sub-section 1 (a) provides that the expenses under section 23 of the Act of 1878 shall cease to be recoverable in a summary manner, but may be recovered if not exceeding £250 in the county court, and if exceeding that sum in the High Court. As has been pointed out in the course of the argument, the certificate of the surveyor is a condition precedent to the bringing of the action, and the certificate of the surveyor, as a matter of fact, stated the amount of the expenses at £732. In these circumstances this action was brought to recover that amount. The jury fixed the amount at £120, and by agreement, of this sum £60 was apportioned as payable by the defendant Newton. The learned judge accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £60 as against Newton with costs, and gave a certificate for High Court costs in case it was necessary. The costs were accordingly taxed on the High Court scale, and the judge at chambers refused to direct a review of taxation. The defendant appeals here.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is said that the judge at the trial had only jurisdiction to award county court costs upon the ground that section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, provides that expenses under section 23 of the Act of 1878 "may be recovered if not exceeding £250 in the county court, and if exceeding that sum in the High Court." The argument is that the word "may" there means "must," and as the amount recovered did not exceed £250, though the claim exceded £700, the action could only have been brought in the county court, and the only costs recoverable were county court costs. It seems to me to be clear that this is an action which, under section 12 of the Act of 1898, could have been brought in the county court. It seems to me to be equally clear that this is an action which the High Court had jurisdiction to entertain. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the case falls within ord. 65, r. 1, that the action was one which the High Court had jurisdiction to entertain, and that, as it was tried with a jury, the costs must follow the event unless good cause be shown for depriving the plaintiffs of costs. This action, as I have said, might have been brought in the county court, the amount recovered not exceeding £250, but it is said that, apart from special legislation, that option cannot affect the right of the plaintiffs to costs when the action is brought in the High Court. In support of that argument the instance was given of an action of tort where a sum between £20 and £50 is recovered, which might have been brought in the county court, and yet the plaintiff would get High Court costs. It is clear that the fact that an action could have been brought in the county court does not affect the right to costs unless there is some special legislation dealing with costs in such a case. The only special legislation referred to is section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. That section obviously has no application to this case because the amount recovered exceeds the limits specified in that section. But assuming that the case, as regards amount, comes within section 116, then the act complained of either is not a tort, in which case it stands outside section 116, or it is a tortious act because it is extravagant, unreasonable, and excessive, in which case it comes within section 116, and the learned judge has exercised the discretion conferred upon him by that section and has given a certificate for High Court costs. In either view the plaintiffs are entitled to High Court costs. The costs must, by ord. 65, r. 1, follow the event, and there is no statutory provision disentitling the plaintiffs to High Court costs. With reference to section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, that section seems to me to have no application. The provisions of that section are subject to the Judicature Acts and rules of court, and, as this case was tried with a jury, ord. 65, r. 1, applies and deals with the costs.

For these reasons I think that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stevens, Sons, & Parkes, for Jones & Middleton, Chesterfield.

Solicitors for the defendant, Stanley Evans & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.JJ.) } July 29, 1903.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN STONE AND HASTIE. (a.)

Metropolis—Building—Raising party-wall by building owner—Lease of premises—Subsequent user of raised party-wall by adjoining owner—Right of lessee to proportion of expense of raising wall—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 88-95.

The owner of a house in London, acting under the powers of the London Building Act, 1894, raised at his own expense the party-wall separating that house from the adjoining one. Subsequently he granted a lease of the house to the appellant for twenty-one years. The respondent, who was the owner of the adjoining house, being desirous of rebuilding the house, served notice on the appellant of the work which he proposed to execute, and which included the use of the raised party-wall beyond the use thereof made by him before the alteration. The appellant did not express his consent to the notice, and the matters in difference were thereupon referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The appellant claimed (inter alia), under section 95, sub-section 2, of the Act, a proportion of the original expense of raising the party-wall, such claim being made in respect of the increased user thereof by the respondent. The arbitrators awarded the appellant a sum of money in respect of this claim.

Held, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to entertain the claim, as the Act only contemplated a proportion of the original expense of raising the party-wall being paid to the person who actually incurred the expense, and not to a person who became tenant after the expense had been incurred.

Appeal from an order of Walton, J., at chambers, upon an application under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for leave to enforce an award made under the London Building Act, 1894.

On the 24th of June, 1897, the appellant Hastie took a lease of 17, Queen-street, Mayfair, from certain trustees for a term of 21 years at a rent of £300 a year. Before the date of the lease the trustees had at their own expense, under the powers of the London Building Act, 1894, raised the party-wall between 16 and 17, Queen-street, for the purpose of building new rooms at the back of No. 17. The trustees were not the owners of No. 16. Subsequently the respondent Stone acquired a long lease of 16, Queen-street, and being desirous of building upon the premises he served notice upon the appellant, under section 90 of the London Building Act, 1894, of his intention to do certain works, particulars of which were stated, and which involved the rebuilding of No. 16 and the use of the party-wall beyond the use which had been made of it by the owners of No. 16 before it was raised by the trustees. The appellant did not within fourteen days express his consent to the notice—that is to say, to the execution of the works, and therefore by virtue of section 90, sub-section 7, of the London Building Act, 1894, he was taken to have dissented therefrom, and a difference was deemed to have arisen between the appellant and the respondent. Each party thereupon appointed a surveyor under section 91 of the Act to settle the matter in difference, and the two surveyors appointed a third surveyor. The appellant made two claims against the respondent: (1) For damage to No. 17 by and during the building operations; and (2) for a proportion of the cost of raising the party-wall, this latter claim being made in respect of the extra use made by the respondent of the party-wall beyond the use made of it before it was raised by the trustees. Upon the 25th of April, 1903, the surveyors made an award, in which all three concurred, as follows: "(1) That the sum of £18 be immediately paid by the building owner (the respondent) to the adjoining owner (the appellant) in full discharge of all damage caused to the premises of the adjoining owner by reason of the works in connection with the new buildings. (2) That the sum of £38 10s. 6d. be paid by the building owner to the said adjoining owner in payment of the extra use made of the said wall as a party-wall for the new building in excess of the portion previously used as a party-wall for the old buildings formerly occupying the site of No. 16, Queen-street. (3) That the costs of this award, together with a sum of ten guineas towards the fees of the surveyor to the adjoining owner, and the fees of the third surveyor amounting to eight guineas shall be paid by the building owner, who shall also pay the fees of his surveyor."

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 22nd of May the appellant took up the award, and after the expiration of fourteen days from that date (within which time either party could have appealed from the award to the county court under section 91, sub-section 2, of the Act, but no appeal was brought) the appellant took out a summons at chambers under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for leave to enforce the award. It appeared that the trustees had made a claim upon the respondent in respect of the increased user of the party-wall, but it did not appear when the claim was made.

The master made an order giving leave to enforce the award. The respondent appealed to the judge at chambers from that order, contending that in awarding any sum in respect of item (2) in the award the arbitrators had acted without jurisdiction, and the learned judge was invited by both parties to decide the question whether or not the award was, as to the £38 10s. 6d. in item (2), ultra vires and void. There was no dispute as to items (1) and (3) of the award.

Walton, J., held that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction under the Act to award to the appellant a contribution towards the expense of raising the party-wall, where the trustees had not assigned to the appellant their right to recover from the owners of No. 16 a proportion of the expense incurred by them in raising the party-wall—there being nothing, he said, in the Act which made the award binding on the trustees. He accordingly held that the award was ultra vires as to the item of £38 10s. 6d., and as the respondent had offered to pay the amounts awarded other than the sum of £38 10s. 6d., he made an order that all proceedings on the award should be stayed upon payment by the respondent to the appellant of the amounts admitted to be due.

Hastie appealed.

July 28.—E. W. Hansell, for the appellant.

Clavell Salter, for the respondent.

July 29.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Walton, J., upon a question arising between two occupiers of adjoining houses with regard to the expenses incident to the operations in connection with a party-wall. The appellant Hastie is tenant for twenty-one years of 17, Queen-street, Mayfair. His lessors, who are trustees, and who are the owners of a long lease of the premises, had before the lease to Hastie made certain alterations in the party-wall separating No. 17 from No. 16. These alterations embraced the raising of the party-wall to a considerable height above its original height. After the lease to Hastie the respondent Stone acquired a long lease of the adjoining house, No. 16, and he began building operations, practically pulling down No. 16 and rebuilding it to a height above its original height. This involved an increased user of the raised party-wall built by Hastie's lessors.

Now there are provisions in the London Building Act, 1894, specifying the rights of the parties as to the user of a party-wall, and those provisions include the case of one owner raising the party-wall for his own benefit alone at a time when the adjoining owner may not contemplate the user of the raised portion of the wall. The Act also contains provisions to meet the case of the adjoining owner subsequently using the portion of the wall so raised, such provisions dealing with the question as to what proportion of the expense of building it up to its increased height shall be borne by the adjoining owner, who is then about to make use of the increased height of the party-wall. In the present case Stone, in carrying out his building operations, had to interfere with and make use of the party-wall, both the old part and the added part. The scheme of the Act seems to me to be to lay down a code as to what the two adjoining owners may do with respect to the party-wall which separate their two houses. There are things which the building owner may do, and there are reciprocal rights conferred upon the adjoining owner, and there are provisions for each giving certain notices, the one of what he proposes to do, and the other of what he claims to have done. Then there are provisions for the settlement of disputes by arbitration. Those are provisions for adjusting the rights of the parties where there is an interference or proposed interference with the party-wall. That is one set of provisions. Another set of provisions deals with the rights of building owners inter se where certain works are undertaken for the joint benefit and at the joint expense of both. There are provisions as to each bearing part of the expense, and as to what each may do. Where an owner has for his own benefit added to the height of the party-wall, it is obviously convenient that he should bear the whole of the expense, at any rate, in the first instance, and that, if afterwards the adjoining owner makes use of the increased height of the wall, it is right that he should contribute towards the expense. That is a totally distinct and parallel set of provisions, and those provisions are not covered by the earlier provisions dealing with the case where one owner builds and the other has reciprocal rights conferred upon him.

The question which we have to consider is, what rights these two persons respectively have, in view of the fact that the house of which Hastie is the tenant is next to the house where the building operations are going on. That is provided for by the first set of sections. Notices were given by Stone, and as Hastie did not consent thereto, he must, by section 90, sub-section 7, of the Act, be taken to have dissented therefrom. A dispute thus arose, and the jurisdiction of the arbitrators was let in. They had, however, no jurisdiction to deal with anything beyond what was so submitted to them, and the sections do not contemplate their having any jurisdiction to deal with the initial expense of raising the party-wall. The arbitrators, in their award, have included a claim made by Hastie for a proportion of the expense of building the enhanced party-wall by his lessors, an expense with which he himself had nothing to do. Stone objected to the claim, and contended that it was outside the scope of the reference; that his obligation was, not to Hastie, but to Hastie's lessors; and that, therefore, the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to award any sum in respect thereof. That is the point. Hastie having taken steps to enforce the award, Walton, J., by invitation of the parties, determined the question whether the arbitrators had jurisdiction. The learned judge, in a very clear and careful judgment, held that they had not. Against that decision the present appeal is brought.

I will now shortly go through the material sections of the London Building Act, 1894. Section 87 deals with the rights of owners of adjoining lands respecting the erection of walls on the line of junction. Section 88 deals with the rights of building owners, and section 89 with the rights of adjoining owners. Section 90 specifies the rules as to the exercise of rights by building and adjoining owners. That section deals with the giving of notices and requisitions by the building owner and adjoining owner respectively. Section 91 deals with the settlement of differences between the building and adjoining owners by arbitration, and sub-section 2 provides that the award shall be conclusive and shall not be questioned in any court, with this exception, that either of the parties may appeal therefrom to the county court within fourteen days from the date of the delivery of the award. That provision gives rise to one of the contentions here. It is not necessary to refer particularly to sections 92, 93, and 94. There are next a series of provisions dealing with the case of a party-wall being built or raised by one owner and the other owner not using it at the time, but doing so subsequently. Section 95 is the section which raises the main point. That section provides that if at any time the adjoining owner make use of any party structure or external wall (or any part thereof) raised or underpinned as aforesaid, beyond the use thereof made by him before the alteration, there shall be borne by the adjoining owner from time to time a due proportion of the expenses, having regard to the use that the adjoining owner may make thereof, of raising or underpinning it. Those expenses are, by the terms of the Act, to be borne by the building owner when raising the party-wall, an operation which will give the adjoining owner the opportunity at a future time of making use of that addition to the party-wall, the adjoining owner not being desirous of doing so at the time of the building, and therefore not being called upon at that time to contribute towards the expense. The section gives a right to recoupment in such a case. To whom is the recoupment to be made? Clearly the Act contemplates recoupment to the person who has incurred the expense. There is no provision which, in terms, seems to contemplate that a person who becomes a tenant after the works are completed should recover any part of the expense. There is another section which points in the same direction. Section 99 provides that where the adjoining owner is liable to contribute to the expenses of building any party structure, until such contribution is paid the building owner at whose expense the same was built shall stand possessed of the sole property in the structure. So that the property in the party structure is placed in the building owner who has built it, and his tenant acquires no property in it at all. Obviously the scheme of the Act is to recoup the person at whose expense the party-wall is raised, and not anyone else. It seems to me that the tenant would have as much right to ask to be recouped part of the expense of building the old party-wall as to ask for part of the expense of raising the party-wall. The scheme of the Act is to regulate the rights of adjoining owners at the time when the party-wall is raised, and the Act has narrowed the matters in dispute in the arbitration to the statutory differences, which do not include the claim of the tenant to any part of the expense of raising the height of the party-wall. The arbitrators, therefore, had no jurisdiction to include it, and the learned judge was right in holding that they had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The definition of owner in section 5, sub-sections 29, 32, treats the term as applicable to owner in the ordinary sense and to occupying tenant other than a tenant from year to year or a tenant at will. It is not disputed that under section 90, which refers to occupiers, Hastie is entitled to the sum of £18 which the arbitrators have assessed as compensation for the loss sustained by him by the alterations made by Stone in the party-wall. It is said that Hastie is further entitled to compensation for the additional use of the party-wall. The argument was this: The lessors of Hastie would be, if they were in possession, entitled to claim compensation for the additional burden upon their estate consequent upon the raising of the party-wall. The land upon which half the party-wall stands has more to bear, and for this, which is in the nature of an easement, the owner, it is argued, should be paid by Stone; but as the land is let to Hastie, it is said that he is entitled to share in the compensation, and that the arbitrators have finally fixed what his share in money should be—viz., £38 10s. 6d. Now, it may be questioned whether the trustees are entitled to any compensation from Stone. An examination of the sections as to the rights of building and adjoining owners would seem to show that merely raising a wall may not be provided for. But assuming there would be a right upon user to compensation in the owner, the statute contains no provision transferring the whole or any part of the right to his tenant. It is difficult to see how the value of the tenant's supposed share could be estimated in money. If the party-wall be properly raised, the tenant is in no worse position than if it had not been altered. There is no good reason for supposing that the Legislature intended to recognize any such right in a tenant. According to the argument, this right would be possessed by any tenant who held for more than a year, a result which would seem to be altogether unreasonable. For these reasons, I concur in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Hasties.

Solicitors for the respondent, Le Brasseur & Oakley, for Stone, King, Stone, & Thomas, Bath.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — July 9, 10, 1903.

"THE CAYO BONITO." (a.)

Ship — Collision — Compulsory pilotage — London district—"Constant trader"—Pilotage Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), s. 59—Order in Council, 18*th of February,* 1854—Merchant Shipping Act. 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 353, 379—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 603, 625.

The Order in Council of the 18*th of February,* 1854, extending the exemptions from compulsory pilotage contained in section 59 of the Pilotage Act, 1825, has not been repealed by the subsequent Merchant Shipping Acts.

To entitle a vessel to come within the exemptions from compulsory pilotage given by the above Order in Council it is not necessary that she should be a "constant trader" to the ports or countries mentioned therein. In order to constitute a vessel a "constant trader" to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic it is not necessary that she should trade exclusively to ports within those limits.

The defendants, a British steamship company, ran a line of steamers from London viâ Antwerp to America and back. A new vessel belonging to them was on her second voyage from London viâ Antwerp to certain Mexican ports, carrying a general cargo and one passenger, when she came into collision in the estuary of the Thames with a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs. At the time of the collision the defendants' steamer was carrying a duly licensed Trinity House pilot. In an action of damage brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, in which the latter pleaded compulsory pilotage, their pilot was found alone to blame.

Held, affirming the decision of Barnes, J. ([1902] P. 216), that the defendants were liable as their vessel was exempt from compulsory pilotage as she was a "constant trader" within the exemptions contained in section 59 of the Pilotage Act, 1825, which was supplemented by the above Order in Council and kept alive by section 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, for which is now substituted section 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Earl of Auckland, 10 W. R. 124, 15 Moo. P. C. 304, held binding and followed.

This was an appeal by the defendants against a decision of Barnes, J. ([1902] P. 216), the question raised being the meaning to be attached to the words "constant trader" in the statutory exemptions from compulsory pilotage in the London district.

The action was one of damage by collision.

The plaintiffs were the owners of The British Prince; the defendants were the owners of The Cayo Bonito.

On the 8th of February, 1902, The British Prince, a steamship on a voyage from New York to London and Antwerp, carrying a general cargo, cattle, horses, cattlemen, a crew, and a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, came into collision, when in the estuary of the Thames, with The Cayo Bonito, a new steamship belonging to the port of London, and owned by the defendants, who run a line of steamers from London viâ Antwerp to America and back.

At the time of the collision The Cayo Bonito had already made one voyage from London viâ Antwerp to certain Mexican ports, and was then proceeding on a second voyage from London to Coatzocoalcos in Mexico viâ Antwerp, Havana, and Vera Cruz with a part cargo of 800 tons, one passenger, and a duly licensed Trinity House pilot.

Both vessels sustained considerable damage. The defendants in their defence to the action pleaded in the alternative that "if the said collision was caused or contributed to by any of those on board The Cayo Bonito, which they deny, it was solely caused or contributed to by the neglect or default of a qualified pilot, who was then in charge of The Cayo Bonito, and whose employment by the defendants was compulsory by law, and for whose acts, neglects, or defaults the defendants were not liable."

At the trial of the action on the 25th of March, 1902, it was found by Gorell Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that the pilot of The Cayo Bonito was alone to blame for the collision, and the question of law whether the pilotage was compulsory was reserved.

On the 19th of June, 1902, after argument and further evidence, the learned judge in a considered judgment held that the defendants were liable as their vessel was exempt from compulsory pilotage, being a "constant trader" between London and ports on the continent north of Brest, within the meaning of the exemption in section 59 of the Pilotage Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), supplemented by an Order in Council, dated the 18th of February, 1854, and kept alive by section 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 622, provides that "Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and the exemptions under this part of this Act, pilotage shall be compulsory within the London district, and the Trinity House outport districts."

The Pilotage Act, 1825, s. 59, provides that "notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the master of any collier or of any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards, from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers and coming up either by the north channel, but not otherwise), or of any Irish trader using the navigation of the Rivers Thames and Medway, or of any ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, or of any ship or vessel wholly laden with stone from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, and being the production thereof, or of any ship or vessel not exceeding the burthen of 60 tons and having a British register, except as hereinafter provided . . . shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same, without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other person or persons than the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel."

By an Order in Council, dated the 18th of February, 1854, it is provided as follows: "The masters of the undermentioned ships and vessels shall, subject to the provision contained in the fifty-ninth section of the Act of Parliament 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in respect of the employment of unlicensed persons, be exempted from compulsory pilotage—viz.: Of ships and vessels trading to Norway or to the Cattegat, or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when coming up by the south channels; of ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south channels; of ships and vessels passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages from one port to another port, and not being bound to any port or place within such limits nor anchoring therein."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, it is provided: "(1) Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from that compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force."

Asquith, K.C. (Laing, K.C., and Balloch with him), for the appellants.—The decision of the learned judge in the court below is wrong—firstly, because the Order in Council of 1854 is no longer in force; and, secondly, because even if it be assumed that the exemption provided for in that order still exists The Cayo Bonito does not come within that exemption. As regards the Order in Council, the whole system of pilotage, as consolidated by the Pilotage Act of 1825, has been replaced by a different system by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which repealed the Act of 1825 together with section 21 of the Pilotage Act of 1853, under the authority of which section the Order in Council was made. Reg. v. Stanton, 8 E. & B. 445, and The Earl of Auckland, 10 W. R. 124, 15 Moo. P. C. 304, which are relied upon as decisions in favour of the contention that the Order in Council is still in force, are wrong. The decision in Reg. v. Stanton has been distinguished in The Temora, Lush 17, where a vessel was held bound to employ a pilot under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 whilst carrying passengers from London to Belfast. In that case the statute was rightly interpreted. Section 379 of that Act repealed all previous legislation so far as regards the Trinity House districts, and provided for the exemption of certain vessels, except when carrying passengers. Pilotage in the Trinity House districts was, therefore, clearly compulsory in the case of The Cayo Bonito, and, therefore, her owners are not liable. Assuming, however, that the exemption in the Order in Council still exists, nevertheless The Cayo Bonito does not fall within that exemption. On the facts of the case it is clear that this vessel does not come within the term "constant trader." This was only her second voyage and her main business was to carry goods to America. She cannot, therefore, be deemed to have been a constant trader to Antwerp. She was not a "constant trader" between Boulogne and the Baltic within the exemption. To be so her termini must be, one in the United Kingdom, and the other a port between Boulogne and the Baltic. Courtney v. Cole, 36 W. R. 8, 19 Q. B. D. 447, is not applicable to the present case, as in that case the vessel was not carrying passengers. The above case, and that of The Rutland, 45 W. R. 38, and on appeal, ib. Dig. 154, [1897] A. C. 333, do not determine the question as to what is a "constant trader."

Aspinall, K.C. (Dawson Millar with him), for the respondents.—The judgment of the learned judge below is right. The exemptions given by section 59 of the Pilotage Act, 1825, and the Order in Council are still in force. The language of section 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, was repeated in section 603 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, thus recognizing the view laid down in The Earl of Auckland. That case was decided so long ago as 1862 by the then final appellate tribunal in Admiralty, and this court will not overrule that decision. The Act of 1894 keeps alive all the old exemptions from pilotage, and although the Pilotage Act of 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 61) removed exemptions in certain cases, it affirmed the exemptions under the Pilotage Act of 1825 and the Order in Council. If that Act and Order are still in force, then The Cayo Bonito was clearly a ship trading between Boulogne and the Baltic. As regards the question of constant trading, The Cayo Bonito was a "constant trader" between London and Antwerp. It cannot be said that a new vessel on a regular line between certain ports is not a "constant trader" because she has only made one voyage. It is clear she was trading between Boulogne and the Baltic. One must look at the particular act of trading and the intention of the owner. It is not necessary to read in the word "constant." Courtney v. Cole and The Rutland cover this case in respect of the meaning to be attached to the word "trading." If, however, it is necessary to bring in the word "constant," then in the language of the learned judge below, The Cayo Bonito is included, for these words he says "are used in a business sense of a vessel which is regularly engaged in the trade, but not so absolutely constantly going backwards and forwards that there is never any possible departure from that going backwards and forwards between the Continent and London." The judgment below was right and should be upheld.

Asquith, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Gorell Barnes, J., who has held in the case of a collision between The British Prince and The Cayo Bonito that The Cayo Bonito was in charge of a pilot, and that the collision was entirely due to the negligence of the pilot; and that raises a question whether or not the pilotage was compulsory. If pilotage was compulsory the owners are not liable; and, therefore, the question which was argued in the court below, and which is raised again in this appeal, is whether or not pilotage was compulsory. The learned judge, after very careful consideration, and very elaborate examination of the statutes and authorities bearing on the matter, has come to the conclusion that the pilotage was not compulsory, and therefore finds that the owners are liable for the consequences of the collision. Now, the case, on the face of it, turns apparently on an examination of the authorities. The judgment of Gorell Barnes, J., which was one of very great elaboration, has been narrowed down for us by the very able and concise arguments which have been addressed to us on both sides in this case, and I do not propose therefore, for my part, to enter upon a discussion on the many points upon which Gorell Barnes, J., with great advantage and assistance to the court, embarked; because the matter has now been narrowed down, and it would be impertinence on my part, therefore, to go over again much of what Gorell Barnes, J., has already fully examined. There is no doubt whatever that primâ facie pilotage is compulsory in these waters. That, as was pointed out by Gorell Barnes, J., is expressly provided by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 603, subject to any alteration made by the Board of Trade or any pilotage authority in pursuance of powers conferred upon them. That section provided that "The employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in any district where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act." That brings us to the question whether it was or was not compulsory under the circumstances of this case; and that takes us back to section 59 of the Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125). I do not think I need go behind that Act, which was a consolidating Act. Now, the vessel in question was upon a voyage which is described in the judgment of Gorell Barnes, J., in these words. He says: "She was a vessel of 3,401 tons register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from London to Antwerp, and then from Antwerp to Coatzacoalcos, in Mexico, with about 400 tons of cargo and one passenger, and it was in the course of the voyage from London to Antwerp that the collision between her and The British Prince took place." Now, by section 59 of 6 Geo. 4, s. 125, the masters of the following vessels are exempt from compulsory pilotage, namely: "The master of any collier, or of any ship or vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards, from the ports between Boulogne inclusive, and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers) . . . or any ship or vessel employed in the coasting trade of the kingdom . . . ." After that statute there was another of 1853, and it was in pursuance of that Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, s. 21, that the Order in Council was made. That Act was one enabling the proper authority, by Order in Council, to enlarge the exemptions at that time existing, and accordingly the Order in Council was made consolidating the regulations for the exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing under the provisions of section 59 of the 6th Geo. 4, and that order contains two paragraphs. First there is the exemption from compulsory pilotage of ships and vessels trading to Norway and the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, when going up by either channels. That is an exemption including the south as well as the north channel. The second paragraph extended the exemption to ships and vessels trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south passages. Thus were added outward to inward, and south to north channels, and that is the joint result of the statute and the Order in Council. If that exemption exists still, notwithstanding the subsequent legislation, it would cover the case of a vessel which could bring itself within its terms. In this case, subject to questions of fact, the contention is that the voyage was one within the meaning of the terms "vessels trading between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages and when going up the south passages." Now, this vessel was undoubtedly engaged in a passage from London to Antwerp. She proposed to do a great deal more when she got to Antwerp, but the question is whether the exemptions included such a voyage under such conditions as we have here, and, if so, has the exemption granted by the Act of George IV. and the Order in Council been preserved, or has it been annulled? The argument for the defendants here is that the subsequent statute—the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104)—did, in point of fact, abolish that exemption and substitute other enactments in its place. Now that argument, I think, would have been a very powerful one if it had not, as it has, in my opinion, been precluded by authority. It is strongly argued that the exemption is preserved in the 353rd section, in these terms: "Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before this Act comes into operation, and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force." That primâ facie contains certain exemptions from compulsory pilotage, and it is headed by the words "Compulsory Pilotage: General." But that is followed by another group of sections, 376 to 379, headed "Compulsory Pilotage: Trinity House," and Mr. Asquith, in a very able argument, has pointed out that the 379th section of that statute included, in fact in terms, the very same provisions that are contained in the 59th section of the earlier Act constituting the exemptions; that they are re-enacted, but re-enacted with a difference, and the section limits the exemptions to the cases of ships not carrying passengers, whereas the former exemption in the earlier statute did not contain that condition. He puts to us a very powerful argument as to whether you can in one and the same statute have a provision which puts vessels carrying passengers outside the exemption, and a subsequent provision which re-enacts the provisions then existing. That is a very strong argument, and one very well worthy of consideration if it had not already been discussed and decided, as it seems to me, first of all in the case of Reg. v. Stanton, which decided that the two were not incompatible, and that the earlier provision of exemption did continue to exist in a vessel that was carrying passengers. That decision was adopted and followed, in a case absolutely on all fours with this one, namely, the case of The Earl of Auckland which was confirmed on appeal to the Privy Council. That was as far as back as 1862; and even if that decision of the Privy Council, being as it was then the final Court of Appeal having jurisdiction in Admiralty matters, is not in the strictest sense binding upon us, yet after this interval of time, it being the decision of the very highest authority at the time, I do not think we should be at liberty to depart from it. It seems to me it is, in fact, binding upon us. It is not necessary absolutely to decide whether it is, formally and technically, binding upon us, in the same sense as a decision in the House of Lords would be, though my impression is that it is, and when the position is that the law has been declared by the highest tribunal more than forty years ago, and has been acted upon since, I do not think we should be justified in departing from it. But it does not rest there. The later statute of 1897 has, I think, practically put its imprimatur upon the view taken in those cases—that is to say, it has adopted the view that the earlier exemptions and those in the Order in Council are in existence, and treats them as still in existence, though to a certain extent modified.

Accordingly I think that with regard to the main point of the argument, the authorities, followed by the Legislature, have decided against Mr. Asquith's contention; that is to say, that notwithstanding subsequent legislation, the earlier exemptions and the exemptions of the Order in Council based upon the 59th section of the Act of 1854 still exist, as regards the question, partly of fact and partly of law, whether this particular vessel comes within that exemption. Mr. Asquith, in arguing to the contrary, is obliged to contend that the exemption does not extend to the case unless the ship can be described as a "constant trader," and he says that the exemption referring to that condition was not applicable in this case, because this particular vessel had only made one voyage, and she was beginning the second at the time when she came into collision, and therefore he says it cannot be said that such a vessel was a "constant trader." He also raises other points—whether, for instance, she was a trader at all in the sense of the exemption; but that is the main point, and it rests upon this: In the 59th section of the Act of George IV. are these words: "Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the master of any collier, or of any ship or vessel, trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic" shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage. Now it is said that that provision in favour of the constant trader is really the same provision which was adopted, with certain enlargements, in the Order in Council; that in the two paragraphs of the Order in Council ships and vessels constantly trading is meant; and that that meaning is to be imported into the words of this Order in Council, although the words are not in terms expressed in it; and Mr. Asquith bases that contention on the authority of the case of The Vesta, 30 W. R. 705, 7 P. D. 240, decided by Sir Robert Phillimore in the Admiralty Court. That case, however, was not decided in respect of these very words, but on the question whether or not foreign vessels were to be considered as embraced in the terms "ships or vessels"; and Sir Robert Phillimore held that in the words "ships or vessels" foreign vessels ought not to be embraced, because they were expressly excluded by section 59 of the statute, and the Order in Council could not be taken by simply omitting the words to have the effect sought to be given to it. Mr. Asquith presses the argument, and he says it is strictly analogous to the point before us. It seems to me that there is a good deal to be said in favour of his view that the ratio decidendi is analogous; but I think myself that we are not bound to apply it here, because this is really a different case. The case before Sir Robert Phillimore was certainly a case carrying much larger consequences than are likely to follow upon the decision of such a case as this. It was a matter of large policy, whether foreign vessels should be embraced within the order, thus extending the earlier section, which was specially limited to British vessels. It was thought that to extend the decision of the Legislature in that particular direction simply because it had used the words "ships or vessels," without confining them to British vessels, would be a large and impolitic extension, and one that ought not to be used without more solid grounds. I do not think that the grounds which weighed with Sir Robert Phillimore apply in such a case as this. Whether that be so or not, Barnes, J., has found in this case that if "constant trader" was a condition, that condition has been fulfilled, because, he says—and I agree with him—that you must not measure the question whether the vessel is a constant trader by the particular facts of one particular voyage of that vessel, but you must regard the matter from a business point of view. Take the case of a line of vessels trading constantly between London and New York. A new vessel is put on for the first time. You cannot say that that vessel is not a constant trader simply because it has not made the voyage before. It seems to me clear, as the learned judge in the court below has found, that you must look to what is the purpose for which this vessel was put on, and how it is going to trade, unless something occurs to put an end to it. Possibly it is put on as an instrument for carrying on the same trade then being carried on by other vessels; and if you find there is a line established trading with Antwerp, and that a particular vessel is put on and makes one voyage to and from Antwerp, it seems to me that the inference in respect to that is that it is a constant trader, and is intended to be a constant trader, within the meaning of these words.

That brings me to the last point, and that is whether a vessel which, like this, had gathered its cargo somewhere in the east, and had come with that cargo to London, and had there discharged the greater part of it, and had then gone on from London—taking in no cargo from London—had gone on taking what remained of her cargo to Antwerp—whether that can be said to be a vessel trading between London and Antwerp? I think there is a good deal to be said for the contention that a vessel cannot be said to be trading when it does not take any part—does not carry any trade between London and Antwerp. In this particular case the ship was taking cargo, but not cargo loaded in London for Antwerp; its object was to deliver the residue of the cargo taken on board at some remote point on the voyage. The argument raised here has, however, been concluded by authority. The very point was raised in the case of Courtney v. Cole, and decided in the first place by Lord Coleridge and A. L. Smith, J., as he then was. It was afterwards raised in another case, The Rutland, before Barnes, J., and ultimately went to the House of Lords, where, on facts practically indistinguishable from those in the present case, it was held that the fact that the vessel was not taking cargo out did not affect the question. In point of fact, the result of the two cases seems to be that when a vessel sails out on a particular adventure from London or elsewhere to successive ports, she is then, within the meaning of the words, trading with such ports. The only other point is, does the fact that the voyage to one of these ports is only, as it were, a step in a very much longer cruise make any difference? It seems to me that the authorities cover that as well as the other points, and that the only question which we have to consider is whether she is on a trading venture to one of the ports within the exemption. It seems to me that she was, and, therefore, on all the points raised in this case the judgment in the court below was right, and must be upheld.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The points which have been raised are concluded by authority. The first and most important point made by Mr. Asquith was that of exemption. That has been settled adversely to the contention of the appellants by the authorities which have been quoted by the Master of the Rolls. With reference to the question of fact, it seems to me that there was abundant evidence here to justify the conclusion that this vessel was a "constant trader" within the meaning of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, if it were necessary that that should be determined. I am of opinion that constant trading is not necessary, and that trading alone is sufficient here to exempt the vessel from compulsory pilotage. This vessel was in the early part of her career, and it is said that it is vain to contend that she was trading; but the facts established are these: That she was assigned to a line of steamers, her business was to take cargoes from a home port to a Continental port and then to continue her voyage. It seems to me absurd to insist that she must acquire the character of a constant trader by frequent voyages. Is is quite enough that she was intended by her owners to continue in a certain line. That is established here, and the conclusion of the learned judge is perfectly correct. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. The first and main point raised in the case, respecting the effect of the Order in Council regarding the exemptions from compulsory pilotage, was decided not only by the Court of Queen's Bench, but by the Privy Council, in the cases referred to. Now it may be that the decision of the Privy Council has not quite the same effect in an Admiralty appeal as a decision of the House of Lords; but the jurisdiction of the Privy Council in Admiralty appeals is, by section 18, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act of 1873, transferred to this Court of Appeal, and, putting it at the lowest, it seems to me that a decision of the Privy Council in a matter of this kind should be treated by us with at least the same amount of respect as a decision of the Exchequer Chamber would be in an appeal which had been brought before us from the Revenue. Whether it is technically and absolutely binding on this court or not, it does seem to me that it would be very wrong, after a lapse of forty years, for this court to attempt to reverse a decision of the Privy Council on a statute of this kind. But the matter really does not rest there, for I can see no answer whatever to the argument founded upon the statute of 1897. I think the declaration therein contained makes it plain that the Legislature regarded the exemptions by the statute of George IV., extended by the Order in Council, as in force at the date of the passing of that Act. That seems to me to be clear. Therefore I think that the main point of Mr. Asquith's argument fails. The second point is, What is trading? That has really been decided by the House of Lords in the cases cited. The third point is as to whether the word "constant" ought to be imported into the Order in Council from the statute of George IV.? It does not really arise here. I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and Mathew, L.J., that on the facts of the case we have here that which amounts to constant trading. But, further than that, I entirely share the view of Gorell Barnes, J., that there is no ground for importing the word "constant" into the Order in Council. The Order in Council was made in pursuance of an Act expressly authorizing the extension of the exemptions, and there is no reason whatever for holding that it did not extend the exemptions by omitting the word "constant" found in the earlier Act. I was not much impressed by the argument that the Legislature could not have intended this. All I can say is it is not for us to speculate upon the intentions of the Legislature, but simply to interpret as best we can and construe the language of the Acts.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the respondents, Thomas Cooper & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, Dickinson Hill, & Roberts, Liverpool.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — July 8, 1903.

SMITH v. BETTY. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Statute of Limitations—Lien—Set-off—Appropriation of payments.

In an action by a solicitor against his client on a bill of costs extending from 1878 to 1899, the defence of the Statute of Limitations was pleaded. At the trial the defence of the statute was held good as to all items before 1893, and the bill of costs was referred for taxation, the taxing-master to take the cash account from 1893, and the plaintiff to give credit for all sums received by him for or on account of the defendant in respect of or which ought to be treated as reducing or discharging, the bill so taxed. In the bill of costs there was an item of £66 3s. 8d. which the plaintiff had received for the defendant in May, 1894, in an action brought by the defendant in that year against a firm of Rigby & Co. Before the judgment in the present action no appropriation of this sum to the statute-barred items in the bill of costs had in fact been made; and no costs were due to the plaintiff in respect of the action against Rigby & Co. The taxing-master held that this sum was not received for or on account of the defendant in respect of, or which ought to be treated as reducing or discharging, the bill of costs; and that it ought to be treated as applied in payment of what was due to the plaintiff in May, 1894, in respect of the statute-barred items.

Held, that neither on the ground of lien, set-off, nor appropriation could this sum be applied in payment of what was due to the plaintiff in May, 1894, in respect of the statute-barred items.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of Wright, J., and a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

G. A. Scott, for the defendant.

Le Riche, for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8.—STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: This action was brought on the 25th of January, 1902, by the executor of the late Charles Thomas Foster, a solicitor, to recover a sum of £260 1s. 4d., claimed to be due in respect of a bill of costs for the period from the 13th of May, 1878, to the 6th of February, 1899, which bill, together with a cash account, was delivered to the defendant on the 2nd of December, 1899. By the defence the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3) was pleaded. The action came on for trial on the 19th of December, 1902, before Wright, J., who held that the defence of the Statute of Limitations was good as to all items in the bill of costs incurred previously to 1893,* and made an order in the following terms: "That the bill of costs on which this action is brought be referred to the taxing-master for taxation, and to take the cash account from 1893, and that the plaintiff should give credit for all sums of money received by him for or on account of the defendant, in respect of, or which ought to be treated as reducing or discharging, the bill of costs so taxed, and that the plaintiff be at liberty to sign judgment for the amount of the master's certificate in the said taxation." Upon the taxation, the defendant brought in a surcharge for a sum of £66 3s. 8d., consisting of £65 debt and £1 3s. 8d. interest, received by the deceased solicitor from the solicitors for a firm of Rigby & Co. on the 9th of May, 1894, in an action brought by the defendant against Messrs. Rigby & Co. It was admitted by the plaintiff that this surcharge was valid. It was at the same time admitted by the defendant that, although this sum did not appear in the cash account delivered on the 2nd of December, 1899, the omission was not intentional, but was simply due to some inadvertence on the part of the solicitor. The plaintiff claimed that this sum was not one which was received by the solicitor "for or on account of the defendant in respect of, or which ought to be treated as reducing or discharging, the bill of costs," under taxation; and that it ought to be treated as applied in payment of what was due to the solicitor from the defendant on the 9th of May, 1894, in respect of statute-barred items. The taxing-master took this view, and, finding that at this date there was due to the solicitor £36 12s. 8d. on the cash account, and £25 11s. in respect of costs (which he taxed), allowed these sums by way of set-off against the surcharge. From this decision there was an appeal to Wright, J., who affirmed the taxing-master's decision as to the cash balance of £36 12s. 8d., but reversed it as to the costs amounting to £25 11s. Both parties have appealed from the order of Wright, J., the plaintiff seeking to have the taxing-master's decision restored, while the defendant insists that it ought to be reversed as to the cash balance as well as the costs.

The earliest entry in the bill of costs with respect to

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* There was a break in the bill of costs, there being no items between 1889 and 1893.

the action brought by the defendant against Rigby & Co., occurs on the 24th of November, 1893. The writ was issued on the 29th of January, 1894, and the action proceeded in regular course, and was duly entered for trial. On the 24th of April, 1894, Messrs. Rigby & Co.'s solicitors informed Mr. Foster that they were instructed not to contest the matter any further, and proposed to issue a summons to stay further proceedings on payment of the amount claimed and costs. On the 25th of April, Mr. Foster, by letter informed the defendant of this proposal and stated that it would be about a fortnight before the costs were taxed, and the amount paid. On the 26th of April, the defendant sent a telegram, "Delighted at the good news contained in your letetr." It appeared from the bill of costs, delivered by Mr. Foster, that the debt of Rigby & Co. was paid on the 9th of May, 1894. In a letter written by Mr. Foster to the defendant in 1895 he expressed an intention to send to the defendant an account; but in fact none was sent, except that rendered with the bill of costs on the 2nd of December, 1899. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the decision of the taxing-master ought in these circumstances to be supported, on the ground either of lien, or set off, or appropriation of payments. It is quite clear that the Statute of Limitations only bars the remedy by action, and does not destroy the debt or affect any remedy by way of lien, whether on a judgment recovered by the exertion of the solicitor: Higgins v. Scott, 2 B. & Ad. 413; or on papers in his hands: Curwen v. Milburn, 38 W. R. 49, 42 Ch. D. 424. The lien of a solicitor on a fund recovered is confined to the costs of the action in which it is recovered: Bozon v. Bolland, 4 My. & Cr. 354; so that the lien on the debt due from Rigby & Co. only extended to the excess of the costs of the action as between solicitor and client over those between party and party, an excess which is stated only to amount to about £5, and is in any event unaffected by the judgment. No question as to a lien on papers arises. I am therefore unable to see that the solicitor had any right of lien which can avail the plaintiff in this action. Neither in my judgment can the plaintiff claim any statutory right of set off; for, as was laid down by Wilde, C.J., in Francis v. Dodsworth, 4 C. B. 202, p. 220, the judicial construction of the statute of set off "has been that no debts can be used by way of set off. . . . except such as are recoverable by action." Here the debt relied on by the plaintiff has in this very action been held not to be so recoverable; and to give effect to a set off by the plaintiff would be to go behind the judgment.

It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the solicitor was entitled to appropriate, and must be taken to have appropriated, the sum in question to the cash balance and costs found to have been due to him on the 9th of May, 1894. To this it was answered on behalf of the defendant, first, that in the circumstances no right of appropriation existed; and secondly, that, even if it did exist, it had not been and could not now be exercised. On the first of these points much reliance was placed on Waller v. Lacy, 1 Man. & Gr. 54, where it was decided that a solicitor had no right to appropriate to a statute-barred debt a sum received by him on behalf of, but without the knowledge of, the client. In the present case the fair inference from the facts appears to be that the sum of £66 3s. 8d. was received and retained by the solicitor with the knowledge of the client, and it may be, and I am willing to assume that on this ground the authority cited does not apply. Still, it is quite clear that previously to the judgment in this action, no effective appropriation was in fact made. In the only account rendered to the defendant this particular item does not appear; and there is no room for the application of the doctrine of Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 585; see The Mecca, 45 W. R. 667, [1897] A. C. 286. After judgment I do not think it was any longer open to the plaintiff to make an appropriation; for the authorities, although the language used in them varies, appear to show that there is some limit on the exercise by a creditor of an option to appropriate; as, for example, the communication of the appropriation to the debtor: Simson v. Ingham, 2 B. & C. 65; or the bringing of an action: Mills v. Fowkes, 5 Bing. N. C. 462; or, as is said by Taunton, J., in Philpott v. Jones, 2 A. & E. 41, before the case came under the consideration of a jury. In the present case the terms of the judgment seem to me to preclude a subsequent appropriation.

For these reasons I think that the appeal of the defendant ought to succeed, and that the appeal of the plaintiff fails.

COLLINS, M.R., and MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal of the defendant allowed; appeal of the plaintiff dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Arthur Price.

Solicitors for the defendant, Underwood, Son, & Piper.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Nov. 5.

In re LOVERIDGE.
PEARCE v. MARSH. (a.)

Mortgage—Freeholds—Mortgagee in possession—Mortgagor barred after death of mortgagee—Devolution of mortgaged land from person entitled at date of bar—Realty or personalty—Trust for sale.

A mortgagee of freeholds under an instrument, which was in the form of a trust for sale, entered into possession in 1861, and so remained until his death. He died in 1864, leaving all his property to his wife (whom he appointed executrix) for life, but otherwise intestate. His brother was his heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin. His wife entered into possession and so remained until her death in 1900. The equity of redemption was barred in 1879.

Held, that on the death intestate, in 1880, of the brother, his moiety of the mortgaged premises expectant in reversion on the death of the tenant for life, having become realty in 1879, passed to his co-heiresses-at-law.

This was the further consideration of an originating summons for the administration of the estate of Isaac Loveridge. The question to be decided was whether certain real estate to which he was entitled at his death was to be considered as forming part of his real estate or of his personal estate.

James Loveridge, the mortgagee of certain freehold messuages and hereditaments, entered into possession in 1861 and so remained till his death. He died in 1864, having devised and bequeathed his residuary, real, and personal estate (in which was comprised his interest in the mortgaged premises) to his wife, Jane Mary Loveridge, during her widowhood, and appointed her executrix. Subject as aforesaid, he died intestate, leaving his brother, Isaac Loveridge, his heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin.

Jane Mary Loveridge, who never re-married, remained in possession of the mortgaged premises till her death in 1900.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After 1861 neither James Loveridge nor Jane Mary Loveridge ever accounted or made any acknowledgment to the mortgagor, whose interest was stated by the certificate of the master to have become barred on the 1st of January, 1879, by the operation of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

By an order made on the 2nd of August, 1902, in an action for the administration of the estate of James Loveridge (reported in 51 W. R. 232, [1902] 2 Ch. 859), it was declared that the mortgaged premises, at the death of James Loveridge, formed part of his personal estate.

Accordingly, at the death of James Loveridge, the position was that Isaac Loveridge and the widow each took one moiety of the interest of James Loveridge in the mortgaged premises, in reversion expectant on the death or re-marriage of the widow.

Isaac Loveridge, who had been of unsound mind from the date of the death of James Loveridge, died intestate on the 20th of August, 1880.

The question was whether Isaac Loveridge's moiety became on and after the 1st of January, 1879, his real estate and descended on his death intestate to his co-heiresses-at-law (who were also the co-heiresses of James), or whether it remained his personal estate, and belonged as such to his next-of-kin.

A question also arose as to whether the mortgage was by way of trust for sale, or merely contained a power of sale. As this was held to be immaterial, it is thought unnecessary to state the terms of the mortgage.

Astbury, K.C., and H. Charlton Hawkins, for some of the next-of-kin of Isaac Loveridge.—It may be assumed that the devise of a life estate to the widow did not pass the legal estate in the mortgaged premises. It therefore descended to Isaac, who held it in trust for the persons entitled to the mortgage debt. The mortgage being by way of trust for sale, the mode by which he ought to have carried out his trust was to sell the property and hold the net proceeds of the sale in trust for the widow for life and after her death for himself and the widow in moieties. The fact that he lived for a year and eight months after the mortgage had become barred did not operate to change the nature of the property. For such change to take place an act of election was required, which he was incapable of performing by reason of his unsound mind. Again, the power of sale of a mortgagee remains operative after he has been in possession for the statutory period: In re Alison, 27 W. R. 537, 11 Ch. D. 284, 295. If the power of sale remains operative, the mortgage must remain on foot, even though the mortgagor is barred. A trust for sale, as here, is an à fortiori case. Unless the widow elected to give up her beneficial interest in the mortgage debt, which she never did, it was out of the power of Isaac to elect, even if he had been otherwise competent, to change the nature of the mortgaged property from the condition of personal estate in which he found it.

Stone, for the legal personal representative of another of the next-of-kin.—A mortgagee who has been in possession for the statutory period must do something to change the nature of the property: Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 256, 277, cited in the judgment in In re Loveridge. Unless this rule is adopted, it might happen that in the period between the barring of the equity of redemption and the barring of the mortgage debt, the mortgagee might do something which would be analogous to opening a foreclosure. The result would be that during that period it would be impossible to tell whether the mortgaged property was realty or personalty.

A. F. Peterson, for the legal personal representative of another of the next-of-kin.—The mortgagor was not barred in 1879. The statement in the certificate that he was, is merely an inference of law arising from the facts found by the master, and may be disregarded. The mortgagee was not in possession for the period prescribed by section 7 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. The mortgagee is the person able to exercise the powers conferred by the mortgage. Isaac was the mortgagee. The widow may have been in possession as owner of the mortgage debt. She could not have been in possession as agent of Isaac, who was a lunatic and could give no authority. The mortgagor not being barred, the property remains personalty.

Vaughan Hawkins and Fossett Lock, for the co-heiresses.—The mortgage was barred. As to this, the certificate is conclusive. In any case the words of the section, "When a mortgagee shall have obtained the possession," are satisfied by James having obtained possession. The statutory period elapsed without the mortgagor taking proceedings. The mere possibility that the mortgagee might have taken proceedings analogous to opening a foreclosure did not prevent his interest from becoming land in 1879. A statutory bar has the effect of a parliamentary conveyance, and prevents the revival of title: Doe v. Sumner, 14 M. & W. 39, 42. The language of the judgment in In re Loveridge (at p. 863) is in our favour. The rights of Isaac and the widow, which up to 1879 were of a personal nature, became enlarged by the bar. At that date Isaac became entitled to the whole fee. What he held he held as land, and as trustee for himself and the widow. No question, therefore, of election can arise. Without admitting that in this mortgage there is anything more than a power of sale, whether it be a trust or a power, it is to be used for the benefit of the mortgagee. In re Alison does not decide that the interest of a mortgagee, by reason of the mere existence of such a trust or power, is thereby prevented from becoming realty.

Astbury, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—I will deal first with the argument of Mr. Peterson, which is that the mortgagor is not barred. I think he is partly right and partly wrong. He is right when he says that he is not concluded by the certificate. The certificate finds facts and states a conclusion of law arising from those facts. The conclusion of law may be disregarded, if, in the opinion of the court, it is wrong. But I think that the conclusion of law is right. In 1861 James Loveridge obtained the possession or receipt of the profits of the land. More than twelve years had elapsed on the 1st of January, 1879, the date fixed for the coming into operation of the Act of 1874, by which the period of limitation was shortened to that length of time. It results that the right of the mortgagor to bring an action to redeem the mortgage was barred on that date, because more than twelve years had elapsed since James Loveridge had obtained such possession or receipt. I think, therefore, that the mortgagor was barred.

I come next to the point raised by Mr. Stone. He says that, granted that the mortgagor may have become barred and that he cannot recover the land, yet it does not follow that the right of the mortgagee to recover the debt is barred. Let us assume that to be so. A parallel case would be that of a foreclosure, in which the mortgagee does something to open the foreclosure. The contention must be that in every case, be it foreclosure or bar, because something may happen whereby the foreclosure or bar may be re-opened, and because, therefore, it may happen that the land may again become merely a security for the mortgage debt, the mortgagee must do something to show that he elects to keep the land as land. The answer to this contention, in the present case, is that the event supposed has not happened.

The facts here are that on the 1st of January, 1879, the legal estate in the mortgaged premises was in the heirs-at-law of James Loveridge. The persons beneficially interested were the widow during her life, and the widow and Isaac in moieties in reversion expectant on the death of the widow. As from the moment when the mortgagor was barred, their rights, which previously were to have the payment of money and the possession of the land as a security for such payment, became enlarged. The position was that there no longer existed any right of redemption in the mortgagor, but that the same persons became owners both of the debt and of the security for the debt. It is impossible that a person in that position should have a right against himself. It is not a case in which any election was required; at that moment, without any election on their part, the mortgagees' rights became so enlarged that that which was before personalty became realty. If Isaac had been the only person interested, the matter would have been unarguable. It makes no difference that the parties beneficially interested were several. The rights so enlarged were held by Isaac as a trustee for those persons, that is to say, for himself and the widow.

Does it make any difference that the mortgage was by way of trust for sale? Mr. Vaughan Hawkins said that he would assume that it was so, because he thought the point to be immaterial. Assuming the mortgage to have been in the form of a trust for sale, then the only object of the trust was to give effect to rights which existed by way of security. If the rights by way of security are gone, there is no room for the trust. I think nothing turns on that.

Lastly, is any election necessary? The mortgagee acquires an indefeasible title, not by election, but by the operation of a statutory conveyance I think, therefore, that as from 1st of January, 1879, when the mortgagor became barred, Isaac became entitled to his moiety of the property as real estate. It therefore decends to his co-heiresses.

Solicitors, Bridgman & Willcocks, for Willson & Bond, Lyme Regis; Baillie & Sons, for Sir R. N. Howard, Weymouth; Geare & Pease, for Forward & Sons, Axminster.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) Nov. 16.

DOVER v. PROSSER. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary and county council franchise—Head master of school—Occupation of dwelling-house adjoining school premises—Character of occupation—Household or service franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict, c. 102), s. 3—Representation of the People Act 1884 (48 & 49 Vict c. 3), ss. 2, 3—County Electors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 10), s. 3.

The appellant, a schoolmaster, had resided during the qualifying period in a dwelling-house attached to the school premises, which dwelling-house he held under an agreement from the school managers. No deduction from his annual salary as schoolmaster was made in respect of his occupation of the dwelling-house, nor did the agreement contain any stipulation requiring the appellant as schoolmaster to reside in the dwelling-house. The appellant claimed to have his name inserted in Division I. of the list of occupation electors in respect of his occupation as tenant of the said dwelling-house.

The revising barrister, although not finding as a fact, either that the appellant as schoolmaster was required to reside in the dwelling-house, or that he might, if he chose, reside elsewhere, disallowed the claim, on the ground that the appellant occupied the dwelling-house by virtue only of his office and services as schoolmaster, and, consequently, was not entitled to be placed in Division I.

Upon appeal, the court reversed the revising barrister, and held, upon the facts, that the case was governed by Marsh v. Estcourt, 38 W. R. 495, 24 Q. B. D. 147, and that the appellant was entitled to have his name inserted in Division I.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Medway Division of Kent.

Arthur John Dover, the appellant, claimed to have his name inserted in Division I. of the list of occupation voters, which contained the names of persons entitled to vote both as parliamentary electors and as county electors of the administrative county, in respect of an occupation qualification. The appellant's name appeared only in Division II. of the list of occupation voters, which contained the names of those entitled to vote as parliamentary electors only, and not as county electors.

The facts were as follows:

The appellant was head master of what was formerly a voluntary school, but had now under the Education Act passed to the Kent County Council as a non-provided school. Attached to the school premises was a dwelling-house at which, under the agreement between the appellant and the managers, the appellant was entitled to reside, without any deduction being made from his annual salary in respect of such residence.

The appellant's claim to have his name inserted in Division I. in respect of his occupation of this house had been duly objected to.

The revising barrister, after hearing evidence in support of, and in opposition to, the claim, disallowed the claim, and found as facts:—(1) That the house occupied by the appellant was occupied by him in virtue of his services as a schoolmaster, and not otherwise; (2) that no deduction from his salary was made in consequence of his residing in the house; and (3) that if a new schoolmaster were to be appointed in the stead of the appellant he would presumably be entitled to reside in the house then occupied by the appellant, and that the latter would be required to vacate the said house.

Due notice of appeal having been given on behalf of the claimant, the revising barrister stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Henry Lynn (T. A. Organ with him), for the apellant.—The question turns simply on whether the appellant in this case was merely permitted to reside at the school house, or was obliged to reside there as a condition and as a part of the duties he undertook, when appointed head master. There is no clause in the agreement, under which the appellant entered upon his duties, expressly requiring that he should reside at this house. Therefore, so far as that agreement is concerned, he is free to reside elsewhere; and that freedom to occupy any other residence distinguishes the present case from that class of cases where the occupation of the premises, in respect of which a vote was sought, had been held to confer on the tenant a service franchise only. In Marsh v. Estcourt, 38 W. R. 495, 24 Q. B. D. 147, Wills, J., points out that the court cannot be blind to the fact that the uniform tendency of legislation recently has been to increase the privileges of franchise in proportion as the liability is imposed to taxation, and at the close of his judgment in that case said, "Here the labourers were not required to reside in the cottages, but were allowed to reside in them as a privilege"; and it was there held that, as the cottagers did not occupy the cottages as a necessary incident to their employment on the estate, they were in the position of ordinary tenants. An instance of the converse was given by Mellor, J., in the Petersfield case, 2 O'Malley & Hardcastle's Election Petitions: see also Hughes v. Overseers of Chatham 5 M. & G. 54. The revising barrister disallowed the claim on the ground that the claimant occupied this house under a service occupation. But he did not so find that as a fact.

M'Clean v. Pritchard, 36 W. R. 508, 20 Q. B. D. 285, and Smith v. Seghill Overseers, 23 W. R. 745, L. R. 10 Q. B. 422, were also referred to.

The respondent was not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed. It seems to me that in every case of this sort the governing test is whether the premises which the claimant did in fact occupy were occupied necessarily for the performance of his services, or whether the person was permitted, but not obliged, to live in the particular house. Where there is permission, but not an obligation, to reside in the house, the occupier is not precluded from claiming to be registered in Division I. I agree with the dictum of Wills, J., in Marsh v. Estcourt, to which our attention was directed during the argument, and I think it would be in the present case almost an abuse of language to call the residence of the head master of this school under such conditions "occupation by virtue of services." In the Petersfield case Mellor, J., instanced the case of a gamekeeper who received so much wages and had a house in the centre of a gentleman's preserves; in such a case, clearly the house was occupied by the keeper, not as an ordinary tenant, but as an incident of his services as gamekeeper. These two cases show very clearly the two classes of occupation; and the question we have to decide is within which category the present case falls. The only difficulty arises from the revising barrister not having found as a fact either that the appellant was entitled to reside elsewhere, or that he was obliged to live in this house. Looking at the facts before us, it seems clear to my mind that it can be implied that the appellant might, if he so willed, live elsewhere during the continuance of his office as head master; because the case says that if a new master were appointed in the appellant's stead he would presumably be entitled to reside in the house then occupied by the appellant. There is no finding that a new master would be obliged to reside there, or that on the appointment of a new master the apellant would be compelled to leave the house. We are told, moreover, that there is no clause in the agreement appointing the appellant schoolmaster, compelling him, as a condition of that appointment, to reside in this particular house; and I do not think that the revising barrister meant to find, and I do not think we ought to assume he meant to find, that the appellant was required to reside there, or that the nature of his duties necessitated such residence.

If, as it seems to me, this is the true view of the facts, then the case clearly falls within the authorities showing that the appellant is entitled to have his name inserted in Division I.

KENNEDY and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors, Baker & Nairne.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) — Nov. 16.

PEARCE v. MERRIMAN. (a.)

Election law — Registration — Parliament—Occupation franchise—Husband tenant of wife—Evidence of bonâ fide agreement to pay rent by husband to wife.

The relationship of husband and wife does not in point of law preclude the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant between the wife and the husband in respect of the house in which they both reside and which is owned by the wife; and, where there is in fact a bonâ fide tenancy of such house by the husband from the wife, the husband is entitled to be registered under the Registration Acts in respect of his occupation as tenant of such house.

Hall v. Michelmore, 50 W. R. 172, explained and distinguished.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Westbury Division of Wiltshire.

The short point was whether the revising barrister was right in holding that, as a matter of law, a man could not be occupying tenant of a house for the purposes of the franchise, of which house his wife, who lived with him, was the owner, although in fact there was a bonâ fide agreement of tenancy, whereby the husband agreed to pay, and did pay, his wife rent for the premises.

The case stated the following facts:

Elizabeth Richman was tenant for life under the will of her husband of several houses, in one of which she resided, another being that in respect of which William Pearce, the appellant, had his name entered on the occupiers' list. The appellant married a daughter of Elizabeth Richman, and he rented No. 25, West-street of his mother-in-law, and he and his wife resided there. The rent was 15s. 10d., payable every four weeks, and for many years up to the death of Elizabeth Richman this rent was paid to her by the appellant, who also paid the rates and whose name was inserted by the overseers on Division I. of the occupiers' list, and was entitled to vote and voted at elections. Upon the death of Elizabeth Richman in November, 1901, the house became the freehold property of the appellant's wife under the terms of her father's will.

The appellant, upon the death of his mother-in-law, and with a view to retaining his right to vote, verbally agreed with his wife to pay to her the same amount of rent that he had previously paid to his mother-in-law for the house. He produced a rent-book showing the first payment of 15s. 10d., due the 28th of December, 1901, and a receipt for the same signed by his wife. The book showed similar payments every four weeks up to September, 1903.

Between these dates the appellant and his wife resided in the house as they had formerly done; he continued to pay the rates, and his name was placed by the overseers on Division I. of the list of occupiers.

The appellant's name was duly objected to, and the notice of objection stated the grounds to be:—(1) "That you have not occupied the qualifying premises as owner or tenant for twelve months immediately preceding July 15th in this year"; (2) "that your wife, being owner of qualifying premises, disqualifies you."

In support of this objection it was urged that the appellant was not the occupier of the house either as owner or tenant, and the case of Hall v. Michelmore,

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

50 W. R. 172, was cited in support of this view. On the appellant's behalf it was urged that that case did not govern the present one, as in the former there was no evidence of tenancy, whereas in the present case there was evidence of a bonâ fide tenancy; and, further, it was argued that the mere transfer of the ownership of the premises from his mother-in-law to his wife did not affect the appellant's right to be retained on Division I. It was also argued that under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, a married woman, in respect of property acquired after the 1st of January, 1882, was entitled to all the rights of and was in the same position as a feme sole, and was therefore in a position to give her husband notice to quit in respect of a tenancy of her property or to obtain possession of her property by means of an ejectment order against her husband, or by an action.

The revising barrister was of opinion that the fact that the appellant was the occupier of the premises when his wife became the owner of them was immaterial; the same question would have arisen if, on the house becoming the property of his wife, the appellant had moved into it from another house and had claimed as occupier in succession from one to the other. He was further of opinion that, though a wife might let to her husband any of her property of which she gave up the occupation to him, the joint occupation by husband and wife of a house belonging to her was inconsistent with the relation of landlord and tenant; the right of a landlord to give notice to quit to, or to eject, a tenant could not, in his opinion, exist in opposition to the marital right of the husband to continue to reside with his wife. He therefore came to the conclusion that the agreement that the husband should be tenant of the house to his wife was, under the circumstances, inoperative to constitute the appellant an occupier as tenant, and held that the objection was valid, and that the appellant's name should accordingly be removed from Division I. of the list of voters.

Due notice of appeal having been given, the revising barrister stated this case.

Lewis Thomas, for the appellant.—The revising barrister has come to an erroneous conclusion in point of law. He appears to have overlooked the fact that the appellant's wife resided in the house simply by reason of her right as wife to share her husband's home. He assumed that because some of the usual incidents of landlord and tenant were wanting—for instance, it would be absurd to suppose that if the rent fell in arrear the wife could eject the husband, and so end the agreement—that the tenancy was inoperative to constitute the husband the occupier in such a sense as to give him a right on that ground to claim a vote. Under the Married Women's Property Acts a wife, in respect of her separate property, stands in an analogous position for many purposes to her husband to that of a stranger; and there is no "joint" occupancy of the premises to be inferred in this case from the mere fact that they both live in the same house, other than a joint occupancy which in one sense exists in every case where a man keeps a housekeeper to look after his house and live there with him. Hall v. Michelmore, 50 W. R. 172, in fact is an authority in favour of the appellant, for the decision was given on facts the converse of those here. In that case the claim was disallowed because there was no agreement of tenancy by the husband, and the attempt to establish a precedent that a husband by residing in a house with his wife, who was the owner of the house, was thereby entitled to be registered as occupier of the house, very properly failed. Here there is evidence of an agreement of tenancy, and it is not disputed that if the landlord was not the appellant's wife the entry in the list would be good. The wife is in the position of a stranger to her husband, and the tenancy being a bonâ fide tenancy, the entry of the appellant's name in the list of voters should not have been struck out.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is much to be regretted that in this case the respondent is not represented by counsel; but after Mr. Lewis Thomas's argument I can entertain no doubt that this appeal should be allowed. I do not think that the case of Hall v. Michelmore is a decision against that view, because in that case there was no evidence of a tenancy. It was an attempt to show that the mere fact that the wife owned the house in which the husband and wife lived was evidence sufficient of an occupation of the premises by the husband to give him a right to have his name placed on the list of occupiers. The revising barrister there held that such evidence was insufficient, and the court refused to interfere with his decision. There is no suggestion here that the tenancy put forward by the husband was a mere colourable agreement to enable him to vote. If that had been suggested, other and very different considerations would have arisen. It was stated that the matter had been considered by the appellant in order that he might secure his vote, and there appeared to have been a verbal agreement of tenancy sufficient to support the claim. The rent-book was produced, and there appears to have been regular payments of rent by the husband to the wife. The revising barrister found that if the parties had not been husband and wife the husband's claim would have been good; but he held as material, that the relationship of husband and wife necessarily precluded effect being given to that agreement. In my opinion where there is a real tenancy proved it is immaterial whether the tenancy is one existing between husband and wife or two strangers. Here there is no ground for saying that the tenancy is not a real tenancy, and as I do not agree with the view that a man who is tenant of his wife is thereby necessarily unable to claim the franchise on the ground that, for this purpose, such a tenancy in law is inoperative, this appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question, it seems to me, is whether there is here evidence of a real tenancy. If that is established, then the husband is entitled to a vote, because a wife is now placed in the same position as a stranger to her husband by the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act.

DARLING, J.—I agree. I desire only to point out that in allowing this appeal we are deciding nothing inconsistent with the decision in Hall v. Michelmore. In that case there was no evidence of a tenancy; in the present case, on the other hand, there is very distinct evidence of one; and the rent-book, which was put in evidence, shows that rent was paid under the agreement. The revising barrister, as it seems to me, has gone wrong in regarding the occupation as a joint occupation. I think the wife let the house to her husband, and gave up the occupation of the premises to him. The wife, under the agreement, was the landlord, and the husband the tenant; the husband lived there under his rights as tenant of the property; but the wife was entitled to live there and did live there under a totally different contract—namely, by virtue of her contract of marriage.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

Solicitors, Milner & Bickford, for Wills & White, Trowbridge.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Aug. 6, 1903.

TOLHURST v. ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (LIMITED).

ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (LIMITED) AND IMPERIAL PORTLAND CEMENT CO. (LIMITED) v. TOLHURST. (a.)

Contract — Assignability — New company — Action by assignee.

By a contract between T., the owner of a chalk quarry, and a cement manufacturing company, who were owners and occupiers of neighbouring land, it was agreed that T. should supply so much chalk during a period of fifty years (as therein provided) as the company should require for the manufacture of cement on the said land.

Held, that the company were entitled to assign the benefit of this contract to a new company, who could enforce it against T.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 81, [1902] 2 K. B. 660) (Lord Robertson dissenting) affirmed.

These two appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Jeune, P., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.) were consolidated.

In the first action the appellant claimed payment at the rate of 2s per ton for chalk supplied by him since the formation of the Associated Co.

In the second, by the Associated Co. and the Imperial Co against the appellant, they claimed a declaration that a contract, dated the 5th of January, 1898, between the appellant and the Imperial Co., was subsisting, and that they were entitled to be supplied with chalk by the appellant on the terms of the contract.

The facts are set out at length in the court below, and shortly given in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Pickford, K.C. (George Wallace with him), for the appellant.

Younger, K.C., and Bremner (H. E. Wright with them), for the respondents.

Pickford, K.C., in reply.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., said that he was at one time disposed to accede to the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellant, but with some hesitation he concurred with the judgment about to be moved by Lord Macnaghten.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I cannot think that any legal principle is involved in this case. The case may be of great importance to the parties. From a legal point of view it is, I think, of no importance at all. The question, as it seems to me depends simply and solely on the true meaning and effect of the contract of the 5th of January, 1898, made between Alfred Tolhurst of the one part and the Imperial Portland Cement Co. (Limited) of the other. Two alternative constructions have been proposed. One follows the letter of the instrument and adheres to it closely; the other favours a more liberal interpretation, supplying, it is said, nothing more than what is required in order to carry out the obvious intention of the parties. The question is, which of these two constructions is to be adopted? When that matter is once determined, there cannot, I think, be any further difficulty. There are contracts, of course, which are not to be performed vicariously, to use an expression of Knight-Bruce, L.J. There may be an element of personal skill or an element of personal confidence to which, for the purposes of the contract, a stranger cannot make any pretensions. But no one, I suppose, would seriously argue that a contract for delivery of chalk from particular quarries for the use of particular cement works cannot be performed by any person for the time being possessed of the quarries, or that it can make the slightest difference to anybody who the proprietors of the cement works or the actual manufacturers may be, provided they are in a position to carry out the terms of the original contract.

Tolhurst was the owner of property at Northfleet, in Kent, containing extensive and valuable chalk quarries. He sold a piece of his land there, known as the Little Dockyard, to the Imperial Co., and that company bought another piece of land from the British White Lead Co., who also derived title from Tolhurst. The main object for which the Imperial Co. was formed was to establish cement works at Northfleet and carry on there the business of Portland cement manufacturers. It was, of course, important for Tolhurst to secure a regular market for his chalk, and it was equally important for the Imperial Co. to secure a regular supply of chalk for their works.

The effect of the contract of January, 1898, may be stated shortly. Tolhurst had made a tramway to the boundary of the land bought by the Imperial Co. from the White Lead Co., and the Imperial Co. was to make a tramway continuing Tolhurst's tramway to a convenient spot on its land in order to enable him to bring chalk to the company's works. On completion of this tramway the contract provided that "the said Alfred Tolhurst will, for a term of fifty years, to be computed from the 25th of December, 1897, or for such shorter period (not being less than thirty-five years) as he shall be possessed of chalk available and suitable for the manufacture of Porland cement, and capable of being quarried and got in the usual manner above water level, supply to the company, and the company will take and buy of the said Alfred Tolhurst at least 750 tons per week, and so much more, if any, as the company shall require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land." Tolhurst was to provide rolling-stock and traction power, carry the chalk over the company's tramway, and deliver it alongside the company's stores, but he was not to be precluded from supplying other persons. Delivery orders were to be sent in before four o'clock for the next day. The price was to be 1s. 3d. per ton, to be paid in cash monthly. The average monthly payment for any year after 1898 was to be not less than £188. Then there was a clause providing for the case of strikes and unavoidable stoppages, and authorizing the company at its own expense to procure chalk elsewhere in the event of Tolhurst being thereby prevented from supplying the quantity required.

In 1900 the Imperial Co. sold its undertaking to the respondents, the Associated Co., and went into voluntary liquidation. Its affairs are fully wound up, and all its assets have been distributed. Tolhurst brought in no claim in the liquidation. He stood by while the Imperial Co. was in process of dissolution. Tolhurst's case now is that by parting with its undertaking and going into liquidation the Imperial Co. rescinded or put an end to the contract of January, 1898, and that he is not bound under or in accordance with that contract to furnish supplies of chalk to the Associated Co. for the purposes of the works at Northfleet which formerly belonged to the Imperial Co., whether the Associated Co. requires delivery in its own name or in the name of the Imperial Co.

Now, what is the meaning of the contract of

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

January, 1898? I cannot think there is much difficulty about it. It is expressed to be made between Alfred Tolhurst and the Imperial Co. They, and they only, are named as the persons to perform the contract. From beginning to end of the instrument, if the contract be taken literally, there is not one word pointing to the continued existence of the contract in the hands of any other person, either by succession or substitution. The obligations and benefits of the contract on the one side begin and end with Alfred Tolhurst; on the other, they begin and end with the Imperial Co. And yet the contract is to endure for the period of fifty years, or, if the supply of chalk in the quarries does not hold out so long, it is to last for thirty-five years at least.

Now, when it is borne in mind that the Imperial Co. must have been induced to establish its works at Northfleet by the prospect of the advantages flowing from immediate connection with Tolhurst's quarries, and that the contract in substance amounts to a contract for the sale of all the chalk in those quarries by periodical deliveries (less what Tolhurst might sell elsewhere), it is plain that it could not have been within the contemplation of the parties that the company would lose the benefit of the contract if anything happened to Tolhurst, or that Tolhurst would lose the benefit of the market which the contract provided for him at his very door in the event of the company parting with its undertaking, as it was authorized to do by its memorandum. Counsel for the appellant said truly that those powers in the memorandum to which his attention was called placed the company in the position of an individual. That is so. But if the contract had been between two individuals—between Alfred Tolhurst and John Smith—I do not think there would have been any doubt about the matter. It is, I think, the introduction of a company—a body with perpetual succession, defined capital, and specified objects—as one party to the contract, that really creates or suggests the difficulty—that, and the use of the words "their," "their manufacture," "upon their land." But the word "their" in the case of the company must not be taken too literally any more than the word "his" in the case of Tolhurst where the contract speaks of "his" land. Something more is comprehended than the particular company and the individual Tolhurst. It seems to me to me that the contract is to be read and construed as if it contained an interpretation clause saying that the expression "Tolhurst" should include Tolhurst and his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, owners and occupiers of the Northfleet quarries; that the expression "the company" should include the company and its successors and assigns, owners and occupiers of the Northfleet Cement Works; and that the words "his" and "their" should have a corresponding meaning. That, I think, was the plain intention of the parties. The contract is a contract for the mutual benefit and accommodation of the chalk quarries and the cement works, and of Tolhurst and the company as the owners and occupiers of those two properties. Construed fairly, the provision in clause 2, about which there was so much argument, means, I think, nothing more than this—that the Imperial Co. was to take the whole of the supply of chalk required for the Northfleet works, guaranteed not to be less than 750 tons per week, from Tolhurst's chalk quarries, and from no other source whatever. As long as that is done, how can it matter who is carrying on the works? There is nothing in the contract to restrict the development of the works on the land which formerly belonged to the Imperial Co., or to check the expansion and improvement, in the ordinary course of things, of the process of manufacture there.

If the view I have expressed be correct, all difficulty vanishes. It is well settled that as a general rule the benefit of a contract is assignable in equity and may be enforced by the assignee. The assignor ought in ordinary circumstances to be made a party. But I cannot think that this is necessary when the assignor is a mere name, as the Imperial Co. is in the present case, without any means and without any executive or board of directors, if indeed it has now any corporate existence. I am not aware of any authority for this proposition, but it seems to me to be in accordance with the practice in equity, and it is supported by what was said by James, V.C., in Castellan v. Hobson, L. R. 10 Eq. 47.

The result is that Tolhurst's action fails, because, as regards the chalk which has been supplied to the Associated Co., the company is entitled to have it at the stipulated price of 1s. 3d. per ton. The second action succeeds, but I think the Imperial Co. was not a necessary or proper party. If the requirements of sections 142 and 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, have been complied with the company is "deemed to be dissolved," and therefore I should suggest that in lieu of the declaration in the order pronounced by the Court of Appeal there should be inserted a declaration to the effect that the Associated Co. is entitled to the benefit of the contract of the 5th of January, 1898, they undertaking to pay as provided by the contract for all chalk supplied to them in accordance with the contract.

With this variation I think the orders under appeal should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Shand, who is unable to be present to-day, has asked me to express his concurrence in this opinion.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I can explain in a few sentences what I find an insuperable objection to the judgment appealed against. It seems to me that the demand of the respondents is that the appellant should supply them with something different to that which he bound himself to give. The subject-matter of the contract is expressed to be the supply of 750 tons and so much more chalk, if any, as should be required for the business of a particular company, while the demand of the respondents is that the appellant shall supply 750 tons and so much more chalk as is required for the business of another and a different company. The appellant's point is, therefore, not the bare one, that the contract is not transmissible, but it is that the thing which the assign is asking for is something which the appellant never bound himself to give.

Now, first of all, about the facts. It is true, or at least I assume it to be true that the original company still exists in such sense that it can sue. But it is still more certain that it has finally ceased business; and it exists and comes into court solely in order to enforce this contract (if it can) in favour of the new company. And the crucial fact (in my view) is that the original company is, as a manufacturer, dead and done with, and has no requirements, large or small. The requirements which the appellant is now called on to meet are not the requirements of the old company, but the requirements of the new.

It seems to me no answer to this to say that the old company might have increased its capital and its operations, so that its requirements would have been as onerous as those of the new company. This is merely the old and often-rejected argument that a man can be forced to do something which he never agreed to merely because it is very like and no more onerous than something which he did agree to.

I have only to add that I should find it impossible to split up the subject of the contract, and to hold that, even if the appellant is not bound to meet the requirements of the new company, he is bound to give them the 750 tons. In a commercial contract like this, the benefit of the more elastic provisions belongs to both parties, and neither the person who supplies nor the person who takes can be held to the one part of the contract when the opposite party has, by his own act, rendered the other part of the contract impossible of fulfilment.

Lord LINDLEY.—In January, 1898, Mr. Tolhurst, who was the owner of some chalk land in Northfleet, sold part of that land to the Imperial Portland Cement Co., and by an agreement dated the 5th of January, 1898, he agreed that they should have for fifty years from his adjoining chalk quarries all such chalk as they should require for their cement works on the land they had bought. They were to pay 1s. 3d. a ton. for all they wanted, and they bound themselves to take at least 750 tons a week. The company were not to come on to Tolhurst's land and get the chalk themselves. He was to get it and deliver it to them, and they were to pay him monthly for what was so delivered. Tolhurst was at liberty to sell chalk to other persons, and provision was made for the possible event of all his chalk being worked out before the expiration of the fifty years.

The nature of the agreement and the time it was to last negative the idea that it was confined to the parties to it. The word "assigns" does not occur in the agreement. But this does not shew that the benefit of the contract is not assignable. An agreement for a lease, and even an option to require a lease or a renewal of a lease, is assignable in equity even although there is no mention of executors, administrators, or assigns: see Buckland v. Papillon, 15 W. R. 92, L. R. 2 Ch. 67.

If the above agreement had been with an ordinary individual his interest would, on his death, have passed to his executors or administrators; or if he had become bankrupt his trustees could have claimed it and have sold it for the benefit of his creditors. It follows that on the same supposition he could have assigned such interest in his lifetime. The Imperial Co. could, in my opinion, have done the same thing; they could have assigned their interest themselves before winding-up proceedings commenced, and their liquidators could have assigned it as part of their assets afterwards. But it is necessary to look a little further and see what limit is set to the right conferred by the agreement. The Imperial Co. were not entitled to an unlimited supply of chalk, but only to so much as they might want for making cement on their own piece of land. I do not think their right to have chalk from Tolhurst's quarries could be assigned apart from their own land and cement works. The Imperial Co. could not by alienation or otherwise increase the burdens which Tolhurst undertook to bear. But this is the only limit which I can find in the present case.

Mathew, J., thought that the mere fact that the Imperial Co. was a comparatively small company and that the Associated Co. was much larger, and would or might want more chalk than the other, involved a material increase in the burden thrown on Tolhurst. But the learned judge apparently overlooked the fact that the Imperial Co. could have increased its capital to any extent; and could have increased its cement works to any extent which the land they had bought from Tolhurst could carry. The limit of the burden thrown on Tolhurst is in any case measured by this consideration, and this limit can no more be passed by the Associated Co. than by the Imperial Co.

But then counsel for the appellant relied on the words "as the company shall require for the whole of their manufacture of Portland cement upon their said land." By throwing a strong emphasis on the words "the company" and "their," the impression may be produced that these words, which plainly refer to the Imperial Co., were purposely used to exclude all other persons. But I cannot think that these expressions indicate any such intention. There is no question here of any personal confidence or personal skill. There is no reason whatever for supposing that any personal element entered into the mind of either of the parties to the agreement, and I cannot find anything in it to prevent the Imperial Co. from assigning the benefit of it to any other company or to any individual. By so assigning it the Imperial Co. would not get rid of their obligations to Tolhurst; but the contract is one the benefit of which is assignable in equity quite independently of the Judicature Acts.

The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, clause 6, has not made contracts assignable which were not assignable in equity before, but it has enabled assigns of assignable contracts to sue upon them in their own names without joining the assignor. I cannot agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the Associated Co. could not sue Tolhurst on this contract without joining the Imperial Co. as co-plaintiffs. The supposed necessity of making them parties or of postponing their dissolution to enable the Associated Co. to sue as their assignees has, I think, obscured the true position of the parties. I see no such necessity. But the joinder of the Imperial Co., although unnecessary, has not increased the costs, and need not be further noticed. If Tolhurst has any provable claim against the Imperial Co., if he is not too late, he can prove against it, and the liquidators can, if necessary, obtain the means of paying him from the Associated Co. under their indemnity.

In conclusion, I will only add that the British Wagon Co. v. Lea, 28 W. R. 349, 5 Q. B. D. 149, was, in my opinion, rightly decided, and is an authority very much in point for the Associated Co. The contract there was held assignable, although the word "assigns" did not occur.

The appeal fails, and the order of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed with costs; but the formal order of the Court of Appeal will, I think, be improved if amended as suggested by Lord Macnaghten.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Sismey & Cooke, for Tolhurst, Lovell, & Clinch, Gravesend.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) — Nov. 30.

RASCH & CO. (Appellants) v. WULFERT (Respondent). (a.)

Practice—Service out of the jurisdiction—Summons to enforce award—Submission to jurisdiction—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11.

A contract between the appellants, who were foreigners carrying on business abroad, and the respondent contained an arbitration clause. The respondent instituted arbitration proceedings against the appellants, and appointed an arbitrator. The appellants did not appoint an arbitrator, and the hearing of the arbitration took place without any appearance on the part of the appellants before the sole arbitrator, who made an award in favour of the respondent. The respondent applied for leave to serve on the appellants out of the jurisdiction a summons to enforce the award under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the court had no power to allow service out of the jurisdiction of such a summons.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J., at chambers, allowing service out of the jurisdiction of a summons to enforce an award.

By an agreement in writing dated London, the 4th of March, 1902, Rasch & Co., who were foreigners carrying on business as wall paper manufacturers at Bramsche, in the Empire of Germany, appointed Ernest Wulfert and another to be the sole agents for the sale of their goods in the United Kingdom for the period of three years.

The agreement contained the following clause: "In the event of any dispute between the parties hereto in any way arising out of this agreement the same shall be submitted to two arbitrators, one to be appointed by each party according and subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act of 1889."

Wulfert instituted arbitration proceedings against Rasch & Co., on the ground that a dispute arising out of the agreement had occurred, and appointed an arbitrator. Rasch & Co. did not appoint an arbitrator. The hearing of the arbitration took place without any appearance on the part of Rasch & Co. before the arbitrator appointed by Wulfert acting as sole arbitrator. On the 24th of August, 1903, he made an award in favour of Wulfert for £2,000.

Wulfert, having given Rasch & Co. notice of the award and understanding that they proposed to ignore it, proceeded to take steps to enforce it under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. He applied at chambers for an order that he might be at liberty to issue a summons in the arbitration for leave to enforce the award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect; and he also asked that service of a copy of the summons by sending the same by a prepaid post letter addressed to Rasch & Co. at Bramsche, Germany, and leaving a copy of the same with a named solicitor in London might be good and sufficient service of the summons.

The master, on the hearing of the application ex parte, ordered that a summons should issue returnable in fourteen days, and also made an order for substituted service of the summons by service on the solicitor in London and by post letter to Rasch & Co. at Bramsche, Germany.

Substituted service having been effected in accordance with the master's order, Rasch & Co. appeared to the summons under protest. The master dismissed the summons, being of opinion, on consideration, that the order for substituted service had been made without jurisdiction.

Wulfert having appealed, Ridley, J., allowed the appeal as to service of the summons, and ordered that the matter should be remitted to the master.

Rasch & Co. appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Frank Gover, for the appellants.—The learned judge acted on the assumption that the appellants had submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and he thought there was power to enforce the award, and for that purpose to order service of the summons out of the jurisdiction, under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. That section is as follows: "An award on a submission may, by leave of the court or a judge, be enforced in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect." The appellants, however, have not submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. They are foreigners residing abroad, and the award was obtained in their absence. They cannot be brought within the jurisdiction by any process of the court except under the provisions of order 11. That order, by its terms, only applies to writs. In the case of In re Busfield, Whaley v. Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123, it was held that the court has no power to serve an originating summons out of the jurisdiction. A summons to enforce an award is an originating summons: Ex parte Caucasian Trading Corporation (Limited), 44 W. R. 439, [1896] 1 Q. B. 368. As an originating summons cannot be served out of the jurisdiction, there is no power to allow substituted service of it within the jurisdiction; you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly: Townend v. Brandenburg, 39 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 151. The learned judge was of opinion that this summons was not an originating summons, as not coming within the definition of "originating summons" in ord. 71, r. 1*a*, viz.,—"every summons other than a summons in a pending cause or matter." But that definition does not exclude this summons; for an arbitration is not a cause or matter: In re An Arbitration between Shaw and Ronaldson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 91.

J. R. Atkin, for the respondent.—This summons is not an originating summons. An originating summons must originate proceedings. Here proceedings had already commenced before the summons was applied for. The appellants were parties to those proceedings. Their agreement to the abitration clause contained in the original contract amounted to a submission to reference. By section 1 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, a submission shall have the same effect in all respects as if it had been made an order of court. The appellants, therefore, by their submission to reference submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. In every case of an arbitration between an Englishman and a foreigner, the foreigner by submitting to the reference brings himself within the jurisdiction of the court. Section 12 of the Arbitration Act confers on the court the power to enforce an award in the same manner as a judgment or order. This is done by summons, and where the award is against a foreigner who has submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, no objection can be taken to service of the summons on him on the ground that he is out of the jurisdiction.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The application was made by the respondent, who said that he obtained an award against foreigners resident abroad, and asked leave to serve a summons out of the jurisdiction on the persons against whom he had got the award for the purpose of enforcing the award by execution here. The master, in the first instance, thought that he had power to allow substituted service of the summons out of the jurisdiction, but he finally decided that there was no power to serve such a summons out of the jurisdiction. Ridley, J., on appeal, held that service out of the jurisdiction might be allowed. The question, therefore, is whether the court has jurisdiction to allow service out of the jurisdiction of such a summons as this.

It is admitted that there is no power to allow service out of the jurisdiction except such as is conferred by statute. The statutory rules dealing with service out of the jurisdiction—viz., the rules of order 11—by their terms only apply to writs of summons, and it has been expressly held that they do not cover an originating summons, which is the nearest approach to a writ. Counsel for the respondent admits that he cannot get over the authority to that effect, but he argues that it is a mistake to say that the inhibition against serving summonses other than writs out of the jurisdiction applies to this case. He says that he has obtained an award, and, that award being a valid award, there is a presumption that the parties to it have submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore may be supposed to be within the jurisdiction, so that what he is now seeking to do is to serve this summons, not on someone who is out of the jurisdiction, but on someone who is within it. His argument rests on this: that the foreigners, the appellants, were within the jurisdiction before he took out the summons. But were they? And how? He obtained an award against them, but that is not enough. His argument requires that he should further show that this amounts to a presumption that they were within the jurisdiction. But the fact of an award having been made against a man is clearly no evidence that he has submitted to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, and in my opinion it does not give rise to any presumption that he has made a submission. A general agreement to refer in certain circumstances does not amount to a submission. Until a man has submitted a particular dispute to arbitration he has not brought himself within the jurisdiction of the arbitrator at all. The basis of the respondent's argument therefore fails. He must resort to some other procedure which enables the English court to extend its jurisdiction over foreigners resident abroad. He is not proceeding by writ, but by summons, and this summons is not even an originating summons. He cannot be in a better position, so far as regards service out of the jurisdiction, than if he were proceeding by originating summons.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The cases in which service abroad is allowed are precisely stated in the rules of order 11. We ought not to depart from those rules by allowing service abroad in any other case unless we find a clear indication elsewhere that we have authority to do so. It is said that such authority is to be found in the Arbitration Act, and that every foreigner who is a party to a submission must be taken to be within the jurisdiction. I cannot find any provision to that effect, and I decline to lay down that the English courts have authority to allow service abroad in such a case as the present.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. Sanders Fiske.

Solicitors for the respondent, Swepstone & Stone.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 20.

FRASER v. FRASER. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Court of Appeal—Action referred by consent of parties to master—Judgment entered by master—Right of appeal to Court of Appeal—Rules of Supreme Court, ord. 14, r. 7.

When in an action in the High Court the whole action has been referred, under ord. 14, r. 7, to a master, and judgment has been entered in pursuance of his direction, an appeal from the judgment does not lie to the Court of Appeal.

This was an application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Master Lord Dunboyne, under the provisions of ord. 14, r. 7.

The point raised was whether an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from a judgment of a master under the above rule.

The plaintiff on the 29th of April, 1903, obtained from the said master an order giving him leave, under ord. 14, r. 1, to sign final judgment against the defendant.

Upon the 5th of May, 1903, Phillimore, J., in chambers discharged the above order, and ordered that the defendant be at liberty to defend the action, and it was, by consent, under ord. 14, r. 7, further ordered that the action be referred to be tried by a master without pleadings.

The action was thereupon tried by the master, who gave his certificate finding the plaintiff entitled to a sum of £925, and directing judgment to be entered for him in accordance with the certificate. Judgment was accordingly so entered for the plaintiff with costs.

The master, although doubting whether an appeal lay from his decision, gave the defendant leave to appeal.

Ord. 14, r. 7, provides as follows: "Upon the hearing of the application"—that is, the application of the plaintiff for summary judgment—"with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master, or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner."

Trevor Lloyd, for the respondent, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay from the decision of a master under ord. 14, r. 7, or if it did, it lay to the Divisional Court, and not to the Court of Appeal, as the master was acting as an arbitrator.

He cited Wynne-Finch v. Chaytor, 52 W. R. 24, [1903] 2 Ch. 475.

Hume Williams, K.C. (J. W. McCarthy with him), for the appellant.—An appeal lies from the decision of a master under rule 7 to this court, as the decision of the master is equivalent to the judgment of the High Court. The true basis of this rule, and what the learned framers must have had in their minds, is this, that there is a very convenient mode now in existence, and was at the time this rule was made, of dealing with applications under order 14. In certain classes of cases the judge, instead of deciding one way or other upon the hearing before him, sends them into the short causes list. There is a class of case that cannot be so conveniently disposed of in the short causes list as by some form of more elaborate inquiry, and rule 7 provides that in such case the judge shall substitute either for his own summary decision on the spot or for disposition of the case by putting it in the short causes list, a more elaborate investigation—namely, that which is mentioned in this rule, and in so appointing a master, what was intended was that the master should simply be the delegate of the judge, doing instead of the judge that which would be done by the judge himself if he dealt with it on the application under order 14 or by another judge if he decided it in the short cause list, and in either view retaining for the litigants the right of appeal which they would have had if that had been done. The court ought to assume that this third mode of disposing of it is also subject to the right of appeal which would have existed had either of the other methods been adopted. If the master was merely acting as an arbitrator there is no necessity for rule 7, as before this rule was made the court had power under the Arbitration Act and the other rules to refer a case to a master.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of a master upon a matter referred to him under ord. 14, r. 7. The master entertained the reference and gave his decision, and it is against that decision that this appeal is now brought in this court. I have come to the conclusion that an appeal in this case does not lie to the Court of Appeal. The question turns upon the wording of rule 7: "Upon the hearing of the application with the consent of the parties an order may be made referring the action to a master, or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, in this case there has been, in some form or other, a reference to a master. An order may be made referring the action to a master, and it is made with the consent of the parties. Assuming that it is a reference, it would seem primâ facie to be either a reference at common law, in which case there would be no appeal, or a reference under the Judicature Act and the Arbitration Act, in which case, if there is an appeal, it would be to the Divisional Court, but in neither view is there an appeal to the Court of Appeal. Now, it is not necessary for us to decide the question whether there is any right of appeal at all from a decision under rule 7. If we did decide that question our decision would not be binding, because that question is not directly raised before us in this case, and I am very far from laying it down that an appeal does or does not lie to any court. The question before us is whether an appeal lies to this court, and what I do decide is that, if an appeal lies, it does not lie to this court. There is a great deal to be said for the view that the learned persons who are responsible for framing this rule did not intend that there should be an appeal at all, but, on the other hand, if that be the true result of this rule as framed, I regret to say that they have not used that clearness of expression which I should have expected from them. It may be that the words "without appeal" are the words governing the whole rule, and it may be said in favour of the view that it was intended to negative the right of appeal that the consent of the parties was made a term of the order of reference, and that by basing the order upon consent it was intended to give something more to its effect than if it were made without consent. However, as I have said, I am not prepared to give any opinion upon the rule whether or not it does cut off altogether the right of appeal.

Rule 7 certainly does seem to me to provide for a reference—"An order may be made referring the action"—and, if a reference, it seems to fall within one of two categories—a reference at common law, which carries with it no right of appeal, or a reference under the Acts which I have referred to, which, if they do give a right of appeal, give it to the Divisional Court only. Counsel for the appellant has not been able to convince me that there is any third alternative possible.

It is enough for my present purpose to say that I find here an intention to refer actions to some one, either to some arbitrator who takes his rights under the common law, or to some arbitrator whose rights are measured by the legislation applying to that class of litigation. In either view there is no right of appeal direct to this court. For the reasons I have given I think it is not only not open to us, but would be undesirable that we should decide a matter that is not strictly raised before us—that is to say, whether there is or is not any possibility of appeal from the decision. It is enough for us to say that certainly there is no appeal to this court and that if an appeal exists at all it exists elsewhere.

On these grounds I hold this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it is possible to adopt the construction that Mr. Hume Williams has contended for, without in substance altering the language of the rule. The rule now reads, "On the hearing of the application, with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master." The learned counsel proposes in effect to insert there the words "who shall have all the functions of the judge in dealing with the case." I see no ground whatever for supposing that that was the intention of the persons who framed the rule. If it were so, this result would follow: that on a reference to a master under this rule, in every case there would be an appeal to the Court of Appeal on questions of law and questions of fact, which would be a most extraordinary departure from an established procedure. It appears to me the functions of the master are determined by the words "refer the action to a master." He is an arbitrator, and an arbitrator only. His functions are complete and final except in the few cases in which the decision of an arbitrator can be questioned. His decision is the decision of an arbitrator. Then there is a further alternative. If it be that the master is to be treated as an officer of the court, although there is no repetition here of the various provisions of the Arbitration Act relating to official referees, his position is analogous to the position of an official referee, and his decision subject to the same revision and review. If that be the true position of the master in this case, and if that be the true construction of the rule, it is obvious that the appeal is not to us, but to the Divisional Court. Therefore I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. Rule 7 of order 14 contains words which I think are almost solely applicable to the reference of actions. They are words appropriate not to the trial of an action by the judge or master sitting as the deputy of the judge, but by a person who is an arbitrator or in the nature of an arbitrator. I can see nothing in the rule justifying an appeal to the Court of Appeal. Whether there is or is not an appeal to the Divisional Court it is not for us to say, and I desire to express no opinion whatever on that point.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Williams & Neville.

Solicitors for the respondent, Harratt & Pollock.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 2.

CHARLES BRIGHT & CO. (LIMITED) v. SELLAR. (a.)

Practice—Action of review—Charging order—Error in law apparent on face of order.

The High Court has no jurisdiction, by means of an independent action, to review its own order on the ground that the order is erroneous in law upon its face.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., upon a point of law set down for hearing under ord. 25, r. 2.

On the 28th of November, 1901, the defendant recovered judgment in the King's Bench Division against the plaintiff for £2,537 10s. 2d. The debt remaining unpaid, the defendant on the 2nd of December, 1901, obtained a charging order nisi by which the plaintiffs' interest in certain shares in Bright's Light and Power Co. (Limited), standing in the name of one Bennett on behalf of the plaintiffs, and a sum of £623 8s. 9d. in cash held on behalf of the plaintiffs by Bennett, were charged with the payment of the amount due on the judgment debt. On the 20th of December this charging order* was made absolute. On the 14th of July, 1902, the present action was brought to have the charging order reviewed upon the ground that it was erroneous in law upon its face so far as it purported to create a charge upon the sum of £623 8s. 9d. cash in the hands of Bennett, and to have it discharged so far as it purported to create the above charge. The defendant pleaded that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action. It was ordered that the point of law so raised should be set down for hearing forthwith.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wright, J., held that, assuming that the charging order was erroneous in law upon its face, as an appeal could have been brought against it, an action to review it would not lie; and, further, that an action to review only lay in the case of a judgment finally determining the rights of the parties, and that a charging order was not such a judgment. He accordingly held that the action was not maintainable and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

C. A. Bennett, for the plaintiffs.—The old jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to review its own orders still exists, and is now transferred to the High Court: Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 794; Scott v. Alvarez, [1895] 1 Ch. 596; 43 W. R. Dig. 185; Seaton on Decrees (6th ed.), p. 853. Leave to bring the action is not now necessary: Boswell v. Coaks, 6 The Rep. 167. A bill of review was maintainable where either (1) the order or decree is erroneous on the face of it; or (2) fresh facts have been discovered which could not have been used in the former suit; or (3) the former order or decree was obtained by fraud. An action to review an order will lie. The statement in 2 Daniell's Chancery Practice (7th ed.), p. 1287, that "an action of review is only proper where a judgment has been given finally determining the rights of the parties," is not correct, the case of Noble v. Stow, 7 W. R. 709, 29 Beav. 409, upon which it is founded, not bearing it out. Even if there must be an order finally determining the rights of the parties, this charging order does so. [He also referred upon this point to Green v. Jenkins, 8 W. R. 380, 1 De G. F. & J. 454; Flower v. Lloyd, 25 W. R. 793, 6 Ch. D. 297; 2 Smith's Chancery Practice, p. 44.] Secondly, this charging order is erroneous in law upon its face, inasmuch as there is no power under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, amended by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1, to make a charging order on cash: Robinson v. Peace, 7 Dowl. P. C. 93; Brereton v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 47, 21 Q. B. D. 488.

Alan Macpherson, for the defendant.—Since the Judicature Act there is no jurisdiction to review a judgment or order of the High Court, at any rate upon the ground that it is erroneous in law upon the face of it. The High Court has no power to rehear it own judgments or orders: In re St. Nazaire Co., 27 W. R. 854, 12 Ch. D. 88. The decision of Kekewich, J., in Scott v. Alvarez was wrong. It went upon the admission of counsel that the jurisdiction still existed, and also upon the observations of Kay, J., in Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., which was merely obiter. [He also cited Perry v. Phelips, 17 Ves. 173.] Secondly, if the jurisdiction still exists there is no error of law apparent on the face of this charging order.

* The order nisi also purported to charge certain debentures in the company, but the reference to the debentures was omitted in the order absolute.

C. A. Bennett replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This appeal raises a curious and important question as to the jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court to review and discharge an order of the High Court. On the 28th of November, 1901, the defendant Sellar recovered judgment against the plaintiff company in an action in the King's Bench Division for £2,537 10s. 2d., and he obtained a charging order in that action by which the company's interest in certain shares standing in the name of one Bennett on behalf of the company in Bright's Light and Power Co. (Limited), and a sum of £623 8s. 9d. held on behalf of the company by Bennett, were charged with the payment of the amount due on the judgment. The order nisi also purported to charge certain debentures, but the word "debentures" was omitted in the order absolute, with which alone it is necessary to deal. This action was commenced on the 14th of July, 1902, and the claim alleges that the order is erroneous in law in so far as it purports to create a charge upon the cash in the hands of Bennett, and it asks that the order may be reviewed and discharged to that extent. It is argued that the charge on the cash was not authorized by the Judgments Act, 1838, as amended by the Judgments Act, 1840, and that the error is of such a nature as would have supported a bill of review in the old Court of Chancery, and that the relief which might have been obtained by means of such a bill ought now to be given by action. Wright, J., has held that the action cannot be maintained, and from his decision this appeal is brought. It may be assumed for the present purpose, but without deciding it, that the charging order was not justified by the statutes, and that the error is apparent on the face of the order. It is important to remember that in the Court of Chancery, until comparatively modern times—that is to say, until the reign of Charles II.—there was no appeal from the Lord Chancellor to any higher tribunal, but an opportunity was afforded of correcting decisions by means of a rehearing, which might be before the same or any other judge. This right of rehearing could, however, only be exercised before a decree or order had been enrolled, up to which time it was not considered to be, in the full sense of the term, a record of the court. If an enrolled order was bad on the face of it, a means existed for correcting such an order by a bill of review. It will be sufficient to refer to one of Lord Bacon's orders in Chancery dealing with this subject-matter. "No decree shall be reversed, altered, or explained, being once under the great seal, but upon bill of review, and no bill of review shall be admitted except it contain either error in law appearing in the body of the decree, without further examination of matters of fact, or some new matter which hath arisen in time after the decree, and not any new proof which might have been used when the decree was made; nevertheless, upon new proof that is come to light after the decree made, and could not possibly have been used at the time when the decree passed, a bill of review may be grounded by the special licence of the court and not otherwise": see Beames's Chancery Orders, 1. It was, however, well settled that, if there was error apparent on a decree or order which was not enrolled, neither a bill of review nor a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review could be maintained, but the investigation of the matter must be brought on by a petition of rehearing: see Mitford on Pleading (3rd ed.), p. 71. Now, in the present case, the order absolute has not been enrolled. The procedure by bill of review, therefore, could not have been applied under the old system. A petition of rehearing might have been presented, but that would have been the only remedy. Now, it has been held that since the Judicature Act no judge of the High Court has jurisdiction to rehear, such jurisdiction being essentially appellate: In re St. Nazaire Co. It seems to follow logically from what has been said that the High Court has now no jurisdiction to review its own order on the ground of apparent error by means of an independent action, and that the party complaining must come to the Court of Appeal. The convenience of this view is obvious. If an appeal is presented within the reasonably short time allowed by the general orders no question will arise. If, as in the present case, the party complaining allows the time limited to pass by, the Court of Appeal has still full power to enlarge the time: see ord. 58, r. 15. Subject to proper conditions and under special circumstances, the Court of Appeal would extend the time. But in considering an application for extension regard would be had to any laches or delay on the part of the applicant, and to what, if anything, had been done under or in reliance upon the order sought to be discharged. There is no authority binding the court opposed to the above view. Doubtless there is ample jurisdiction now to deal by fresh action with some matters which were formerly the subject of a bill of review or of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review. For instance, where a judgment has been obtained by fraud (Birch v. Birch, 50 W. R. 437, [1902] P. 130); or where fresh material evidence has been obtained since the judgment which could not have been previously procured (Boswell v. Coaks) an action may be maintained. Actions of this nature do not invite the High Court to rehear upon the old materials. Fresh facts are brought forward, and the litigation may be well regarded as new and not appellate in its nature, because not involving any decision contrary to the previous decision of the High Court. Reliance was naturally placed upon the observations of Kay, J., in Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., to the effect that the old jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to allow a bill of review is not affected by the Judicature Act. The learned judge was dealing with an application for leave to bring a fresh action on the ground of the discovery of a new and material document. It was a case falling within the second branch of Lord Bacon's order. His decision that such an action may be maintained was quite correct, though it can scarcely be contended, since the judgment of the House of Lords in Boswell v. Coaks that the leave of the court is now necessary. If, however, the dictum is taken as an assertion that all the old jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery with respect to bills of review, including the jurisdiction to discharge an order on the ground of error apparent on the face of the order, is now vested in the High Court, we think it cannot be supported. It follows that in our opinion this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bennett & Chance.

Solicitor for the defendant, W. J. Hunter.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Dec. 16.

In re JORDAN.
HAYWARD v. HAMILTON. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Trustee—Breach of trust—Claim for replacement of property—Executors of trustee—Representatives of trust estate.

In an action by a cestui que trust against the executors of a deceased trustee (who was not the last surviving trustee) for the replacement of trust property alleged to have been lost by breaches of trust, the representatives of the trust estate must be made parties to the action. If there are no such representatives, and there is a power of appointing new trustees, that power must be exercised and the new trustees joined as parties.

This was an action by a beneficiary under a marriage settlement dated the 11th of December, 1869, and made between L. N. Hayward of the first part, Jane Jordan of the second part, and C. Jordan and D. Ludlow of the third part.

The plaintiff sued the defendants as executors and trustees of the said C. Jordan for replacement by them out the estate of the said C. Jordan of a sum equal in value to certain of the trust properties comprised in the settlement and alleged to have been lost by breaches of trust on the part of the said C. Jordan.

It was alleged by the statement of the claim that C. Jordan and D. Ludlow, the trustees of the settlement, committed breaches of trust causing a loss to the trust estate of about £1,600; that C. Jordan died in 1882, and that the defendants were his executors; that D. Ludlow died in 1886; that no new trustees of the settlement had been appointed; that L. N. Hayward died in 1885; and that his widow, Jane Hayward had in 1901 appointed the trust properties in favour of the plaintiff, subject to her own life interest.

The plaintiff claimed that defendants, as C. Jordan's executors, were liable to make good the settlement moneys lost by C. Jordan's breaches of trust; that a sum equivalent to those moneys should be set aside and invested, as the court might direct, to answer that loss; and that if necessary an account of those moneys should be taken, and administration of the real and personal estate of C. Jordan granted.

A preliminary objection was taken at the trial that the trustees of the settlement ought to be represented by adding as defendants either the representatives of D. Ludlow or persons to be appointed as new trustees.

Norton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the plaintiffs.

Rowden, K.C., and T. L. Williamson, for the defendants.

BYRNE, J.—In this case an action is brought by a beneficiary under a settlement dated in 1869 asking for a declaration that the defendants, who are executors of a deceased trustee, are liable as such executors to make good a loss which has occurred to the settlement funds. The only parties who are defendants are the representatives of a trustee who was not the last surviving trustee. Therefore there is nobody before the court representing the trust estate. The person who has the right to recover moneys belonging to the settlement is, if there be such a person in existence, the representative of the last surviving trustee. The cestuis que trust can come into court to recover money which was lost, joining the person in whom the right to recover it is legally vested, by reason of the power of the court to execute trusts and to allow beneficiaries to sue in their own names, if a sufficient case be shown. Cases have been cited, of which In re Harrison, [1891] 2 Ch. 349, 39 W. R. Dig. 167, is the chief example, where it was held that, an action having been brought against a surviving executor and trustee, it was not necessary to make the representative of a deceased trustee a party. In that case, in an action for a general account against a surviving executor and trustee, it was held that it was not, in the absence of special circumstances, necessary for the plaintiff to make the representative of a deceased trustee or executor a party. If the defendant require such representative to be added, and the circumstances of the case rendered it advisable that he should be so added, the R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, rr. 11 and 48 provide the machinery for that purpose. Chitty, J., gave his reasons for saying the action might be brought in that form. He says (at p. 354), "Many judgments have been made without any opposition against a surviving executor and trustee, without joining the representatives of others who had died before the action was commenced, where there were no special circumstances in the case rendering it necessary that they should be parties. The order goes in the well-known form." But no authority has been cited showing that judgment could be given in an action of this kind, which in fact involves something in the nature of a partial execution of the trusts, without having the persons representing the trust estate before the court. It may be that there is no present trustee, as there may be no representative of the last surviving trustee, or, if there be one, that he has refused to accept the trusts of this settlement. But, in the present case, there is a person entitled to appoint new trustees of the settlement, and, if there be no trustees, such an appointment ought to be made, and there is no reason why the existing trustees, if any, or such new trustees, should not be brought before the court.

(a.) Reported by PERCY WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is argued that this action is not asking for execution of the trusts, but is only brought for a declaration that the estate of the deceased trustee is liable for breaches of trust. The plaintiff is not really entitled to be paid any money found due, and it would be difficult to make such an order except in the presence of the parties entitled to be paid, though, of course, in a proper case, possibly somebody might be appointed to represent the capital of the trust. But it does not rest there. The plaintiff's estate wants an order founded on it—the investment of a sum to answer the loss. The case is of some importance, for there is no authority which covers it, and I do not say that there may not be cases in which the court might entertain such an action as the present, in a case where it is impossible to get representatives before the court. But when it is possible to do so some person should be appointed to represent the estate. The case must stand over to enable the present trustees to be joined, or, if there are none, to enable new trustees to be appointed and added as defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Kinch, for Lyndon, Moore, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, W. R. Smith & Smyth, for Gardners.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Oct. 28.

MONTEFIORE v. GUEDALLA. (a.)

Trustee—Will—Construction—Power to appoint new trustees—Donee of power appointing himself—Sanction of court.

The fiduciary character of a power to appoint new trustees renders it improper for the donee of the power to appoint himself, save in exceptional circumstances; it does not in itself exclude him from the class of persons capable of being appointed. Accordingly, where it is beneficial to the trust that he should be appointed, and provided that he is not excluded by the language of the instrument creating the power, it is competent for the donee to appoint himself and for the court to confirm the appointment so made.

Tempest v. Lord Camoys, 58 L. T. N. S. 221, 36 W. R. Dig. 207, followed.

In re Skeats' Settlement, 42 Ch. D. 522, 38 W. R. Dig. 202, and In re Newen, [1894] 2 Ch. 297, explained.

This was a summons taken out by Edmund Sebag Montefiore, Cecil Sebag Montefiore, Sir Samuel Montagu, and Richard Dawes, the executors of Sir Joseph Sebag Montefiore, who was the last surviving trustee of the will of Judah Guedalla, that they might be at liberty as such executors to appoint the said Cecil Sebag Montefiore, Isidore Spielmann, and Samuel Isaac Cohen trustees of the said will.

By his will Judah Guedalla, after appointing certain persons his trustees and bequeathing divers legacies and declaring certain trusts concerning his residuary estate, declared that on the death, refusal, or incapacity to act of any of the trustees therein before named or of any trustee or trustees to be appointed in their or any of their places, or if any or either of such trustees should be desirous of retiring from his trusteeship, it should be lawful for the acting trustee or trustees for the time being of his will or the executors or administrators of the last acting trustee to appoint a new trustee or trustees in the place of such trustee so dying, refusing, or becoming incapable to act or wishing to retire as aforesaid.

The estate of Judah Guedalla was being administered by the court, and its sanction was therefore necessary for the appointment of new trustees.

Cecil Sebag Montefiore was not beneficially interested under the will of Judah Guedalla, and circumstances rendered it desirable that he should be one of the new trustees.

The beneficiaries supported the present application.

A. H. Jessel, for the applicants.—The only difficulty arises from the fact that Cecil Sebag Montefiore, one of the proposed new trustees, is himself one of the persons having the power to appoint. In In re Skeats' Settlement it was held that a power of appointing new trustees being fiduciary, the donee of such a power cannot appoint himself. That case was followed in In re Newen. My contention is that such an appointment is not void, but only voidable. The donee ought to appoint himself only under exceptional circumstances. That was the view taken by Chitty, J., in Tempest v. Lord Camoys, which was cited in In re Skeats' Settlement: see also Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 654. In the present case the circumstances are exceptional, and there is nothing in the wording of the power to prevent the donee appointing himself. The court can, therefore, sanction the appointment.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

G. S. Alexander, for the beneficiaries.

BUCKLEY, J.—This is a question arising out of an application for the sanction of the court to the appointment of new trustees. There were certain trustees, of whom Sir Joseph Montefiore was the survivor. He died, having made a will appointing four executors, and Cecil Sebag Montefiore is one of those executors. The four executors are desirous of exercising their power of appointing new trustees of the will of Judah Guedalla, and wish to appoint three trustees, of whom Cecil Sebag Montefiore is one. The only question I have to decide is whether it is competent for them to make such an appointment and for me to approve of the appointment so made. Mr. Jessel has cited a number of cases bearing upon the point, and I have considered them in order to investigate whether the court has ever laid it down as a principle that the donee of a power of appointing new trustees cannot appoint himself, I say emphatically cannot, for the question is not whether it is improper for him to do so, but whether it is impossible in the sense that he is outside the class of persons who are capable of being appointed. I do not think that the court has ever laid down such a rule. The first step is to examine the language of the power. Where you find that the power is to appoint some other person, the question may arise whether the donee of the power is not excluded from the class of persons capable of being appointed, and must, therefore, appoint some person other than himself. In the present case the word "other" does not appear. The words of the power are simply "to appoint a new trustee or trustees"; so that by the language of the instrument the appointers are not excluded from the class. I am of opinion that the cases have laid down the principle, not that an appointer is outside the class who can be appointed, but that, save in exceptional cases, the appointer should not appoint himself. The principal case is In re Skeats' Settlement, decided by Kay, J., in 1881. The headnote there is "that a power of appointing new trustees being fiduciary, the donee of such a power cannot appoint himself." That is not strictly accurate, for the judgment is that he can, but ought not to appoint himself, unless the circumstances are exceptional. I need not read the judgment, but it is plain that if he had meant the opposite to what I have said, he must have considered and differed from the decision of Chitty, J., in Tempest v. Lord Camoys, which had been decided the year before and was cited to him; for in that case Chitty, J., held that it was competent for the donee of such a power to appoint himself. If Kay, J., had intended to differ from that decision he would have referred to it in his judgment. The other case referred to was that of In re Newen, decided by Kekewich, J. There it is plain what the learned judge meant. The circumstances were that one of the persons having the power to appoint new trustees, was herself appointed a new trustee. The application was that the court should hand over the trust funds to the trustees. It declined to do so so long as she remained a trustee. Kekewich, J., said that she ought to retire from the trust by a proper deed, that is to say, that she ought to retire from an office which he held that she had improperly retained for herself.

The effect of the cases, therefore, is that persons having a power of appointment of new trustees can, when the language of the instrument creating the power allows them to do so, appoint one of themselves, but that such an appointment ought only to be made in exceptional circumstances.

In the present case there is an administration action, and the sanction of the court is required for the appointment. I hold that the appointment of Cecil Sebag Montefiore is within the language of the power, and that in the present case it will not be an improper exercise of the power. I therefore give the executors leave to make the appointment.

Solicitors, Emmanuel & Simmonds.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 11.

TADDY & CO. v. STERIOUS & CO., ET AL. (a.)

Sale of goods—Contract to sell at minimum price—principal and agent—Contract—Who is agent.

A retail dealer of merchandise is not bound by conditions as to its retail price that were imposed upon its wholesale dealer by its manufacturer, in the absence of an express contract in respect thereto made with the wholesale dealer. A wholesale dealer who, having bought goods, resells them for his own profit, is not an agent of his vendor; and he is not made so, because the contract between them provides that he shall be deemed an agent in the event of a sale by him to a retail dealer.

Action.

In this case the plaintiffs, who were manufacturers, asked that the defendants should be restrained from selling the plaintiffs' manufactures unless they sold at those prices and under the conditions that were particularized in invoices issued by the plaintiffs, and in notices affixed to the boxes containing such manufactures.

The facts were as follows: The defendant Netten was a wholesale dealer in the goods manufactured by the plaintiffs, and the defendants, Sterious & Co., were retailers of such goods. For a long time the invoices of the sale of the goods had borne an endorsement as to the lowest price at which the goods should be retailed. The same price appeared on the box, which contained the goods and which also showed that the goods were sold by the manufacturers upon the express condition that retail dealers did not sell the goods below the prices previously named; and that acceptance of the goods would be deemed a contract between the purchaser and the manufacturers that the former would observe such condition; and that where a retail dealer bought through a wholesale dealer, the latter would be deemed the agent of the manufacturers. The defendants, Sterious & Co., had cognizance of the above conditions, but asserted a right to sell at a price lower than that fixed by the plaintiffs, and did so. There was, in the course of the trial, a dismissal as to the defendant Netten.

Macnaghten, K.C., and H. B. Howard, for the plaintiffs.—Sterious & Co. bought the manufactures from Taddy & Co., through their agent Netten. Where personal property is disposed of with notice of a prior contract, for its use in a particular manner, entered into by the person disposing of it, the person taking it with such notice may be restrained from using it otherwise; De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. and J. 276; Incandescent Gas Light Co. v. Cantelo, 12 Rev. Pat. Cas. 262; Elliman et al v. Carrington, 49 W. R. 532, [1901] 2 Ch. 275; Watkins v. Rymill, 31 W. R. 337, 10 Q. B. D. 178.

Micklem, K.C., and L. Mossop; Vernon R. Smith, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for defendants.—The condition as to price did not bind Sterious & Co. With respect to them the condition was one which was in restraint of trade, and therefore void: Hilton v. Eckersley, 4 W. R. 326, 6 E. & B. 47; Urmston v. Whitelegg, 63 L. T. 455; Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181.

(a.) Reported by H. STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The plaintiffs claim a contract through an agent, Netten, with the defendants Sterious and Co., who were bound by the conditions under which the goods were sold, even if the agent had sold them without a reference thereto. Such conditions, however, are in restraint of trade, and cannot be enforced upon subsequent purchasers. There was no direct contract with the defendants. The plaintiffs sold their manufactures to a wholesale dealer who, for his own profit, resold them; and obviously was not an agent. The defendants contended that the language of the condition, "in the case of a purchase by a retail dealer through a wholesale dealer the latter shall be deemed the agent of" the plaintiffs, referred to the case of a wholesale dealer who was an agent of the plaintiffs; and was not applicable to a case where a wholesale dealer bought and resold, but in such case the wholesale dealer was not an agent of the manufacturer; and the fact that the condition declared that he should "be deemed an agent" did not convert him into one if in fact he was not one. There was no privity of contract between Taddy & Co. and Sterious & Co., and the action would be dismissed.

Solicitors, Rivington & Son; Westbury.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) Nov. 16.

VICKERS v. SELWYN. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Ownership qualification—Freehold benefice—Pew-rents—Interest in land—8 Hen. 6, c. 7.

Where the right to receive for his own benefit the pew-rents of a church is vested in the vicar by virtue of his office, even though such right arise merely by implication from the terms of the licence of the bishop when appointing the vicar, the pew-rents may, in such circumstances, constitute an equitable freehold interest in land within the meaning of the Registration Act, 8 Hen. 6, c. 7.

Quære whether the mere actual receipt of pew-rents by the vicar for his own use would of itself be sufficient to constitute an interest in land.

Ex parte Arrowsmith, 26 W. R. 600, 8 Ch. D. 96, discussed.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Romford Division of the county of Essex.

The respondent the Reverend H. E. Selwyn had duly claimed to have his name inserted in the ownership portion of the register of the said county; the nature of his qualification, as stated in his claim, being "freehold benefice," and the description of the qualifying property being "St. Matthew's Church, Stratford.

Due notice of objection to the claim had been given by the appellant Vickers; the ground of objection being that the respondent had not a freehold interest in land of the clear yearly value of not less than forty shillings.

At the Revision Court the following facts were proved or admitted:

The respondent Selwyn had been appointed to the office of vicar of the church of St. Matthew, at Stratford, in 1901, by licence from the bishop of that diocese, and the licence authorized the vicar to receive and enjoy the stipends and profits belonging to his office, which stipends consisted of (inter alia) the annual pew rents paid by parishioners and others for pews and sittings in the church.

Apart from this licence, there was, however, no assignment by deed or writing, of the pew rents to the vicar.

It was admitted that the pew rents were collected by the churchwardens, and that they were, in fact, handed over to, and received by, the vicar for his own use and benefit.

The revising barrister found as facts: (a) that the vicar was possessed of a freehold office and beneficially entitled to the freehold of the church; (b) that the pew rents amounted to a sum of not less than £190 per annum; (c) that the pew rents were collected by the churchwardens "as agents for, and on behalf of, the vicar," and were received by him, by virtue of his office, for his own absolute use and benefit; and upon these facts he held that by reason of the pew rents, the freehold benefice of the vicar was of the clear yearly value of not less than forty shillings.

He according allowed the vicar's claim.

Due notice of appeal was given by the objector, and the barrister accordingly stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Roskill, K.C. (C. G. Palmer, with him), for the objector, the appellant.—The revising barrister has come to an erroneous decision. The vicar's claim is based on the ground that he has a freehold interest of the value of not less than forty shillings a year. But the vicar must shew, which he has failed to do, that the receipt by him of pew rents gives him an interest in land such as is contemplated in the statute creating the franchise. Although the right to receive the rents after collection by the churchwardens is not in dispute, it is clearly an interest of a limited character, and does not confer on him the right to sue the pew renters, nor give him any of the ordinary rights of a freeholder. His right is merely that of a person who has the enjoyment of a yearly sum arising out of a licence which was acquired in his freehold property by someone else. Although the freehold of the site of the church and the fabric of the church belongs to the vicar, he does not thereby acquire any interest in the pews which belong to the parishioner, although they are attached to the freehold. The pew rents vest in the churchwardens, and it is the churchwardens who have the right to collect and, if needs be, sue for the rent of the pews and sittings. The revising barrister stated in the case that the churchwardens collected the pew rents "as agents for the vicar." He does not, however, state any ground for that finding. But assuming that is correct, and that there is authority to be found for it in the licence of the bishop, that does not affect the argument that the only beneficial right to receive the rents the vicar has is limited to his right to require the churchwardens to hand over the rents that are in their hands. Kirton v. Dear, 18 W. R. 144, 5 C. P. 217, is a decision in my favour. [DARLING, J.—But you cannot detach a pew from the freehold of the church, and if the vicar, though by a roundabout process, takes the pew rents he gets a money value out of freehold, which in this case is more than 40s.] [KENNEDY, J.—In Roger's Ecclesiastical Law, at p. 173, the whole question is discussed. It seems that the right to a pew is a right to stand, sit, or kneel at a particular part of the church during divine service, and by custom, if not by statute, the vicar has a right to charge a parishioner for that privilege.] The right to a pew is but an easement; and the right to take money from a person who has acquired an easement is a right that falls short of a freehold interest: see Hinde v. Charlton, 15 W. R. 226, L. R. 2 C. P. 104. The question is considered obiter by Bovill, C.J., in Berwick v. Alker, 21 W. R. 72, L. R. 8 C. P., at p. 267. The statutes that deal with the question are 8 Hen. 6, c. 7; 13 Eliz. c. 20; 18 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 6; the "Church Building Act, 1818 (58 Geo. 3, c. 45); and the "New Parishes Act," 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 104). In Ex parte Arrowsmith, 26 W. R. 600, 8 Ch. D. 96, the vicar attempted to charge or mortgage his pew rents and it was held that he could not do so under 13 Eliz. c. 20. The words of 8 Hen. 6, c. 7 creating the franchise are "free land or tenement of the value of 40s. above all charges," and therefore the freehold to found such a qualification must be an interest in land capable of being charged. [KENNEDY, J.—But that case also decided that the interest which the vicar desired to mortgage was a substantial interest, not a mere easement.]

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Daldy, for the claimant, the respondent.—The revising barrister has found that the pew rents are collected by the churchwardens as agents for the vicar; and the provisions of section 10 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104 show clearly that the vicar has a right to receive these pew rents subject in certain cases to deductions for repairs to the church which are not material here. I rely also on section 4 of the New Parishes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 65), as showing that where there is no deed of assignment the vicar is entitled to the pew rents quâ his status as freeholder. In Beswick v. Alker the phrase occurs "under the sentence of consecration" and a similar expression was in that case made use of by the revising barrister. The right to the rent of a pew is analogous to the right to receive rent from glebe land or the tithe property, and it is attached to the office of vicar: see Ex parte Arrowsmith. Therefore, for the appellant to succeed here, he must show that the value of the pew rents is less than 40s. a year, and there is an express finding by the revising barrister that the pew rents are far above that value.

Roskill, K.C., in reply, cited Simey v. Marshall, 21 W. R. 123, L. R. 8 C. P. 269.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think we cannot interfere in this case. I think, in fact, that the revising barrister stated his case in a way in which it is impossible for the point we have been discussing to be properly raised. He found that the freehold of the living was in the vicar, and then goes on to state that the pew rents were collected each half year by the churchwardens as his agents, and were handed to him by the churchwardens for his own absolute use and benefit, and that the pew rents were above the value of 40s. In the case of Beswick v. Alker the report of the judgments shows that the judges recognized that there might be such an interest in the pew rents payable to the vicar as would give him a right to registration. Brett, J., clearly considered, although not called upon to decide the question, that the ownership of the freehold of a church was a freehold interest that created a freehold right in the pew rents. That is the view taken by the revising barrister here. We have no materials upon which we can say that he is wrong, and it is not denied that if his finding on this point is right that the interest is over 40s. In Arrowsmith's case James, L.J., pointed out that the vicar's interest in a pew rent was of the same kind as a toll which the lord of a manor receives for stallage in a market. It is, he said, "a profit arising from the use of the freehold." The other judges agreed with that view, and that decision seems to show that an equitable freehold interest in land may exist from the fact of a parson receiving pew rents. I cannot bring myself to hold, therefore, that on the facts before us we ought to disturb the decision of the revising barrister in this particular case. I think we are bound by the finding as to the agency of the churchwardens, and that our judgment must be limited to the facts found here, leaving open the general question whether a freehold interest in land is created by virtue of the mere receipt of pew rents by a vicar.

KENNEDY and DARLING, JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

Appeal dismissed with costs; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors, Russell Cooke & Co.; Ayrton, Biscoe, & Barclay.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) June 30, 1903.

RUTHER v. RUTHER. (a.)

Justices—Married woman—Order for maintenance—Act of adultery—Discharge of order—Committal for non-payment of arrears—Appeal to Divisional Court—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 7, 9, 11.

An order for a weekly payment by a husband towards his wife's maintenance, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, is ipso facto discharged upon proof before a court of summary jurisdiction that the wife has subsequently committed adultery, even if the husband has been guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery, and even if no formal order of discharge be made by the court.

The order of the court of summary jurisdiction committing a husband to prison for non-payment of arrears alleged to be due to the wife is not an order in respect of which an appeal lies to the Probate Court, but an appeal lies by way of case stated to the King's Bench Division.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrates at Merthyr Tydvil.

The facts of the case are as follows:

On the 16th of November, 1898, an order was made by two justices, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Abergavenny, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, that the appellant should pay to the respondent, his wife, the weekly sum of 10s.

On the 4th of December, 1901, the appellant applied to the court of summary jurisdiction at Abergavenny for the discharge of the said order, on the ground that the respondent had, subsequently to the date of the order—namely, on the 27th of September, 1901—committed an act of adultery.

The adjudication of the court on this order was that the respondent had committed adultery on the date alleged, and that the appellant, by his wilful neglect, had condoned such act of adultery.

On the 29th of January, 1902, the appellant was, by order of the court of summary jurisdiction in Abergavenny, committed to gaol in default of his paying certain arrears under the said order, amounting to £55 10s., being the arrears of the weekly payment for the period of two years seven weeks—viz., from the 7th of August, 1899, to the 25th of September, 1901—and the appellant was imprisoned accordingly. The period of imprisonment terminated on the 29th of April, 1902.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 3rd of December, 1902, an information was preferred by the respondent before the stipendiary magistrate of Merthyr Tydvil, alleging that the payments under the order of the 16th of November, 1898, were in arrear to the amount of £18.

A warrant was issued by the magistrate for the apprehension of the appellant, and the appellant was brought before him on the 5th of January, 1903. It was admitted that no payment had been made by the appellant after the 25th of September, 1901, but it was not proved in what way the sum of £18 was arrived at.

It was admitted, on behalf of the appellant, that he was liable to pay, and he was in fact prepared to pay arrears as between the 25th of September, 1901, and the 4th of December, 1901 (the date of the above indorsement on the order), and costs, if the £18 included any part of those arrears.

It was admitted by the respondent that she had committed adultery since the appellant had been committed to prison on the 29th of January, 1902.

It was contended by the appellant that, upon proof of the adultery of the respondent on the 27th of September, 1901, section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, operated to discharge the order of the 16th of November, 1898, as from the 4th of December, 1901; and, in the alternative, that it was the absolute duty of the court of summary jurisdiction at Abergavenny to discharge the order, and by the indorsement on the order the court must be taken as having done so, and that the order was therefore in law discharged, and that the stipendiary magistrate had no jurisdiction in the matter of the respondent's information in respect of arrears after the 4th of December, 1901.

For the respondent it was contended that the order was still in force.

The magistrate held that the order had not been, and could not be, discharged without an order of the Abergavenny justices or of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and he committed the appellant to prison for one month unless the sum of £18 and costs should be sooner paid.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether this decision was right in law.

By the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 6, it is provided that no order shall be made under the Act if it be proved that the married woman who is applying has committed an act of adultery, provided that the husband has not condoned, connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct conduced to, such act of adultery; and, by section 7, if a married woman upon whose application an order has been made commits an act of adultery, such order shall, upon proof thereof, be discharged.

By section 9 the payment of any sum directed to be made under the Act may be enforced in the same way as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation; and, by section 11 an appeal lies from any order, or the refusal of any order, to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court.

Rowsell (Warburton with him), for the respondent.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this case. The appeal should have been to the Probate Division: Manders v. Manders, [1897] 1 Q. B. 474.

[Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We will hear the case before giving our decision on the preliminary objection.]

S. G. Lushington, for the appellant.—The magistrate had no power to commit the appellant. The language of section 7 is imperative, and as the act of adultery on the 27th of September, 1901, was proved, the justices must be taken to have discharged the order

Rowsell, for the respondent.—The magistrate was right. Until the order is discharged it remains in force, and the appellant was, therefore, liable to make the payments. The proviso in section 6 must be read into section 7.

Lushington replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—With regard to the preliminary point I am clearly of opinion that in the circumstances of this case an appeal by way of case stated lies to this division of the High Court. The Act of 1895 provided a new and amended procedure for making orders for the maintenance of wives, and by section 9 it is enacted that the payment of any sum of money directed to be paid by an order under the Act may be enforced in the same way as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation. The procedure for enforcing payment is therefore regulated by section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, which empowers magistrates, where an order for payment has not been made, and no sufficient distress can be had, to commit the defendant to prison for any term not exceeding three months. For the respondent, reliance is placed on Manders v. Manders, and it was argued the appeal ought to be to the Probate Division, but Manders v. Manders was a case of an appeal from an order on a husband for a weekly payment made under the Act of 1895, whereas in this case the appellant is not appealing against the original order, but from the warrant of the magistrate committing him to prison for non-payment, which is issued under the Bastardy Act, and is not an order such as is referred to in section 11 of the Act of 1895. It is, moreover, quite clear that if the question involved in this case had been raised by certiorari, there would have been no objection to the proceedings. For these reasons the preliminary objection fails.

With regard to the substantial question raised by the case, it appears that in 1898 an order was made under section 4 of the Act of 1895 for the payment by the appellant to the respondent of a weekly sum of 10s. In 1901 the appellant had got into arrears with his payments, and a sum of £55 was owing by him. He ascertained that the respondent had committed an act of adultery, and he applied to the justices that the order might be discharged in accordance with section 7 of the Act. The justices found that the adultery was proved, and, in my opinion, it then became their duty, under section 7, to discharge the order. What they did was to make an indorsement upon the order in the terms set out in the case. I do not know what was intended to be the effect of that indorsement. It may be the reason of it was that the justices desired to make it clear that the wife's remedy was to be kept alive as to arrears of payment which had accrued due before that date. But, however that may be, I am of opinion that after the adultery had been proved on the 4th of December, 1901, the order ought to have been discharged, and from that date it ceased to be an effective order. The appellant was committed to prison for non-payment in respect of the period before the date of the adultery, and then the present proceedings, in which a sum of £18 was claimed, were instituted, and a committal order was made. The appellant offered to pay so much of that sum as represented the arrears up to the 4th of December, 1901, the date of the adjudication as to the wife's adultery, and in my opinion he was not liable to pay anything after that date. The magistrate had, therefore, no power to send him to prison for non-payment of the £18, and this appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the preliminary objection the matter stands thus: Orders for payment made under the Act of 1895 are, by section 9, to be enforced in the same way as affiliation orders, and on looking at section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, one sees what the procedure is. Therefore, an order of committal for non-payment is not an order made under the Act of 1895, and is not one to which section 11 of that Act applies. It stands on the same footing as an order of committal made in an ordinary affiliation case. That order is, of course, subject to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, s. 2, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33, which give justices power to state a case after the determination of any information or complaint. The provisions are by section 54 of the latter Act made specifically applicable to sums due on affiliation orders or on orders enforceable as affiliation orders. The magistrate had, therefore, jurisdiction to state this case.

As to the main question it is clear there is no power to order a committal for non-payment of the weekly sum after adultery on the part of the wife has been proved. I do not mean to say the respondent was not entitled to recover arrears in respect of the period between the date when the adultery was committed, and the date when the order ought to have been discharged, but the sum of £18, for the recovery of which these proceedings were instituted, covered more than that period, and the magistrate, therefore, had no power, in the circumstances of this case, to send the appellant to prison for non-payment of the sum of £18. If the case had come before the court on application for certiorari, there can be no question but that the warrant of committal would have been quashed.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. The only point of substance which has been raised on behalf of the respondent is whether conduct by a husband conducing to his wife's adultery has the effect of preventing the husband from obtaining the discharge of the order, in the same way as such conduct before an order prevents the husband from relying on the adultery as a reason why an order should not be made. In my opinion it would be impossible to adopt such a construction of section 7. The proviso in section 6 cannot be read into section 7. That being so, the appellant ceased to be liable to continue the payment after the adultery was proved. The other questions are simply matters of form.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for C. & W. Kenshole, Aberdare.

Solicitor for the respondent, H. A. Sims, for Powell & Hughes, Brynmawr.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) July 14, 20, 27, 1903.

In re SLOBODINSKY.
Ex parte MOORE (TRUSTEE). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Transfer by the bankrupt of his own and another business to a limited company—Relation back of trustee's title—Rights of debenture-holders—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (b); ss. 43, 44, 49—13 Eliz. c. 5.

The bankrupt transferred all his own assets and a business which he had agreed to purchase from another trader named Melinsky, within three months of his bankruptcy, to a limited company in consideration of shares and debentures, leaving himself saddled with debts amounting to over £13,000 and no means of paying for them.

Held, that the transfer was void as an act of bankruptcy, and that the trustee was entitled to the assets of the company, subject to the rights (if any) of the debenture-holders.

The debentures in the company had, by direction of the bankrupt, been allotted as follows: 18 to the debtor; 30 to one Nevill, who had assisted the bankrupt in transferring his assets to the company; 30 to Melinsky, in payment for his business; 7 to Brodsky, a creditor; and 15 to Zisselman, another creditor of the bankrupt. After the bankruptcy the two last debenture-holders sold their debentures to Bernstein and Levartofsky for sums far below their face value. Bernstein and Levartofsky knew of the bankruptcy, but made no inquiries.

Held, that Melinsky's debentures were a charge upon the property of the company now vested in the trustee, but that Nevill was not entitled to any charge because he had notice of the bankrupt's fraud, nor Bernstein and Levartofsky, because, knowing what they did, they ought not to have purchased their debentures at an undervalue without inquiry.

Motion by the trustee to set aside the transfer of the debtor's business to a limited company.

The bankrupt, J. L. Slobodinsky, carried on business as a tobacconist at 68, High-street, Whitechapel, and other premises.

In October, 1902, he formed the plan of turning his business into a limited company, and from that time onward to the middle of December he bought unusually large quantities of stock on credit. He also, on the 27th of October, entered into an agreement to buy the business of another tobacconist named Melinsky for £4,400 in cash or bills, the contract to be completed on the 1st of December. Another tobacconist named Nevill agreed to act as the bankrupt's agent in carrying out the transfer to the proposed company.

On the 16th of December the company was registered as the J. L. S. Tobacco Co. (Limited), with a capital of £25,000 in one pound shares, the registered offices being at 68, High-street, Whitechapel.

The first meeting was held upon the 22nd of December, when the bankrupt, Nevill, Melinsky, and two nominees of the bankrupt, Fowler and Felgate, were appointed directors, and the bankrupt was elected chairman. The bankrupt's contract to buy Melinsky's business was read and approved, as were also two agreements, one being for the sale of the bankrupt's business and the benefit of the contract to buy Melinsky's business to Nevill, the other for the sale by Nevill of the same assets to the company.

The purchase price was fixed at £32,539, payable £400 in cash, £10,000 in debentures to be allotted to the bankrupt and his nominees, and 22,139 fully paid-up shares to be allotted to the bankrupt.

A meeting of the directors was held later on in the same day, when Nevill's contract with the company was sealed, also the assignment of the bankrupt's book debts and business to the company, and a contract between the company and Nevill for the issue of the agreed shares. A series of 100 debentures of £100 each was also created.

On the 23rd of December, 22,139 shares were issued as fully-paid to the debtor, and the 100 debentures were issued as follows:—

7	to Brodsky
15	to Zisselman
30	to Nevill
30	to Melinsky
18	to the bankrupt
100

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Brodsky and Zisselman were creditors of the bankrupt, Nevill got his debentures as payment for the services he was alleged to have rendered, and Melinsky's debentures were in part payment for his business. About 665 shares in the company were privately subscribed and paid for in cash.

The result of the transactions above narrated was that the bankrupt, having transferred everything he possessed to the company, was left without any means of paying his trade or private debts, which amounted together to over £13,000. Accordingly he called a meeting of his creditors on the 29th of December, thus committing an act of bankruptcy, upon which a receiving order was made on the 20th of February. On the 9th of March Zisselman sold his fifteen debentures to Bernstein for £500, and Brodsky sold his seven debentures to Levartofsky for £300. The present motion by the trustee was against the J. L. S. Tobacco Co. (Limited), Nevill, Melinsky, Bernstein, and Levartofsky, and claimed all the assets transferred by the bankrupt and Nevill to the company, free from any incumbrance by virtue of the debentures.

Reed, K.C., and Wace, for the trustee.—The transfer to the company was clearly a fraud on creditors; the debtor got rid of all his assets and retained all his debts. In such a case the transferees have to show that they were purchasers in good faith. Ex parte Schulte, In re Mataulé, 22 W. R. 462, L. R. 9 Ch. 409; In re Jukes, 50 W. R. 560, [1902] 2 K. B. 58. In this case the company was not dealing in good faith with the bankrupt; it was a mere sham created by the bankrupt, and the principle of In re Hirth, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 47 W. R. 243, [1899] 1 Q. B. 612, and Wheatley's Trustee v. Wheatley (Limited), 85 L. T. 491, 50 W. R. Dig. 12, applies.

Macnaghten, K.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the company.—This is not a sham company like that in In re Hirth. This is a real company formed by the amalgamation of two businesses, and there are forty-seven members of the public holding 665 shares in the company. Nor is there any evidence that the company had notice that the debtor contemplated any fraud. The fact of one or two directors having notice is not enough: In re Marseilles & Co., L. R. 9 Ch. 161. The debentures were not gifts, but were allotted as payments for services rendered or other obligations incurred by the bankrupt.

M. Lush, K.C., and Carrington, for Melinsky.—It is clear that Melinsky's debentures ought not to be swept away, he transferred a valuable business to the bankrupt which the company now has and got his debentures in payment for it. There is no suggestion that he had notice of or was party to any fraud.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for Nevill.

Muir Mackenzie, for Bernstein.

E. Clayton, for Levartofsky.

Reed, K.C., in reply.

WRIGHT, J.—I think it clear that a fraud both legal and moral has been committed by the bankrupt, who formed the design to buy large quantities of stock on credit with the object of forming a company. That was a fraud, for the debentures and shares of the company were no equivalent to the creditors for the book debts and stock of the business which have been assigned to the company. But I am not prepared to hold that the company is in all respects a sham company, because there are some bonâ fide shareholders holding some 600 shares, and it also seems to me that Melinsky's business was a bonâ fide business and was sold in good faith to the company. I am sure that I ought not to hold the transaction void under the statute of Elizabeth, but I am not asked to deal with the case upon that footing, and I think the trustee is entitled to succeed under the bankruptcy laws. The transfer of the bankrupt's entire business and assets to the company on the 22nd of December was a fraudulent act of bankruptcy, and the trustee's title relates back to that date. Then can the company be said to have had notice of the fraud? I have come to the conclusion that the company in its inception and first formation was Slobodinsky, and was brought into existence by him with the sole object of committing the fraud. The first two directors were, in my opinion, his nominees, and Mark Nevill was his agent. He held nearly all the share capital and debentures of the company, and at the first meeting of the two directors on the 22nd of December they acted as his nominees and were entirely in his interest. If that does not amount to notice to the company I do not know what does. Further, I think that they knew that, under the agreements, all the assets of the bankrupt were being taken over by the company, leaving him with all his debts unprovided for, and I think that put them on some inquiry as to whether he had any means of meeting these debts. The transaction as between the trustee and the company must be set aside without prejudice and subject to the rights, if any, of the debenture-holders. That point is left open for future argument and I express no opinion upon it. The company must pay the trustee's costs.

July 20.—The motion was further heard. Bernstein and Levartofsky admitted under cross-examination that Slobodinsky had transferred all his assets to the company, and that he was bankrupt, and that they bought the debentures without making any inquiries.

The same counsel appeared and argued as on the former hearing.

Judgment was reserved.

July 27.—WRIGHT, J., after stating the facts, continued: I have already declared the transfer of this business to the J. L. S. Co. (Limited) to be fraudulent, and consequently void against the trustee. It now remains for me to decide the claims of the debenture-holders, and as to all of them except Melinsky, it might be enough to say that the debentures, being merely a general charge over the assets of this company, would not attach to any property which turns out not to have been the property of the company. As to Melinsky, there was no imputation of mala fides against him, and he undoubtedly transferred a valuable business to the company. He originally contracted to sell the business to the bankrupt on the 27th of October, 1902, before any act of bankruptcy had been committed, and before the period of relation back. The consideration originally agreed was £4,400 in cash or bills, which was afterwards altered to £400 in cash and debentures in the company of the nominal value of £3,000. He completed the transfer upon the 22nd of December without notice of any act of bankruptcy, and I hold that he is entitled to the protection afforded by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He has therefore a charge on the proceeds, but of course he cannot get back both his estate and the price; he is entitled either to get back from the trustee the estate which he transferred to the company or, if he gives up his estate, to rank on his debentures against the bankrupt's estate for any deficiency which he is unable to recover from the company's assets, and the trustee's title must be declared to be subject to his charge from that deficiency, if any, if the sale to the company is affirmed. As to Nevill, I hold that he is not entitled to his debentures; he gave no real consideration for them and never rendered any serious or valuable services for them. He must also be regarded as having taken them with full knowledge of Slobodinsky's position, and could not in any case be entitled to the protection of section 49.

The remaining debenture-holders, Bernstein and Levartofsky, purchased their debentures from nominees of the bankrupt for much below their face value, and with the knowledge that the debentures purported to cover Slobodinsky's estate, and that he was a bankrupt. The knowledge of these facts should have put them upon inquiry, they are not the kind of purchasers that a court of equity would assist. It is admitted that they are not within the terms of section 49 as they did not take from Slobodinsky, but it is said that an exception from the trustee's title by relation back must be allowed on general principles to purchasers for value whether immediate or secondary. The facts which I have stated appear to be enough to dispose of any contention of that kind in this case. It may be that although section 49 in its terms protects only those alienees who have taken immediately from the debtor, some degree of protection may be supplied on grounds of equity even to secondary alienees. In case of settlements avoided under the statute of Elizabeth, or under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, it has been found possible even at law to protect persons who, before the occasion for avoiding a settlement has arisen, have become purchasers or incumbrancers for value without notice of grounds for avoidance. There is much greater difficulty in cases like those which are now in question, where the trustee's title is established by relation back and the statute contains no applicable exception. It is indeed sufficient to refer to cases like Copland v. Stein, 8 T. R. 199, and Nunes v. Carter, L. R. 1 P. C. 342. 349, in order to show that an alienee however innocent was not aided at law except in the cases specified by the statutes for the time being in force. Equity, however, did not altogether refuse relief: see Abery v. Williams, 1 Vern. 27; Collett v. De Gols, Cas. t. Talb. 65; Latouche v. Lord Dunsany, 1 Sch. & Lef. 137, 152; Wilkes v. Bodington, 2 Vern. 509; and it may be that at the present day it would be right to apply or even extend the equitable doctrine. That, however, could only be done in favour of a purchaser whose title is without stain, and certainly not in cases like those which are now in question; nor in any case could the purchaser be protected on equitable grounds to an extent beyond the real value of what he paid or gave as the consideraaion of his purchase: see the cases last cited.

Melinsky will add his costs to any security he may have. Each of the other respondents Nevill, Bernstein, and Levartofsky, will pay the costs of his own part of this further hearing of the motion.

Solicitors for the trustee, Trower, Still, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ralph Raphael & Co.; Swestland & Greenhill; W. H. Lane; Hyman, Isaacs. & Lewis.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). } Aug. 7, 1903.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTRIC LIGHTING CO. v. LONDON CORPORATION. (a)

Metropolis—Contract between members of the corporation and a company—Interest of a member as shareholder —"Interested or concerned in any company"—City of London Sewers Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.), s. 42—City of London Sewers Act, 1851, s. 53.

The 42nd section of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848, provides that any contract entered into [by any commissioner of sewers or member of the corporation, by or on behalf of the commissioners, who is "directly or indirectly interested or concerned" therein shall be void. The prohibition of such contracts extends to the case where members of the corporation are shareholders in a company at the time when the contract with the City Corporation is entered into, but does not apply where members subsequently become shareholders in a company to which the contract is transferred.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 306, [1901] 1 Ch. 602) affirmed.

Cross-appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.).

The whole question turned on the construction of the 42nd section of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848.

In this action the appellants claimed a declaration that three several agreements—(1) dated the 19th of May, 1890, and made between the Brush Electrical Engineering Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the "Brush Co."), of the one part, and the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London (hereinafter called the "Commissioners of Sewers") of the other part; (2) dated the 28th of May, 1890, and made between the Laing Wharton and Down Construction Syndicate (Limited) (hereinafter called the "Laing Syndicate"), of the one part, and the Commissioners of Sewers of the other part; and (3) dated the 5th of February, 1891, and made between the Brush Co. of the one part, and the Commissioners of Sewers of the other part—were valid and subsisting, and that the defendants were bound by the same.

The facts of the case are given in the report below, and shortly in the judgments, where the 42nd section is set out.

Cripps, K.C., and Roskill, K.C., for the company.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Danckwerts, K.C. (A. J. Walter with them), for the corporation.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case a declaration is sought to establish the validity of three contracts, entered into between the City of London Electric Lighting Co. (Limited) and the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London, and the question sought to be raised by the parties is whether or not the contracts, or any of them, entered into between them are valid and binding on the defendants. The defendants have repudiated them, not, as I understand, that they have any objection to the substance of the contracts, but being advised by counsel that the contracts were invalid they felt bound to test that question in a court of law. Farwell, J., before whom the question came, was of opinion that they were valid. The Court of Appeal has declared two of them to be invalid, allowing the third to stand.

The whole question turns upon section 42 of the

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London Sewers Act, 1848, which provides "that no person being a commissioner or a member of the court of aldermen or of the common council of the city, shall be directly or indirectly interested or concerned in any contract which shall be made or entered into by or on behalf of the commissioners, for the execution of any works by this Act directed or authorized to be done or executed, or for furnishing materials or labour of for any other matter or thing whatsoever, upon pain that every such contract shall be null and void, and that the person who, being a commissioner or a member of the said court of aldermen or of the common council, shall be so interested or concerned therein, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £100 to any person who shall sue for the same, to be recovered in any of the superior courts, by action of debt or on the case."

At the date of the contract there were shareholders among the commissioners, aldermen, and common councilmen in the plaintiff company; and I so far agree with Farwell, J., that I think the first thing to see is whether the Act of Parliament is clear or is fairly susceptible of two constructions; but I regret to have to add that I think it is clear and is not fairly susceptible of two constructions. In a very ingenious and elaborate judgment the learned judge decides in favour of the validity of the contracts in question upon the ground that they are not what he calls "construction" contracts; but I am unable to concur with the view that the section is only applicable to construction contracts. If such a distinction can at all be made, the disqualification under the statute which I have quoted does not apply.

The mayor and corporation of the city are now (since 1897) in the place of those who at the date of the contract were the Commissioners of Sewers of the City. By the Act of 1897 all their duties and liabilities are now vested in the city itself. That the aldermen, commissioners, and common councilmen have a disqualifying interest in the contracting companies cannot be denied unless the distinction insisted on by the learned judge can be made out. In respect of two of the three contracts it is admitted that a common councilman, a commissioner of sewers, and a Lord Mayor for the time being, in that character both an alderman and ex officio-commissioner, were shareholders; and in respect of those two contracts, heartily as I regret the conclusion at which I am forced to come, I cannot doubt that these contracts by reason thereof are invalid. I have striven to escape the stringency of the language, since I think that no one will doubt that the contracts were fairly and properly made with a due regard to the public interest; but I cannot escape from the language of the statute. It is, to my mind, too clear to enable me to adopt the subtle reasoning of the learned judge below. The distinction which the learned judge has discovered may justly be made in this respect—that some of the contracts undoubtedly are construction contracts, and some of them are not; but the defect of the reasoning I think consists in this—that the distinction which the learned judge has discovered is one not made by the statute. The words are "directly or indirectly interested or connected in any contract which shall be made or entered into by or on behalf of the commissioners for the execution of any works by this Act directed or authorized to be done or executed, or for furnishing materials or labour or for any other matter or thing whatsoever." I am unable to interpose any qualification. Looking at the language of the statute and the object and the policy which apparently dictated it, I cannot doubt that it meant what I think it has said in plain terms. It seems to me that the contracts are contracts, interest in which is prohibited by the contracting parties; among other things it is a contract made or entered into by or on behalf of the commissioners for any matter or thing whatsoever, and in addition to contracts for the execution of works or for furnishing materials. I am unable to get over the stringency of these words, and I must hold them to be applicable to the two contracts in respect of which Farwell, J., held them to be valid.

With respect to the third contract, I agree with Stirling, L.J., that a different question arises where at the time of the making of the contract no commissioner, alderman, or common councilman was a shareholder; and I agree with him that under the circumstances stated in detail by the learned judge the contract has not become invalid because, at a subsequent date, several commissioners, aldermen, and common councilmen became shareholders. The result is that I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord DAVEY.—The judgment of Farwell, J., in this case is based on the division which he thought was to be found in the Act of 1848 of the contracts authorized by that Act into two classes or categories. One class of contracts he called "construction contracts," and he considered that the provisions of section 42 related only to contracts of that character. The phrase "construction contracts," as used by the learned judge, has a very elastic meaning, for it includes contracts for supply of materials or labour. The distinction, as stated by him, was between contracts for the execution of works or supply of materials to the city which will become their own property, and contracts for supply of such things as water, gas, or other illuminants by persons owning the works from which the supply is derived; and these contracts he calls "contracts of supply." I must confess that, in my opinion, this division of contracts is not warranted by anything in the Act of 1848, and is purely fanciful and arbitrary, and in fact there is no real difference for legal purposes between the two classes of contracts. Gas, electricity, and water are all of them, it is true, res quæ ipso usu consummuntur, but so are materials for road-making or paving, although the rate of consumption is somewhat slower.

Following out his theory of two classes of contracts, the learned judge holds that section 33 applies only to what he calls construction contracts, and that the words "or for any other matters or things whatsoever necessary for enabling them to carry the purposes of this Act into full and complete effect" are to be read as ejusdem generis with the preceding words. The words which follow requiring every contract to be in writing, and to specify the works to be done and the material or labour to be furnished, and the prices to be paid for the same, do, I think, lend some support to the view—if it were possible (which, in my opinion, it is not) to find a genus which would embrace contracts for the supply of paving-stones and road material and exclude contracts for the supply of gas, electricity, or water. I think, however, that it is quite inadmissible to cut down or restrict the generality of the very large words which I have quoted. I agree with Rigby, L.J., that one can hardly imagine words better calculated to exclude any ejusdem generis construction. Farwell, J., thought that section 116 alone gave the power to make contracts for lighting the streets. I do not so read the Act. I think the power to contract is conferred on the commissioners by section 20, and the meaning of section 116 is that, instead of doing the work of lighting the streets themselves, they may contract with gas companies and other persons to do it for them.

Having arrived at the conclusion that section 33 applies only to "construction contracts," he holds that section 42 also applies only to the same class of contracts. But if the ejusdem generis construction could be applied to section 33, I can find no reason for applying it to section 42, in which the words are "any contract which shall be made or entered into by or on behalf of the commissioners for the execution of any work directed or authorized to be done or executed, or for furnishing materials or labour or for any other matter or thing whatsoever." It is easy to say that, if the words were intended to apply to all contracts, the words specifying particular kinds of contract are unnecessary. But that is not a very strong argument when applied to the language of Acts of Parliament. The enumeration may show the kind of contract the draftsman had immediately present to his mind, but the latter words equally show that he intended the enactment to apply to all contracts of every kind. If you took at the intervening section, I think it clear that section 34, which is the only section in the Act defining the mode and form in which contracts by the commissioners are to be executed, and section 41 are general sections applicable to all contracts for any of the purposes of the Act. If section 34 is general, section 33 must be so also; and if section 41 is general, I think that section 42 also must apply to every contract.

Another argument put forward by the appellants is based on section 53 of the Act of 1851. I have had some difficulty in appreciating the argument. A section in the latter Act cannot be used for the purpose of construing an earlier enactment, though it may repeal or vary it. There is certainly no express repeal, and there is no repugnancy between the two sections from which the repeal of the earlier one might be implied. Section 42 of the Act of 1848 imposes a penalty on parties interested in any contract made by the commissioners and avoids a contract in which any of the specified parties are interested. Section 53 of the Act of 1851 deals with a different subject-matter rather than with the same subject in a different way. It makes any of the specified persons ineligible to sit or vote as a commissioner while the contracting with any company in which he is interested or the promotion or carrying out of any work, undertaking, or speculation is under the discussion of the commissioners. A person may be a commissioner when the negotiation for the contract is being conducted and resign his seat (as he would probably do) before the contract is actually made, or he may have become a commissioner after the contract is made, and in that case he is prohibited from sitting or voting while the carrying out of it is under discussion. In neither of these cases would the earlier enactment apply, but the latter one would apply to both.

I fully appreciate the stringency and drastic character of the enactment in section 42 of the Act of 1848. It applies to any common councillor, whether he is a commissioner or not, and the remotest interest in the contract will not only expose the interested person to a penalty of £100, but will also avoid the contract. But the stringency of the section is not a reason for a court of law to decline to give effect to it or construe it otherwise than according to the plain meaning of the words. I cannot, therefore, but agree with the judgment of my learned and lamented friend Rigby, L.J., in holding the contracts relating to the Western and Central districts void.

The complicated history of the contract for the Eastern district has been very carefully analyzed and stated by Stirling, L.J. It appears that no person within the jurisdiction was interested in the Laing Wharton and Down Syndicate, with whom the contract was made, but certain persons were shareholders in the company to which the contract was afterwards transferred. I am certainly not disposed to extend the operation of section 42 beyond what the words require, and I do not think that a contract which was valid in its inception is avoided by a person within the prohibition subsequently acquiring an interest in it. The Lord Justice also finds that there was no novation so as to place the appellant company in the position of contractors directly with the corporation. It is true that the appellant company has become the undertaker within the meaning of the provisional order, and is now the only company able to exercise the powers thereby conferred. That, however, will not itself place them in a contractual relation with the corporation. I agree with the Lord Justice that in giving their consent to the transfer of the undertaking to the appellants the corporation carefully preserved their rights under the original contract, and have not discharged the original contractors from liability for its performance. I think, therefore, with him that there has been no new contract made between the appellant company and the corporation as regards the Western district. I am therefore of opinion that both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON.—On the cross-appeal I am unable to discover a contract entered into between the commissioners and the London Electric Co. That the London Electric Co. are, with the consent of the commissioners (and their successors the corporation), doing the work of the original contractors does not prove that the commissioners have contracted with them. The commisioners could only contract in the manner prescribed by the statutes creating their powers, and there is no such contract. This being so, the London company not standing in a contractual relation to the commissioners, there is no room for any argument about a supervening nullity in a contract originally valid, and we have no occasion to deal with that argument.

Turning then to the two contracts with a company in which one at least of the commissioners was a shareholder at the time of their execution, the question is whether they are not hit by section 42. It cannot be disputed that the general words which express the third category in section 42 are so wide as to comprehend all contracts, unless there be something outside those words to restrain their latitude. That restraint is found by the appellants in the theory (for it is no more) that section 42 is coterminous with section 33, and that section 33 is limited to a certain class of contracts. Now, on section 33 there is a great deal to be said, and it has been well said, for the view that the generality of the third category is taken away by the concluding words of the section. But then those concluding words do not (and could not from the subject-matter) occur in section 42, and accordingly the general words of the third category, as they stand in section 42, are left without any qualification of their generality, and must have their natural effect.

But I do not think that the argument in favour of their full latitude ends here. Section 42 is introduced by the words "Provided always and be it enacted," and section 42 is thus to be read as a qualification of the preceding section 41. So read it is the condition of an indemnity which is necessarily and admittedly applicable to contracts of every description, and is therefore itself naturally and necessarily universal. In this light the two sections mean this:

the commissioners shall not be personally liable for any of their contracts, provided that in none shall they have a personal interest, and that any contract so tainted shall be null. So viewed, section 42 treats of a subject to which the suggested distinction among contracts (as construction contracts and other contracts) is irrelevant. It is true that in section 42 the system of enumeration adopted in section 33 is again used, although no enumeration was necessary, and words of absolute generality without any antecedent enumeration would have been more appropriate. This, however, is only criticism of the drafting; and the phraseology adopted ends just where danger to the generality would have begun. I therefore think that the context and subject-matter of section 42 entirely justify the literal interpretation of its terms. And the relation between section 41 and section 42 seems to me specially important, because it breaks the connection between sections 33 and 42, which is at the root of the appellants' argument. On the scope of section 42, moreover, I think that the respondents succeeded in showing that in at least two other instances besides section 116 the commissioners are authorized to enter into contracts which do not fall under section 33, and which it is difficult to conceive to have been intended to escape the application of section 42.

Section 53 of the Act of 1851 seemed at first to carry the appellants some way; but a closer examination greatly reduces its importance. That section mixes up a number of persons, things, and times, and applies general words to them all. It is only by picking out the shareholder and applying him to one of the things at one of the stages that the appellants' argument arises; and when it does arise it does not present a repugnancy with the wide interpretation of section 42 of the Act of 1848, but rather a superfluity. The explanation of the Court of Appeal seems to me to be adequate to satisfy the language even when minutely examined. The section does not, in my judgment, raise any implication sufficient to overcome the considerations to which I have already adverted.

It is quite true, as the appellants have pointed out, that the complicated questions arising out of shareholding in limited companies are very crudely dealt with by the provisions of statutes passed before that system had been established. But the Acts of 1848 and 1851 both deal with the case of commissioners being shareholders in companies, and it is impossible to deny that a shareholder in a limited company comes under section 42. This is enough for the decision of the present case.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co.

Solicitor for the respondents, Sir Homewood Crawford.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 7, 8.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS CO. (a.)

Gas company—Local government—Testing of gas—"Daily"—Inclusive of Sunday—Practice—Parties—Appeal—Jurisdiction—Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 181), s. 7—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), s. 34—Metropolis Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), s. 55—Sunday Observance Act, 1677 (29 Car. 2, c. 7).

By the South Metropolitan Gas Co.'s special Acts of 1869 and 1876, provision was made for the public testing of the quality of the gas supplied by them to consumers. The mode of testing and the locus and number of testing-places which were to be provided by the company, and to be under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, were to be prescribed by gas referees appointed by the Board of Trade, and "daily" testings were to be made by gas examiners appointed by the Metropolitan Board. Similar provisions were contained in the special Acts of the other metropolitan gas companies. By the Gas Companies Act of 1880, which was applicable to all the metropolitan gas companies, the provisions as to daily testing were (in effect) re-enacted; and by section 7 of that Act it was enacted that a gas examiner should at each testing-place make "daily" such number of testings as the gas referees should prescribe.

There was also a provision in the Special Act of 1869 which was to be read with the Act of 1880 defining "day" as twenty-four hours, beginning at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day and ending at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next. Under these Acts the practice had been to test on week-days only. In an action brought by the London County Council (the representatives of the Metropolitan Board of Works) against the gas company, claiming a declaration that the gas examiners appointed by the council were entitled to test the gas on Sundays, and an injunction to restrain the defendant gas company from preventing the gas examiners having access to the testing-places on Sundays,

Held, that the true meaning of "daily" in the Act of 1880 read with the Act of 1869, with reference to the South Metropolitan Gas Co., was "every day," including Sundays, taking the day as commencing at 9 o'clock in the forenoon; that the practice of not testing on Sundays prevailing under similar provisions in previous Acts of Parliament from 1869 to 1880 was not sufficient to justify the court to construe the word "daily" in section 7 of the Act of 1880 with reference to that practice; and that the plaintiff council were entitled to the relief claimed by their action.

Held, also, that the London County Council, as the "controlling authority" under the Acts, was entitled to bring the action in its own name as plaintiff.

Held, further, that although section 34 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, imposed a penalty recoverable in a court of summary jurisdiction for a refusal by the gas company to give proper access to the testing stations, yet the jurisdiction of the superior courts to deal with the matter was preserved by virtue of section 55 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860.

Decision of Joyce, J. (ante, p. 45, [1903] 2 Ch. 532), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant company from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported ante, p. 45, [1903] 2 Ch. 532).

The facts were as follows: The action was brought by the London County Council to obtain a declaration that the gas examiners appointed by them under the powers vested in the council by the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 229), and the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), were entitled at each appointed testing-place to make daily (including Sundays) such number of tests as the gas referees should prescribe for ascertaining whether during the whole of each day the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied at such testing-place by the defendant company were such as were respectively prescribed under the company's special Act; and further for an injunction to restrain the gas company from preventing, obstructing, or hindering the council's gas examiners from making the tests prescribed by the gas referees at each of the appointed testing stations of the defendant company on Sundays. The action was in short to establish the principle that the word "daily" in the Act was for the purposes of gas testing, inclusive of Sunday.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For the purpose of gas testing in the Metropolis there are three classes of officials videlicet — gas referees appointed by the Board of Trade, a chief examiner appointed by the Board of Trade, and gas examiners appointed by the "controlling authorities," who in the city were the Corporation of London, and for the rest of the Metropolis, were the plaintiffs. The council having passed a resolution that the gas supplied by, amongst other companies, the defendant company should be tested on Sundays, the gas examiners attended at the various gas testing stations of the defendants for this purpose on Sunday, the 2nd of November, 1902, but were refused admittance by the caretakers in charge, acting on the instructions of the defendant company, and this refusal was continued on subsequent successive Sundays. Accordingly a writ was issued aginst the company on the 16th of December, 1902, for the purpose of testing the question whether the word "daily" included Sunday.

The Metropolis Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), s. 22, enacts: "The gas company shall well and effectually light all public lamps in all streets which they are required by the local authority to light, and shall, according to the terms of their contract, supply to the local authority so much gas as they require for their public lamps. . . ." And by section 24, "Every gas company shall, unless prevented by necessary repairs or unavoidable accident, at all times keep all their branch or service pipes fully charged with gas. . . ."

By the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 130), s. 3, the term "day" (subject to an exception not material) is defined as meaning "twenty-four hours, reckoned from 9 o'clock in the forenoon of one day to 9 o'clock in the forenoon of the next following day, so much of each day as is before 9 o'clock in the forenoon being reckoned as part of the immediately preceding day of the month or week." The gas referees are appointed by the Board of Trade under section 15 of the same Act, and they prescribe the mode and times for testing the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied by the company, which testing-places and apparatus were to be under the control and management of the Metropolitan Board of Works, who were the predecessors of the plaintiff council.

The Act further provided for the appointment by the Board of Works of gas examiners, whose duty it was at each testing-place daily to test the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied. The provisions of the Act of 1869 as to testing and the appointment of gas examiners were repealed and re-enacted with certain modifications by the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 229), under section 35 of which the gas referees are to prescribe the places or stations at which the tests are to be made, and the gas company are to provide and maintain the testing-places and the apparatus and materials therefor prescribed by the gas referees; and under section 36 the prescribed testing-places, materials, and apparatus provided by the company are to be under the control and management of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Section 37 provides that the company may also have a separate testing-place in the same building under their own control and management; by section 39 the gas examiners are appointed by the council. Between 1869 and 1876 similar provisions were enacted with respect to the other metropolitan gas companies. The provisions of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, relating to the testing of gas, were repealed by section 4 of the company's special Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 130).

By section 40, sub-section 8, of the Local Government (England and Wales) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), the powers, authorities and liabilities of the Metropolitan Board of Works were transferred to the plaintiffs, and are now vested in them. In the year 1879 the name of the defendant company was changed from the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co. to the South Metropolitan Gas Co. Certain of the provisions of the Act of 1869 relative to testing were repealed by the company's Act of 1876, and the like provisions of this Act were in turn repealed by the Gas Light and Coke and other Companies Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 181), which now regulates the testing of gas supplied by, amongst others, the defendant company. By section 4 of that Act it was provided that the Act should apply to the metropolitan gas companies therein enumerated (which included the defendant company); and that the special Act of such company as amended by this Act, should be construed together as one Act. Section 7 provides as follows: "A gas examiner shall at each testing-place make daily such number of tests as the gas referees may prescribe for ascertaining whether during the whole of each day the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied at such testing-place by the company are such as are respectively prescribed under the special Act provided that the tests for illuminating shall be taken at intervals of not less than one hour." Section 8 provides as follows "The average of all the testings at any testing-place on each day of the illuminating power of the gas supplied by the company at such testing-place shall be deemed to represent the illuminating power of such gas on that day at such testing-place."

The defendants in their defence denied that testings had ever been made on Sundays, that since 1869 or thereabouts Sunday had always been treated as a 'dies non' by the defendants, otherwise it would give unnecessary and extra labour to their caretakers and workmen; they also relied on the Sunday Observance Act, 1677 (29 Car. 2, c. 1), and contended that the word "daily" in section 7 of the Act of 1880 must be taken in the sense of only meaning week day—that is, working days.

Joyce, J., held, that primâ facie the word "daily" meant every day; that notwithstanding the practice of not testing on Sunday, such practice could not alter the words of an Act of Parliament; and he accordingly granted the injunction claimed by the plaintiff council.

From this decision the defendant company appealed.

Two new points were raised by the defendant company upon the appeal. First, that the London County Council were not the proper plaintiffs in the action, and that the Attorney-General should have been joined as co-plaintiff; and secondly, that the jurisdiction of the High Court was excluded by the provisions of section 34 of the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), which Act was incorporated with the South Metropolitan Gas Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 172), s. 3, and thereby applied to the company's undertaking; the argument on this point being that section 34 of the Act of 1871 imposed a penalty, recoverable in a court of summary jurisdiction, for a refusal by the gas company to allow proper access to the testing stations, and consequently that the jurisdiction of the High Court was thereby excluded.

Warmington, K.C., Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., and L. Rostron, for the appellants.—The word "day" is defined by section 3 of the Act of 1869, and by section 42 of the Act of 1876. Sunday is a dies non. This court is not dealing with an Act passed for the first time, but with the latest edition of what has been the subject of enactment since 1869. There has arisen a practice of the local authority and their successors whereby the word "daily," which primâ facie includes Sunday, was understood to exclude that day. Where a new offence has been created or a new liability imposed, and a statute has imposed a special penalty, that remedy only is to be pursued. Section 34 of the Act of 1871 gives a special remedy, and the plaintiffs should have applied to some court of summary jurisdiction to punish the offence; they cannot claim a declaration or injunction: Mayor of Devonport v. Tozer, ante, p. 6, [1903] 1 Ch. 259; Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, [1894] A. C. 347; Barraclough v. Brown, [1897] A. C. 615, 46 W. R. Dig. 64. The Act of 1871 applies to the defendants. The Act of 1860 incorporates the Act of 1847, and the Act of 1871 is to be read by section 1 thereof as one with the Act of 1847; and the Acts of 1871 and 1880 are to be construed as one: South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Noakes, 61 L. T. N. S. 556, 38 W. R. Dig. 83; Dudley Gas Works Co. v. Warmington, 29 W. R. 680; Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Leeds, 19 W. R. 19, 5 Ch. App. 583; Attorney-General v. The Great Eastern Railway Co., 22 W. R. 281, L. R. 6 H. L. 367; Canada Southern Railway Co. v. The International Bridge Co., 8 App. Cas. 723. The plaintiffs are not entitled to fix the day for testing, the examiners must. They are there in an independent and judicial capacity, and they should have sued. The statutes restricting Sunday trading apply: 5 & 6 Ed. 6, 29 Car. 2, c. 7, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 43.

They also referred to the following cases: Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, 40 W. R. Dig. 217; and Yewens v. Noakes, 28 W. R. 562, 50 L. J. Q. B. 132.

Hughes, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the respondents.—Having regard to the interpretation section of the Act, two days would be excluded if Sunday was excluded. The Act of 1880 cannot be read so as to exclude Sunday: Peacock v. Reg., 4 C. B. N. S. 264; Rawlins v. West Derby Overseers, 2 C. B. 72; Ex parte Simpkin, 2 E. & E. 392; Calder and Hebble Navigation Co. v. Pilling, 14 M. & W. 76; Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawkesford, 7 W. R. 244, 6 C. B. N. S. 336, at p. 356. Here is an obligation without a penalty attached to it. There is a penalty imposed for not keeping up the standard of illumination and purity, but none for not giving access to the testing stations. The imposition of a penalty by a subsequent Act, even if commensurate with the whole of the preceding Act, could not take away a remedy existing at common law. Taking section 3 of the Act of 1871 it cannot affect the gas company. The South Metropolitan Gas Act of 1881, s. 2, enacts that the Act of 1871 should apply to an undertaking as if authorized, therefore the Legislature considered that the Act of 1871 did not apply to the company at all, and had no application to the Act of 1880. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The Gas Works Act of 1845 if incorporated applies]. The defendants say the Act of 1847 is to be construed with the Act of 1881 as one Act, and that in the Metropolis Gas Act of 1860 the Act of 1847 is incorporated, therefore you must read the Acts of 1847, 1860, and 1881 all as one Act: Commercial Gas Co. v. Scott, 23 W. R. 874, L. R. 10 Q. B. 400. With regard to the jurisdiction, section 55 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125) provides "That no special remedy or provision for giving relief to any person given by this Act shall prejudice or diminish the general jurisdiction of any of her Majesty's superior courts of law or equity over or with respect to the acts or defaults in respect of which the special remedies or provisions are so given." The persons whose duty it is to see that the examiners under the London County Council do their duty, and the modes in which they do their testing, have nothing to do with the council, that is for the referees but their duty to test is under the jurisdiction of the council. The council are under the Act the "controlling authority" (see section 2 of the Act of 1880), and their duty is to see that the examiners test, and by section 5, the testing-places are under the authority of the "controlling authority." The statement of claim is perfectly correct. The defendants do not say that the testing involves on their servants any additional Sunday labour. From 1869 to 1880 they used to make gas on Sundays. The obligation on the company is to supply gas of fourteen candle power, but a forfeiture is not incurred provided that average is kept up. The council are bound to get access on Sundays for their examiners.

Warmington, K.C., in reply.—The defendants have no direction from the gas referees to test on Sundays; the county council certainly have special powers under section 6; but as to each day, the gas referees are the only authority who can prescribe the number of tests to be given. The practice pursued by the local authority must be taken into consideration in construing the last of a series of Acts of Parliament. The defendants admit the force of section 55 of the Act of 1860.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We in this court have nothing to do with the question of whether the practice of having no gas tests on Sunday was a convenient practice, or a practice which was advantageous to the public. That is not for us. The practice of having no tests on Sunday has existed for a long time, but that is not a reason why we should violate the plain construction of the Act of Parliament unless the practice has been of such a nature that we ought to impute to the Legislature the knowledge of it when it passed the subsequent Acts which have been referred to. In my judgment the present case is not such a case. We merely have to construe the words of section 7, which is: "A gas examiner shall at each testing-place make daily such a number of tests as the gas referees may prescribe for ascertaining whether during the whole of each day the illuminating power and purity of the gas supplied at such testing place by the company are such as are respectively prescribed under the special Act; provided that the tests for illuminating shall be taken at intervals of not less than one hour." Now, I cannot doubt that according to their natural meaning and their primâ facie meaning the words "make daily such number of tests" mean every day, inclusive of Sunday. I am not at all saying that you might not have an Act of Parliament in which those words were used which might admit of being differently construed, either by reason of the subject-matter of the Act of Parliament, or by reason of the contents of the Act of Parliament taken as a whole. That is not the case here. Both under the general Act of 1847 and the Act of 1881, and also under the special Acts of this company, and of each company, the obligation to supply gas of the proper illuminating power, and of the proper quality, is a continuing obligation, which has to be performed on every day; and in the nature of things, there is just as much necessity for having the illuminating power and quality of the gas tested on a Sunday as there is upon any other day of the week. Under those circumstances, having regard to the continuing nature of the obligation on every day, including Sundays, I cannot doubt myself that "to make daily such number of tests," &c., are words which apply to Sundays as well as to any other day of the week. That being so, the only question is whether one ought to construe these words differently by reason of the practice which has, as a fact, been maintained during all these years since, at all events, 1869, and, it may be, for aught I know, since 1847. Cases have been cited to show that sometimes you are not only entitled, but bound, where you have Acts of Parliament passed in reference to a matter on which there has been a continuity of Acts of Parliament in succession, running on the same lines, to take into consideration the previous practice. The strongest case, probably, of all those which were cited is the case, of Yewens v. Noakes, in which there is a judgment, amongst others, of Thesiger, L.J., in which he says, speaking of a case in which there was living in a house, occupying it, not only the caretaker himself, but his wife and children, and the question was whether the occupation came within the exemption to the statute: "Whilst it is true that we ought not to construe an Act itself by looking at the practice which has taken place in carrying the Act out, it is equally true that we are entitled to construe a subsequent Act, not only with regard to the actual words used, but also with regard to the practice which has grown up and existed at the time when the subsequent Act was passed."

That undoubtedly is a strong authority for saying that such practice may, in the case that he has described, be taken into consideration in construing the Act of Parliament, and I do not propose to depart from or whittle down that proposition in any degree. But what does the lord justice mean? Does he mean every practice by persons who had a statutory duty thrown upon them, and who throughout a considerable number of years, or a long period, have neglected to perform that which, according to the natural construction of the words, would be their duty? I think not. I do not think that he means to say that one is always to impute to the Legislature a knowledge of that neglected duty by those who had a statutory obligation thrown upon them. If it is not always that this imputation is to be made, when is it to be made? I think it is to be made in those cases in which it is reasonable to impute such a knowledge to the Legislature. A case in which it very usually has been done is this: very often in the antecedent or earlier Acts in similar frame, upon the same subject-matter, the very question of the interpretation of a particular section or of particular words in the Act of Parliament has come into court for decision, and the court has put a construction upon the words in the earlier Act of Parliament; then, when you come to the later Act of Parliament, the Legislature uses identical words. It could not, in such a case at all events, be supposed, however doubtful the construction of those words might be, that the Legislature passed the subsequent statute without knowledge of the previous decision upon the same words in similar Acts of Parliament. Then, again, take the case which was the actual case before the court in Yewens v. Noakes. That was a case in which the knowledge which was sought to be imputed to the Legislature was the practice of a public department in respect of inhabited house duty. One can quite understand that the practice of public departments might be supposed to be within the knowledge of the Legislature, but I do not think we ought to carry that so far as to say that the Legislature must have had within their knowledge and view the practice of the examiners as to holding no tests upon Sundays.

In these circumstances, it seems to me, there is no choice but to affirm Joyce, J.'s, decision, and to hold that these words "make daily" include every day of the week, Sunday inclusive.

Other points have been raised which it is not necessary to go into now, because matters were called to our attention this morning by Mr. Hughes which dispose of those points. I am not sure myself that the pleading is so drawn as to really cover the case which is now made on behalf of the county council; but even if in form it is not correct, I think we ought to disregard that, because Mr. Hughes has stated, without any contradiction from the other side, that the question which both parties intended to have decided, and wished to have decided here, was whether or not those testings could and ought to be held under the section on Sundays. That being so, we shall make any necessary alterations in the form of the prayer of the statement of claim. I think we are bound to hold that the testings ought to be made, and must be made, under the terms of the statute, on Sundays as well as on week-days.

ROMER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that this appeal fails. Upon what I may call the main question it appears to me to be clear that the decision of Joyce, J., is correct. Whether you look at the defendant company's special Act of 1869, or at the Act of 1876, or at the Act of 1880, it appears to me to be clear on the construction of those Acts that the word "daily" means what it says, and does not exclude any day in particular, like Sunday. On the Acts themselves, if there was nothing but the Acts to construe, I do not really think that any substantial argument on behalf of the appellants could be, or has been, addressed to us. The gas has to be supplied on a Sunday as well as on any other day, and there is just as much reason why the gas should be good on a Sunday and of proper quality, and so forth, on that day as on any other day. Why should it not be tested on that day as well as on any other day? Nor can I see why, under these Acts, any distinction should be attempted to be drawn between a day in the week, say, from Tuesday morning at 9 o'clock to the following Wednesday at 9 o'clock, or between Saturday at 9 o'clock to Sunday at 9 o'clock, or from Sunday at 9 to Monday at 9. I take the hour of 9 because, under the Acts, the days are defined with reference to 9 o'clock on one day to 9 o'clock on the following day. The only question is—and that forms really the basis of the argument of the appellants on this head—can the plain meaning of the Acts of Parliament be departed from as to the later Acts, because a practice has grown up of not taking the tests on Sundays, or because, as I understand, a police magistrate may have decided a case which implied that a testing on Sunday was not, in his opinion, obligatory under the Act? I think clearly not. There is nothing arising from the fact of that practice and that decision which would justify us in saying that when the Legislature passed the Acts of 1876 and 1880 it did not intend to enact what it had previously enacted in 1869—that the word "daily," as used in those subsequent Acts, was used exactly in the same sense as it was used in the Act of 1869.

With regard to the other two points, which were for the first time taken on this appeal, I can only say that, to my mind, with regard to one of them, which is as to whether the county council are entitled to sue, I clearly think they are. It was suggested that they had no sufficient interest in the subject-matter of this action to justify them in being the plaintiffs in this action. But the county council is the controlling authority under the Acts, and in particular it has the control and management of the testing stations committed to it; and why has it had committed to it the control and management of the testing stations? Clearly to enable it to carry out the duties and obligations cast upon it as a controlling authority.

Now, it appeared to the county council that gas being delivered on a Sunday, it ought to be tested on a Sunday according to the wording of the Act; but they find that the gas examiners, the testing operators, are not allowed by the defendant company to go to the testing stations which are under the control and authority of the county council. The county council, having the control, find that, but for the interference of the defendants the testing would go on, because the testers are quite willing and ready to go there, in fact, according to their duty; but the county council, as the controllers of the testing station, are prevented from allowing the testers to go there because the defendant company choose to say that no tests shall be made on the Sunday, and that no person except they themselves shall have any access to the testing stations on Sundays.

It appears to me that the county council have sufficient interest, obligations, and rights to justify them in coming to this court and seeking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from excluding, practically, the county council and the testers from the testing stations. And that, in substance, is what this action is for, the real question behind it being that which I have previously indicated, and which we have decided—namely, as to whether, under the Acts of Parliament, the testings ought to go on at all on a Sunday.

With regard to the other technical point taken on behalf of the appellants, that seemed to me to have something of substance in it until it was disposed of by the reference to section 55 of the Act of 1860, which destroyed whatever other validity the argument might have had. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal wholly fails, and should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with what has been said by Joyce, J., in the court below, and by my brethren here upon the main question which is raised by this action, namely, whether the word "daily" includes Sunday, and I do not think I can usefully add to what has been said by them.

With regard to the points which have been raised for the first time in this court, the one of most substance is that which would exclude the jurisdiction of the court by reason of the penalty being attached by the Gas Works Clauses Act of 1871 to a refusal on the part of the gas company to give proper access to the testing stations and so forth. But when the Act of 1860 of this particular company is referred to, it is found that the jurisdiction of the superior court is preserved; and it really has been admitted by Mr. Warmington that that section affords an answer to the argument which was based on the Act of 1871.

The other question is as to whether the London County Council is the proper plaintiff in the present action. Now I agree with what has been said by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that that is not an objection to which effect ought to be given, regard being had to what took place in the court below at the hearing of this action. I also agree with what has been said by Romer, L.J., and if it were necessary to decide it, I should be of opinion that the London County Council were proper plaintiffs. To them, by the Act of 1876, are entrusted the control and management of the testing places, materials and apparatus provided by the company, and it seems to me that so far from the company being entitled to control those places, the view taken by the Acts, particularly the Act of 1880, is that everything which is necessary to be done for carrying into effect the directions of the Act with respect to testing shall be dealt with by the "controlling authority"—namely, the London County Council—and not by the company. That is, to my mind, made very strong in particular by section 10 of the Act of 1880, which, whilst it gives the company the power, if they think fit, to be represented by an officer at each testing, provides that "the controlling authority shall state at what time it is proposed to make such testings on any particular day upon receiving a request in writing from the company in the forenoon of the previous day." That seems to me to show that it is for the company to apply to the controlling authority—the London County Council—for the purpose of giving effect to this portion of the Act, and that they—the company—have not the power of excluding the controlling authority and the persons authorized by them from the testing-stations which have been established under the Act. It seems to me that in this case there was a clear interference by the defendants with the control and management which is by statute vested in the London County Council. I think, therefore, the appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Hicklin, Washington, & Pasmore.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. A. Blaxland.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } July 2, 3, 4; Aug. 11, 1903.

GLAMORGANSHIRE COAL CO. (LIMITED) AND OTHERS v. SOUTH WALES MINERS' FEDERATION AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Trade union—Master and workman—Procuring breach of contract of service—Malice—*Bonâ fide advice—Just cause.

Interference with contractual relations known to law is a violation of legal rights, which is actionable unless there is sufficient justification for what was done. In deciding what will constitute sufficient justification, regard must be had to the circumstances of each case. Where a third person has procured a breach of contract between master and servant, he is not justified of necessity merely by showing that he had no personal animus against the master or that it was to the advantage of the servant that the contract should be broken.

In 1901 the South Wales Miners' Federation issued a manifesto ordering the men to stop work on certain days known as "stop days." This action occasioned great loss to the employers, but was induced by a bonâ fide belief that the workmen would be benefited by reason of the rise in the price of coal thereby caused. In an action by the employers for damages,

Held (by Romer and Stirling, L.JJ.; Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), that the action would lie, although there was no malicious intention on the part of the federation to injure the employers, and the federation bonâ fide believed that they were bound to act as they did in the interest of the men.

Decision of Bigham, J. (51 W. R. 59), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Bigham, J. (reported 51 W. R. 59, [1903] 1 K. B. 118).

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought by the Glamorgan Coal Co. (Limited) and seventy-three other plaintiffs against the South Wales Miners' Federation, its trustees, its officers, and a number of members of its executive council, to recover damages for wrongfully and maliciously procuring and inducing the workmen in the plaintiffs' collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs. In the alternative the plaintiffs also sued the defendants for wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspiring together to do the acts complained of.

The plaintiffs claimed both damages and an injunction.

The defence consisted of denials of the material allegations in the statement of claim, and of a plea that the acts complained of were done, if at all, with reasonable justification and excuse.

The case came on to be tried before Bigham, J., with a special jury on the 22nd of July, 1902, but after the trial had lasted three days the jury was discharged, and all questions of law and fact, as well as the ascertainment of the damages, if any, were by consent left to be dealt with by the learned judge.

The facts, as found by his lordship in his considered judgment, were as follows: "The plaintiffs are seventy-four limited liability companies associated together for the protection of their own interests under the style of the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coal Owners' Association. They work upwards of 200 collieries in the South Wales district, and in these collieries they employ about 100,000 men. The defendants are, first, the men's federation, a body registered under the Friendly Societies Acts, secondly the trustees of the federation, thirdly Mr. Brace (vice-president), Mr. Onions (the treasurer), and Mr. Richards (the secretary of the federation), and lastly six men who are members of the executive council of the federation, and who are also members of the workmen's half of a body known as the Joint Sliding Scale Committee. The trustees were joined as defendants merely in order to enable the plaintiffs to reach the funds of the federation in the event of a judgment being recovered for damages against that body. It appeared that for the last twenty or twenty-five years the masters and the men in the South Wales colliery district had worked together under an agreement, called the sliding-scale agreement, by which the rate of wages paid to the men was made to depend on the price for the time being of a certain agreed class of coal—that is to say, as the price of such coal rose or fell so the rate of wages moved up or down. It was thus to the interest, not only of the masters, but also of the men, to keep up the price of coal; but, at the same time, not to drive it up to such a point as would unduly interfere with the demand. Against the producers of coal there were always arrayed a number of coal dealers, known as merchants or middlemen, who buy coal to be shipped to foreign ports, or for resale in the South Wales market. The interest of those men was, of course, to keep down prices, so that they might buy as cheaply as possible. They frequently sold large quantities of coal for forward delivery at prices below those current for immediate delivery, trusting to supply themselves later on by purchases from one or other of the many collieries at prices which would make their bargains remunerative. This had the effect of depressing the market, and on more than one occasion, and particularly in the years 1896 and 1897, the masters and men had tried together to devise some scheme to so regulate the output of the mines, by means of stop days or otherwise, as to counteract this effect. There had, however, always been a difficulty in getting a sufficient number of the colliery proprietors to fall in with any scheme having for its object the restriction of output, and thus nothing had been done. On the 1st of April, 1898, a strike broke out in the South Wales district, and the collieries were closed from that date to the 31st of August. On the 1st of September work was resumed throughout the district. At the collieries of forty-seven of the plaintiff companies it was resumed under an agreement which embodied the old sliding scale. By this agreement it was provided that a joint committee of masters and men should be formed, which should be called the Joint Sliding Scale Committee; and that it should be comprised of twelve masters, representing the forty-seven firms, and of twelve men elected by the colliers in the employment of those firms. Each half of the committee was to have its own secretary, elected from its own twelve members, and it was contemplated that each half might from time to time meet separately to discuss matters affecting its own interests. One of the principal objects of the joint committee was to ascertain, by audits of the sales of the forty-seven firms, the average price of coal, for the purpose of regulating wages thereby. The agreement contained many other provisions, in addition to the provisions for the formation of the joint committee. The important clause of the embodied sliding-scale agreement was clause 23, which was as follows: "It is hereby agreed that all notices to terminate contracts on the part of the employers, as well as employed, shall be given only on the first day of any calendar month, and to terminate on the last day of the same month." Although only forty-seven of the plaintiffs were parties to that agreement, and were alone to be represented on the Joint Sliding Scale Committee, the men employed by the other twenty-seven plaintiffs went back to work on the same terms, both as to wages and notice, as those contained in the agreement. On the 11th of October, 1898, the defendant federation was formed, and practically all the miners in the South Wales district became members of it. They numbered about 128,000, and they included all, or very nearly all, the men who worked for the plaintiffs. The members at once proceeded to elect a president, a vice-president, a treasurer, and a secretary. They also elected an executive council, consisting of twenty-five men, who were to manage the affairs of the federation. The federation was subsequently—viz., in February, 1899—registered under the Friendly Societies Acts. By its rules its objects are declared to be—to provide funds to carry on the business of the federation; to take into consideration the question of trade and wages; to protect workmen generally; regulate the relations between them and employers; and to call conferences to deal with questions affecting the workmen of a trade and legislative character. On the 5th of November, 1898, the executive council met and resolved: "That this council in its entirety shall from time to time transact the whole of the business arising out of the sliding-scale agreement, notwithstanding that only twelve of the said council can appear before the employers to deal with the Sliding Scale Joint Committee," and, having passed this resolution, they then proceeded to elect twelve of their own body to serve on the joint committee. The forty-seven plaintiff companies objected to that election upon the ground that the council represented all the miners in South Wales, whereas the joint committee was to be composed only of the representatives of the forty-seven firms, and of the men who worked for those firms. Thereupon another election was held, at which only the men in the collieries of the forty-seven firms voted. They, however, chose the same twelve men as had been chosen by the executive council, so that the masters took nothing by their objection. The effect of this was, in his lordship's opinion, that the twelve working-men who formed the working men's half of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee became the mere mouthpiece of the federation, and took their instructions from the council of the federation, of which, as already stated, they were all members. The federation prospered greatly, so that by the end of 1900 it found itself in the possession of funds amounting to £100,000. The price of coals also rose, and with it the rate of wages. But in October or November, 1900, the council of the federation seemed to have felt some apprehension that this prosperity was being threatened by the merchant and the middleman. That being the season of the year at which foreign governments and others make their contracts for forward delivery of coal, the prices at which these contracts were being effected alarmed the council, and foreshadowed a fall in prices. Whether the fear was well-founded or not, his lordship could not say, but he was satisfied by the evidence that it was honestly felt. On the 3rd of November, 1900, Mr. Abraham, M.P., the president, made a speech at a meeting of the council of the federation, in which he said: "There is an attempt being made by middlemen and merchants to bring about an undue reduction in the price of coal; 80 per cent. of the employers are trying to counteract this movement, but three or four large firms appear to desire that it should be successful. I therefore suggest that steps be taken to bring about a stop-day throughout the coalfield as a protest against this action." Thereupon a resolution of the council was passed ordering a stop-day for Friday, the 9th of November, and a further resolution was passed that a general conference of the federation should be convened for the 12th of November. In the meanwhile the following manifesto was ordered to be circulated: "Fellow Workmen,—Your council, having seriously considered the present condition of the coal trade, are strongly of opinion that an organized attempt is being made to unduly interfere with trade and prices to such an extent as will prejudice the interest of the members of the federation. With a view of preventing the industry being exploited by merchants and middlemen, we have unanimously resolved that a general holiday be taken throughout the coalfield by all colliery workmen on Friday next, the 9th of November, 1900. We also request you upon that day to hold general meetings for the purpose of appointing delegates to attend a conference at the Cory Memorial Hall on Monday next, the 12th of November, 1900, to consider and determine our future policy, as embodied in the following resolution That the conference hereby authorizes the council to declare a general holiday at any time they think it necessary for the protection of your wages and the industry generally.—W. A. ABRAHAM." This manifesto had the desired effect, and on the 9th of November all the colliers in the coalfield, including the men working in the plaintiff's collieries, stopped work. No notice of any kind was served on the masters, and they knew nothing of the matter until they saw a report of Mr. Abraham's speech in the newspapers of the 6th of November. This stoppage on the 9th of November is the first matter of which the plaintiffs complained in this action. On the 12th of November, 1900, the conference which had been convened for that day was held, and at it a resolution was passed authorizing the council of the federation to declare a general holiday at any time they might think it necessary for the protection of wages and of the industry generally. Having regard to what happened twelve months later, and to the present contentions of the federation, this resolution, which was passed by the conference in compliance with the request of the executive council in their manifesto, was, his lordship thought, of considerable importance. The representatives of the masters on the Joint Sliding Scale Committee were annoyed at the course which the executive council had adopted, and on the 13th of November, 1900, they held a meeting at which the working men's representatives on the committee were present. The latter assured the masters that the action of the council had not been taken with a view to injuring the owners, or to interfering with the relations between owners and workmen, but only to show middlemen that they were not to be allowed to do with the markets what they had done in the past. This assurance the masters accepted, recording their acceptance in a memorandum in the minute-book of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee. The memorandum was as follows: "That, whilst accepting the assurances of the workmen's representatives that they thought they were acting for the good of the coal trade in having ordered a general stoppage of work at the collieries on Friday last, the owners' representatives are unanimously of opinion that the principle involved in such a stoppage is unsound, and the action is illegal, and will not achieve the object which the workmen's representatives apparently had in mind, and the owners' representatives protest against the course followed, for, so far from assisting the trade, such action is calculated to damage it, both temporarily and permanently. And, further, the owners' representatives are of opinion that, the stoppage having been in contravention of all established customs at the collieries, and so far-reaching in its effects, the general body of the associated owners will have to be consulted upon the course which the workmen have seen fit to adopt." On the 28th of November the associated owners met, and, after negativing the expediency of prosecuting the men, resolved as follows: "That the owners' side of the sliding scale committee point out to the workmen's representatives that a resolution has been passed by the association that, if the men make any future illegal stoppage, the owner will take proceedings against the men." Thus this incident was closed; and, if nothing further had happened, his lordship was satisfied that it would have been forgotten. He thought the masters were right in accepting the assurances of the men. He was quite satisfied that in ordering the stop-day the federation acted, as they thought, in the interests of the men, and without any intention, malicious or otherwise, of injuring the plaintiffs. His lordship's judgment next dealt with the events which led up to the ordering of the other stop-days in October and November, 1901, of which the plaintiffs complain. It was necessary to consider them with some care, inasmuch as the federation, by their counsel alleged that they did not order these stop days, and that they could not therefore be held responsible for them. In this connection it was to be remembered that on the 22nd of July, 1901, the House of Lords had decided in the Taff Vale case that a friendly society could be sued, and its funds reached, to answer any damages that might be recovered against it. On the 12th of October, 1901, the defendant Brace, the vice-president of the federation, made a speech to the miners, in which, after congratulating them on the flourishing position of the federation finances, he insisted that unless some steps were taken to prevent the depression of prices, which was likely to result from what he called the cut-throat competition in the trade, the workmen's wages would be seriously diminished; and in this connection he referred to the low prices at which contracts for coal had recently been made. He concluded by saying that "if there was the slightest tendency to a slump in prices brought about by unfair competition the executive council of the federation, in whom power was invested by the whole of the workmen, according to the conference resolution, would immediately declare a series of stoppages, with a view to regulating the supply according to the demand." Four days later, on the 16th of October, 1901, Brace made another speech, in which, referring to his speech of the 12th of October, he intimated that if a stop was ordered it would not be by the federation, but by the workmen themselves. On the 19th of October Mr. Richards, the secretary of the federation, made a speech to a body of miners, in which, replying to the possibility of a stop day being ordered, he said that the executive council would have to move carefully, in view of the decision of the House of Lords in the Taff Vale case, and that, if any notice of a stop was found necessary for the purpose of keeping up wages, it would come from the Sliding Scale Committee. About the same time, on the 18th of October, 1901, Mr. Onions, the treasurer of the federation, made a speech, in which, after observing upon the comparatively low prices at which some large contracts for coal had recently been made, he stated that some general action would have to be resorted to by the workmen to protect themselves, and that, in the face of the recent decision in the Taff Vale case, they would have to exercise great care. He added: "It would be better to take some action to save themselves now than to be compelled later on, when wages had been reduced to starvation point, to take drastic measures." Those speeches preceded a meeting of the executive council of the federation, which was held on the 23rd of October, 1901, and they foreshadowed what was to be done at the meeting. The federation, or its officers, obviously desired that one or more stop days should be declared, but, having regard to the decision of the Taff Vale case, they desired that the order for the stop days should be issued by some other body than their own, by some body which had no funds with which to answer any judgment that might be recovered in the event of the order turning out to constitute an actionable wrong. At the meeting of the executive council held on the 23rd of October, 1901, there were twenty-two members present, ten of them being also members of the working men's division of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee. The vice-president, Mr. Brace, and the treasurer, Mr. Onions, were there. Mr. Brace appeared to have called attention to several contracts for forward delivery of coal which had been made at many shillings below the average price as ascertained at the last sliding scale audit, and thereupon a discussion ensued as to whether the federation should take steps to counteract the bad effect of the contracts. Then it seemed to have been moved that the executive council should not take upon itself the responsibility of declaring any stop day; and to that an amendment was proposed that, if any stop days were to be ordered, the orders should be issued by the executive council of the federation, no other body having authority to do so. The amendment being put, only three voted for it, while nineteen voted for the original motion. Thus it stood recorded on the minute-book of the federation that the council of the federation should take no responsibility for ordering stop days. Immediately after this vote had been taken all the members of the council who were not members of the Sliding Scale Committee left the room; and the remainder, by some process not explained, resolved themselves into the working-men's half of the Sliding Joint Scale Committee and proceeded in that capacity to declare two stop days—the 25th and 26th of October, 1901—and thereupon the following manifesto was published: "To the workmen employed at the South Wales and Monmouthshire Collieries. It having come to the knowledge of your representatives upon the Sliding Scale Committee that large contracts have already been made at considerably lower prices than the average price declared by the last sliding scale audit, and fearing the result of those contracts upon annual and other contracts about to be made, which must of necessity mean a heavy reduction in wages, it was unanimously resolved that the workmen shall observe as general holidays Friday and Saturday next. (Signed) W. BRACE, ALFRED ONIONS, ENOCH MOREL, THOMAS EVANS, D. WATTS MORGAN, C. B. STANTON, THOMAS THOMAS, D. D. BEYNON, DARONWY ISAAC, EVAN THOMAS, THOMAS RICHARDS." Telegrams were then sent to all the collieries in South Wales, notifying the fact that the stop days had been declared. It was, said his lordship, of importance to observe that with many of these collieries the Sliding Scale Committee, as a committee, had no concern; for that committee only represented the forty-seven firms before mentioned, and the working men's representatives on this committee were elected only by the men working in the collieries of those firms. Yet the committee took upon themselves to do that which the federation alone had authority to do—namely, to order stop days in all the collieries in South Wales. There was one other fact. The cost of printing the manifesto and of sending out the telegrams was paid out of the funds of the federation, and the organization of the federation was used for the purpose of making the stop days known to the men throughout the district. Subsequently two other stop days were ordered, one for the 31st of October and one for the 6th of November. They were also declared at meetings of what was called the working men's half of the Sliding Scale Committee; but, as before, communications to the men were distributed by means of the organization of the federation, and the cost was defrayed out of the federation funds. The result of all this was that the men stayed away from work on the four days, and so broke their contracts with their masters. It was argued on behalf of the federation that they, the federation, could not be held responsible for the consequences of stop days, for the reason that the federation had expressly refused to meddle in the matter, as appeared by the resolution of the 23rd of October. His lordship did not, however, think this argument well founded. It was true that the hand of the working men's representation on the Sliding Scale Committee was made to appear as directing these stop days, but he could not doubt that the hand was guided and controlled by the federation itself. In truth, it was the federation who were acting, the name of the Sliding Scale Committee being used as a blind, a very transparent blind, to conceal what was being done. The writ was issued on the 22nd of November, 1901. After the writ was issued Mr. Evan Thomas, one of the defendants, and a prominent official of the federation, speaking at a meeting of miners as to the way stop days would affect the right of haulers to a certain bonus payable to them by the masters, said, "When a stop day is declared, it is expected that everyone will morally abide by it, but if the haulers do not, they are in a sense acting disloyally towards the federation, and it will certainly mean that the executive council will either have to give this policy up or to do something else to meet the difficulty of carrying this policy out." It was true that within two or three days of this speech being reported Mr. Evan Thomas wrote to the newspapers to say that he had used the expression "executive council" by a slip, and that he ought to have said Sliding Scale Committee. But to his lordship it appeared that this official made no slip at all, and that he was quite right when he attributed the stop day to the executive council of the federation. A number of witnesses were called on the part of the plaintiffs and on the part of the defendants. Mr. Dalziel, secretary of the Owners' Association, stated that he did not suggest that in giving the advice to to stop in November, 1900, there was any intention of injuring the masters, and the resolution of the masters passed on the 13th of November confirms Mr. Dalziel in that view. Then it appeared that in October, 1901, circumstances similar to those that led up to the stoppage in 1900 again occurred, and that these circumstances afforded the only reason for ordering the stop days in October and November, 1901. There was no quarrel between the masters and the men, and, so far as his lordship could see, no ill will. The men objected to the course of business adopted by the middlemen, and in this objection some at least of the masters seem to have shared. The evidence satisfied him that the action of the federation, and of the other defendants in 1901, was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not in any sense prompted by a wish to injure the masters. Neither the federation nor the other defendants had any prospect of personal gain from the operation of the stop days. Having been requested by the men by the resolution of the 12th of November, 1898, to advise and direct them as to when to stop work, the federation and the other defendants, who were its officers, in his lordship's opinion did, to the best of their ability, advise and direct the men. Whether they advised them wisely he could not say, though he was inclined to think not. But he was satisfied that they advised them honestly and without malice of any kind against the plaintiffs. He had to decide, in these circumstances, whether an action in tort would lie against the defendants. The advice and guidance of the defendants was solicited and involved, if followed, as the defendants knew, the breaking of subsisting contracts. It was followed, as the defendants wished it should be; and damage resulted to the masters; but there was no malicious intention to cause injury, no profit was gained for themselves by the defendants, and their sole object was to benefit the men, whom they were advising and directing. After examining the various authorities bearing upon the case, his lordship found that the federation and all the other defendants had acted honestly and without malice, and, in ordering the stop days, had done no more than that which they conceived to be in the best interests of the men they represented and for whom they had been acting. He found moreover that they had lawful justification or excuse for what they did in this—that, having been solicited by the men to advise and guide them on the question of stop days, it was their duty and their right to give the advice and to do what might be necessary to secure that the advice should be followed. As to the cause of action founded on conspiracy, his lordship said that an actionable conspiracy existed when a number of men combined either to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. In his opinion the acts of the individual defendants were not unlawful, and there was good authority for saying that a combination entered into for the purpose of doing a lawful act could not constitute an actionable conspiracy. In order to give a cause of action, the combination to do the lawful act must be entered into with a malicious intention of damaging the plaintiff and must cause him damage. Here no such conspiracy ever in fact existed, for there never was any malicious intention. His lordship accordingly gave judgment for the defendants on both branches of the plaintiffs' claim.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., B. F. Williams, K.C., Lush, K.C., and Trevor Lewis, for the plaintiffs.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Gregory, for the defendant federation.

Evans, K.C., and Bailhache, for the Sliding Scale Committee.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., replied.

The arguments used appear sufficiently from the judgments.

The following cases were referred to: Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., 37 W. R. 756, 23 Q. B. D. 598, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25; Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons, 51 W. R. 115, [1902] 2 K. B. 732; Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 258, [1898] A. C. 1; Quinn v. Leathem, 50 W. R. 139, [1901] A. C. 495; Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Emmens v. Pottle, 34 W. R. 116, 16 Q. B. D. 354; Vizetelly v. Mudie's Select Library, [1900] 2 Q. B. 170, 48 W. R. Dig. 94; Stuart v. Bell, 39 W. R. 612, [1891] 2 Q. B. 341; Youde v. Manchester and District Bill Posting Co., Times, June 19, 1903; and Giblan v. National Amalgamated Labourers' Union of Great Britain and Ireland, [1903] 2 K. B. 600.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the judgment in favour of the defendants delivered by Bigham, J., sitting as judge of fact and law. The action is brought by the Glamorgan Coal Co. (Limited) and seventy-three other plaintiffs against the South Wales Miners' Federation, its trustees, its officers, and a number of the members of the executive council to recover damages for wrongfully and maliciously procuring and inducing the workmen in the plaintiffs' collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs. In the alternative, the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspiring together to do the acts complained of. The conspiracy count is put this way: The defendant federation, by its agents, its executive council, and the other defendants (naming them), well knowing the terms and conditions of the contracts of service with the workmen, wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspired together to do the acts complained of, that is, to procure the workmen to break their contracts of service by taking holidays called stop days. The plaintiffs claim both damages and an injunction. The defence of the defendants really consists of a traverse which, in the old days of pleading, would have taken the form of "Not guilty," but in these days of modern pleading assumes the form of an argumentative traverse; for the defendants, after denying the material allegations in the statement of claim, say that the acts complained of, if done at all, were done with reasonable justification and excuse. The defence thus pleaded is applied by the defendants both to the claim for procuring the plaintiffs' workmen to break their contracts and also to the claim for conspiracy. The learned judge began his judgment with a statement of facts showing the relations of the colliery proprietors and their workmen. [His lordship read from the statement of facts above given, and continued:] The learned judge then, in finding the facts of the case, in effect finds that the stop day must be attributed to the executive council of the South Wales Miners' Federation, and that the acts complained of in the statement of claim were the acts of that executive council, and not of the members of the Joint Sliding Scale Committee of the masters and men who represented the men, which was the view of the evidence contended for on behalf of the defendants at the trial. The learned judge also said that the evidence satisfied him that the action of the federation and of the other defendants in 1901 was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not in any sense prompted by a wish to injure the masters. Neither the federation nor the other defendants had any prospect of personal gain from the operation of the stop days. The learned judge said: "Having been requested by the men by the resolution of the 12th of November, 1900, to advise and direct them as to when to stop work the federation and the other defendants, who were its officers, in my opinion did to the best of their ability advise and direct the men. Whether they advised them wisely I cannot say, though I am inclined to think not. But I am satisfied that they advised them honestly and without malice of any kind against the plaintiffs." The learned judge made a statement substantially to the same effect when dealing with the law in his judgment. Sir Edward Clarke, in his argument on this appeal, accepted the whole of the facts thus stated, excepting that he did not admit the request by the men for advice or direction so far as it relates to the "stop day" in 1900; but this seems to me of no importance, since the request is only material, if at all, to raise a duty, and the duty of the federation seems to me to be just as much raised by their constitution and the resolution of the 5th of November, 1898. The judgment of the learned judge, so far as concerns the procuring the breaches of contract by the men, is based on the duty of the executive council towards the men affording a justification for the interference by the executive council between the masters and the men, and the interference by the executive council in the existing contractual rights of the masters against the men, and he disposes of the claim for conspiracy on the same grounds. This decision of Bigham, J.'s, does not, of course, involve any such proposition as that the workmen have a right to break the contracts entered into by them respectively because each one of them may think honestly that it is either for his individual advantage, or for the advantage of the workmen collectively, that the contracts should be broken. Each workman will, of course, be liable to be sued for his own breach of contract. The question is whether an action will lie for procuring a breach of contract or for conspiracy. Taken in its simplest form, the question would be whether, if a hundred in the same employ agreed that they would each of them with the same object break their respective contracts on a given day, an action would lie, either against each of them for procuring breaches of contract by the others, or against the hundred collectively for conspiracy, or whether it could be said that there was anything in the relation of the men one to another which negatived an action in the form of an action for procuring a breach of contract, or an action for conspiracy, in a case in which that which was agreed to be done, or to do which the combination was formed, was undoubtedly a wrongful act, for which each one could be sued for breach of his own personal contract. It seems to me that if these prima facie causes of action, arising for procuring a breach of contract or combining to procure it, do not lie, it must be either on the ground that community of interest excludes a procuring each of the other connected by community of interest, or because the relation of the parties, whoever they are, raises a duty to counsel one another and arrange for concerted action. Some such proposition would cover the instances such as those suggested by the learned judge and by counsel in argument, such as a brother advising a sister, or a parent a child, or a doctor a patient, or a solicitor a client, but the principle is the same in each case, and the question must be the same in each case—Is the relation such as to raise the duty? In each of those cases the person breaking the contract is not the agent of the person giving the advice, however influential the adviser may be. The action for procuring a breach of contract is an action for wrongfully interfering in the contractual relations of other persons. The effect, if any, of the duty or right arising from the relation is only that it negatives the primâ facie presumption of malice which the law supposes from interference with contractual rights between the parties to a contract of which the interferer has notice; and the defendant can always rebut the primâ facie presumption thus arising by the proof of circumstances raising a duty to advise; but the plaintiff on his part can neutralize this by a proof of express malice. In no other sense is it true to say that, in an action for procuring a breach of contract, it is necessary to prove malice or motive, or anything more than mere notice of the contract. I think that similar observations arise on conspiracy; for, primâ facie, a combination to interfere with the civil rights of another, whether it be his right to full freedom in disposal of his own labour or his own capital or any other right of citizenship, is an unlawful combination, because such interference, if carried into effect, is an actionable wrong, and it is this fact, and not any mere malicious motive, which constitutes the combination a conspiracy. This primâ facie wrongful interference may be negatived by showing that the exercise of the defendants' own rights involved the interference complained of, which interference is merely the exercise of the right of a man to interfere in a matter in which he is jointly interested with others, and such interference gives no cause of action. In such a case there will be intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or otherwise, but just cause for it, as being done for the maintenance of the equal civil rights of the defendants. This is what I understand Sir William Erle meant by the last words of the passage from his book quoted by Lord Brampton, delivering his opinion in Quinn v. Leathem: "Every person has a right under the law as between himself and his fellow-subjects to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right, which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others"; or, as Darling, J., puts it in Read v. Friendly Society of Stonemasons, 50 W. R. 619, [1902] 2 K. B. 88: "I think that their sufficient justification for interference with the plaintiffs' right must be an equal or superior right in themselves." I cannot but think that what was said by Bowen, L.J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., 23 Q. B. D., p. 598, "Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden, so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it," applies to cases where the procurement of the violation of the individual contractual right constitutes the cause of action, whether it be for a conspiracy to violate the contractual right of another or an action against several persons for procuring a breach of such contractual right, or indeed an action for the same cause against one having a duty to advise. I think the same of Lord Macnaghten's observation in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C., p. 510: "A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law, if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." In the present case the primâ facie actionable wrong is the interference with the contractual rights of the plaintiffs, and the question is whether there is such sufficient justification for the defendants' interference as to exclude an action for procuring a breach of contract or for conspiracy. To say that the means employed by the defendants were illegal, because of the breach of contract, seems to me to be arguing in a circle; and I dissent from the contention of the appellants, that just cause for interference is excluded in cases where the advice actually given is to break a contract, and in consequence the contract is broken. It seems to me in the result that the only question in this case is whether the interference of the defendants was justified, and not whether the men individually could justify the breaches of contract, which of course they could not. I doubt very much whether an action would have lain against the aggregation of individual men for procuring the several breaches of contract, because I think there is a good deal to be said for the proposition that the community of interest of all these men following the same occupation in the South Wales coalfields entitled them to confer and act in concert, without rendering themselves liable for actions for procuring breaches of contract by one another or for conspiracy. But the case is very much complicated by the existence of the federation, which, according to the decision in the Taff Vale case, is a thing which can own property, and which can employ servants, and which can inflict injury, and to which the Legislature has impliedly given the power to sue, and on which the Legislature has imposed the liability to be sued for injuries purposely done by its authority and procurement. I do not think that such a body is entitled to rely upon a defence based on its absolute identity with the aggregate of individual members who happen to constitute the union. If such absolute identity existed it would follow that the union would be responsible for the aggregate damages resulting from the aggregate breaches of contract, and no action for procuring breaches of contract, or for conspiracy, would be necessary. But, whatever may be the identity of the federation and the men, it seems impossible in any action for breach of contract merely, and nothing else, brought against the federation, as the collective forensic name of the men, to sign a judgment against the federation, because the federation are not parties to the contract which has been broken. It follows that, if the federation is liable at all, it must be either in an action for procuring breaches of contract or conspiracy, and in either form of action there is a primâ facie case against the federation, and the federation, being a separate entity from the men, must show some sufficient justification for their interference. The federation and the members of the council who are defendants seek to base this justification on the suggestion that their relation to the men raises a duty on their part to advise the men, or, at all events, negatives their being mere meddlers. It was argued before us that the defendants were not mere advisers, but that they were actors who did the very thing complained of, in that they issued the notices ordering the stop days, and compelled reluctant men to break their contracts by staying away from work, without giving proper notices to their employers, and that the view of the federation was that men who refused to stay away would be guilty of disloyalty to the federation; but this argument does not convince me that the federation were not acting as advisers, nor does the fact that the federation actually issued the notices deprive the defendants of their character of advisers. It is not suggested in this case that the men stayed away from work under threats, intimidation, or physical compulsion. I think, therefore, the judgment of Bigham, J., must be affirmed for the reasons given by him. I do not myself think that the ineffectiveness of the remedy by suing the men for breaches of contract is as complete as supposed, but, whether it is or not, it cannot affect the question of the liability of the defendants. I concur strongly in the advice of Bigham, J., to the parties to end this litigation if they can, so that in the future nothing may happen which may prejudice the very existence of the sliding scale, which in the view of both masters and men has worked so well to produce wholesome relations between them. I regret to say that my brethren do not agree in the conclusions at which I have arrived; but the case is obviously one raising questions of great difficulty, and I thought it my duty to express my individual opinion upon the case.

ROMER, L.J., read his judgment as follows: The law applicable to this case is, I think, well settled. I need only refer to two passages in which that law is shortly and comprehensively stated. In Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C., at p. 510, Lord Macnaghten said: "A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law, if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." And in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D., at p. 614, Bowen, L.J., included in what is forbidden "the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always there is no just cause for it." But although, in my judgment, there is no doubt as to the law, yet I fully recognize that considerable difficulties may arise in applying it to the circumstances of any particular case. When a person has knowingly procured another to break his contract, it may be difficult under the circumstances to say whether or not there was "sufficient justification or just cause" for his act. I think it would be extremely difficult, even if it were possible, to give a complete and satisfactory definition of what is "sufficient justification," and most attempts to do so would probably be mischievous. I certainly shall not make the attempt. In particular I do not think it necessary or useful to discuss the point as to how far the question of justification can be assimilated to the question of malice in cases of libel and slander. As the present Master of the Rolls said, in Read v. Friendly Society of Stonemasons, [1902] 2 K. B., at p. 739: "It is not at all necessary to embark upon the question whether 'without just cause' is a complete equivalent for what was meant in the common law by 'malice.' I am inclined to think that, though in many cases adequate as a description, it is not co-extensive with it; nor do I think that in civil actions, any more than in criminal, it will be possible to eliminate motives from the discussion." I respectfully agree with what Bowen, L.J., said in the Mogul case, at p. 618, when considering the difficulty that might arise whether there was sufficient justification or not:—"The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyse the circumstances, and to discover on which side of the line each case fell." I will only add that, in analysing or considering the circumstances, regard might be had to the nature of the contract broken; the position of the parties to the contract; the grounds for the breach; the means employed to procure the breach; the relation of the person procuring the breach to the person who breaks the contract; and I think also to the object of the person in procuring the breach. But, though I deprecate the attempt to define justification, I think it right to express my opinion on certain points in connexion with breaches of contract procured where the contract is one of master and servant. In my opinion, a defendant sued for knowingly procuring such a breach is not justified of necessity merely by his shewing that he had no personal animus against the employer, or that it was to the advantage or interest of both the defendant and the workman that the contract should be broken. I take the following simple case to illustrate my view. If A. wants to get a specially good workman, who is under contract with B., as A. knows, and A. gets the workman to break his contract to B.'s injury by giving him higher wages, it would not, in my opinion, afford A. a defence to an action against him by B. that he could establish that he had no personal animus against B., and that it was to the interest both of himself and of the workman that the contract with B. should be broken. I think that the principle involved in this simple case, taken by me by way of illustration, really governs the present case. For it is to be remembered that what A. has to justify is his action, not as between him and the workman, but as regards the employer B. And if I proceed to apply the law I have stated to the circumstances of the present case, what do I find? On the findings of fact it is to my mind clear that the defendants, the federation, procured the men to break their contracts with the plaintiffs—so that I need not consider how the question would have stood if what the federation had done had been merely to advise the men, or if the men, after taking advice, had arranged between themselves to break their contracts, and the federation had merely notified the men's intentions to the plaintiffs. The federation did more than advise. They acted, and by their agents actually procured the men to leave their work and break their contracts. In short, it was the federation who caused the injury to the plaintiffs. This was practically admitted before us by the counsel for the federation, and, indeed, such an admission could not, in my opinion, be avoided, having regard to the facts stated by the judge in his judgment. And it is not disputed that the federation acted as they did knowingly. So that the only question which remains is one of justification. Now the justification urged is that it was thought—and I will assume for this purpose rightly thought—to be in the interest of the men that they should leave their work in order to keep up the price of coal on which the amount of wages of the men depended. As to this, I can only say that to my mind the ground alleged affords no justification for the conduct of the federation towards the employers; for, as I have already pointed out, the absence on the part of the federation of any malicious intention to injure the employers in itself affords no sufficient justification. But it was said that the federation had a duty towards the men which justified them in doing what they did. For myself, I cannot see that they had any duty which in any way compelled them to act, or justified them in acting, as they did towards the plaintiffs. And the fact that the men and the federation, as being interested in or acting for the benefit of the men, were both interested in keeping up prices, and so, in breaking the contracts, affords in itself no sufficient justification for the action of the federation as against the plaintiffs, as I have already pointed out. I think, therefore, that the appeal must succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—The law applicable to the decision of this case is, in my judgment, as stated by Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem. Referring to Lumley v. Gye his lordship said: "Speaking for myself I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not I think the gist of the actions—but on the ground that a violation of legal right, committed knowingly, is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." If it were necessary to say anything more on the subject of Lumley v. Gye, I should be content to refer to what was said by Lord Herschell in Allen v. Flood, to which I can add nothing.

In my opinion, therefore, only two questions have to be considered; (1) Did the defendants interfere with the contractual relation between the plaintiffs and their workmen? (2) Was there in law sufficient justification for the interference?

As to the first question, Bigham, J., has expressly fund that whatever was done in the way of interference was the act of this federation. I need not refer to specific acts beyond this—that all the men working at the South Wales and Monmouthshire collieries were directed to observe as holidays two days—the 25th and 26th of October, 1901—contrary to the contracts entered into by the workmen. The uncontradicted evidence of Evan Williams at the trial shows that in consequence of that direction men who otherwise would have worked on those two days did not do so. In these circumstances, it seems to me to be made out that the federation wilfully and with notice of the contracts procured some men to break their contracts, and therefore knowingly brought about a violation of legal rights which is actionable unless there is sufficient justification for what was done. That interference with contractual relations known to the law may in some cases be justified is not, in my opinion, open to doubt. For example, I think that a father who discovered that a child of his had entered into an engagement to marry a person of immoral character would not only be justified in interfering to prevent that contract from being carried into effect, but would greatly fail in his duty to his child if he did not. This duty is recognized by the court, for the Court of Chancery and the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice have continually so interfered on behalf of wards of court, sometimes with a heavy hand; and the principle on which the judges of those courts have acted is simply that of doing on behalf of the ward that which a right-minded father would do in the true interest of his child. I conceive that circumstances might occur which would give rise to the same duty in the case of a contract of service. I need not say that the present is a very different case from that which I have just put. It would no doubt be desirable if a general rule could be formulated which would determine in what cases such a justification exists; but no such rule has been laid down, and I doubt whether this can be done. So far as I can see it must be left (in the language of Bowen, L.J.) to the tribunal to analyze the circumstances of each particular case and discover whether a justification exists or not.

In the present case the learned judge finds that the federation and the other defendants "had lawful justification or excuse for what they did in this, that having been solicited by the men to advise and guide on the question of stop days, it was their duty and right to give them advice and do what might be necessary to secure that the advice should be followed," and the existence of this duty has been strongly pressed upon us in argument by the learned counsel for the several defendants. It will be observed that the learned judge expressly finds that the defendants were not merely advisers but also agents "to do what might be necessary to secure that the advice should be followed." In the view which I take of the facts the defendants not only gave advice, but acted, and their action took the form of interfering with the contractual relations between the masters and the men. If in so doing they committed a tort it would be no answer to say that they acted upon the advice of a third person—their own solicitor; and it is difficult to see how they can be in a better position simply because the advice on which they acted emanated from themselves.

In my judgment the liability of the defendants must turn on the answer to be given to the question whether the circumstances of the case were in fact such as to justify the defendants, or any of them, in acting as they did.

The circumstances, then, were these: Middlemen at Cardiff were attempting to reduce the price of coal, and it was feared that some employers might yield to the pressure of competition and enter into agreements for the sale of coal at prices lower than those existing at the time, with the result that the wages of the miners, which were regulated by a sliding scale, would be reduced.

To counteract this it was considered desirable by the men's advisers that prices should be sustained by diminishing the output of coal, and that this should be effected by the men taking the holiday complained of. It was not contended or suggested that a limitation of the output of coal was an illegitimate object or aim on the part of the men, or that if it could have been attained without the breach of contracts (as, for example, by the service of proper notices—putting an end to those contracts), the men would not have been without their legal rights. The difficulty which presented itself was this—that one of the terms of the arrangement under which the sliding scale of wages existed was that notices of the determination of contracts of employment should only be given on the first day of a calendar month to terminate on the last day, and this prevented notices of determination being effective at the desired moment. The critical period was known to occur in October or November. The men persuaded themselves that it was the masters' interest as well as their own that they should have power to take holidays at this period, but this was a point on which the masters were entitled to have their own opinion, and from what occurred in November, 1900, it was known to the men that the masters' view did not agree with that of the men. If the men had faith in the soundness of their opinion, their course was to negotiate through the defendants for a modification of the sliding scale arrangement; what they actually thought fit to do was that which, while insisting on the benefit of the sliding scale, they treated themselves as emancipated from the observance of one of the terms on which that scale had been agreed to, although the masters objected, and although the course taken by the men might result in serious damage to the masters, or some of them. This is, I think, a difficult position to maintain. The justification set up seems to me to amount to no more than this—that the course which they took, although it might be to the detriment of the master, was for the pecuniary interest of the men, and I think it wholly insufficient. The defendants took active steps to carry this policy into effect, and, as I have said, interfered to bring about the violation of legal rights. In my judgment they fail to justify those acts, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

THE COURT declined to grant an immediate injunction, but reserved liberty to the plaintiffs to apply for an injunction in case it should be necessary to do so.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for C. & W. Kenshole, Aberdare.

Riddell & Co., for Walter Morgan, Bruce, & Nicholas, Pontypridd.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 1, 2.
Byrne, J. }

In re BROWN, DECEASED.
INGALL v. BROWN. (a.)

Will—Construction—Condition—Marriage with consent of mother—Withdrawal of consent.

Where a testator regulates the enjoyment of property given by his will, according as the beneficiary shall or shall not marry with the consent of her mother, but prescribes no particular form of consent, the court will treat such consent as a matter of substance rather than of form; it will not allow such consent, if once given, to be capriciously withdrawn.

This was a summons taken out to determine a question arising in the administration of the estate of R. Barclay Brown, deceased.

By his will the testator gave all his property to trustees upon trust for his wife (one of the defendants) for life, and after her decease to be equally divided between all the testator's children living at his wife's decease.

By a codicil, the testator bequeathed £500 to his daughter Lilias (the plaintiff).

In 1891, by a second codicil, the testator added that it was his wish that in the event of the plaintiff marrying against her mother's wish she should have the interest only upon the £500, the capital to be invested at her death for her children. Some time prior to the date of this second codicil there had been a possibility of the plaintiff's becoming engaged to some person (of whom her parents did not approve) other than her present husband, Mr. Ingall.

In 1893, the plaintiff became engaged to Mr. Ingall. Her parents were informed of that, and also of the fact that Mr. Ingall was not then in a position to marry immediately. Their consent was given both to the engagement and to its being made public, subject to a stipulation that the marriage should not take place until two years had elapsed from the date of the engagement.

Some time prior to the testator's death, his attention was directed to the fact that there was a certain indebtedness on Mr. Ingall's part, and that the marriage might have to be delayed, but nothing was said as to the withdrawal of the parents' consent. At the date of the testator's death in February, 1895, the two years had almost expired.

Shortly after that event there was an interview between Mr. Ingall and the plaintiff and her mother, at which the latter recognized the fact of an existing engagement. She desired, however, that the marriage should not take place till six months after the testator's death, that was, in August, 1895; and to this Mr. Ingall and the plaintiff acceded.

Disputes afterwards arose between the plaintiff and her mother upon the subject of the settlement to be made on the former's marriage, the latter insisting that the plaintiff should not be empowered thereunder to appoint to Mr. Ingall a life interest except with the mother's consent. The plaintiff contended that the settlement should be on the same lines as her sister's.

On the day before the marriage an offer was made to the mother to execute a settlement giving Mr. Ingall a protected life interest after the plaintiff's death. The mother refused this, and withdrew her consent to the marriage, which took place on the 22nd of June, 1895. The plaintiff and Mr. Ingall knew of the mother's withdrawal of consent prior to the marriage.

(a.) Reported by PERCY WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff now claimed her share in the testator's residuary estate, and £500 under his will and the first codicil. Her mother contended that, by withdrawing her consent to the marriage, the second codicil to the testator's will had come into operation.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Cassel, for the plaintiff.—The parents' consent had been given two years before the marriage. It could not be subsequently withdrawn a day or two before the marriage. Had there been any objection to the husband's character that would have been different, but there was none. The policy of the law has always been to favour consent to marriage: Lord Strange v. Smith, Ambler, 263; Campbell v. Lord Netterville, cited in Berkley v. Ryder, 2 Ves. sen. 532; Daley v. Desbouverie, 2 Atkyns, 261; Merry v. Ryves, 1 Eden. 1; Dashwood v. Bulkeley, 10 Ves. 230; In re Smith, 38 W. R. 380, 44 Ch. D. 654. It was material that the testator had consented in his lifetime: Parnell v. Lyon, 1 Ves. & Bean. 479; Clarke v. Parker, 19 Ves. 1.

Levett, K.C., and Peterson, for the defendant.—Here the mother did not induce the engagement as in Lord Strange v. Smith. Here the husband was not in a sound financial position. There had been no proper settlement. This is not a case of forfeiture at all, as in the cases cited. It is one of settlement under the terms of a codicil whereby the daughter is restricted from getting the capital of the £500.

Cassel replied.

BYRNE, J., after dealing with the evidence, said: I think the mother made it clear that she did not, so far as it depended on her, intend that the marriage should take place without a settlement being made excluding the husband from any interest except such as she should consent to. She never said or did anything to show that she meant to relax what she said about the marriage taking place in August. The question arises whether the settlement made by the second codicil of the testator in the event of marriage against the mother's wish has any application, or whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the marriage ought to be deemed a marriage without consent. A good many of the older authorities have been cited in reference to clauses of forfeiture on marriage without consent. This much is clear, that the court, where no particular form is required for the consent, has treated the consent as a matter of substance, not of form. Here there is no question about the original consent having been given, and given in the father's lifetime. Two points should be noticed. One is that the codicil operates as from the testator's death. He had known for nearly two years before that, that there was an engagement subsisting between his daughter and Mr. Ingall. The second is that this is not a forfeiture clause in the sense that the wife's interest was to go over to somebody else, but a provident settlement in the event of an improvident marriage being made. What are the authorities as to the withdrawal of a consent once given? Several of those cited do not bear upon that point at all. [His lordship then referred to the judgments in Merry v. Ryves, 1 Eden 1, and Dashwood v. Bulkeley, 10 Ves. 230.] I understand that the principle underlying these cases is that it must be justifiable for persons in loco parentis, if circumstances subsequently come to their knowledge which, if known at the time of consent, would have justified refusal thereof, to retract that consent. On the other hand retractation must not be ad libitum, or from mere caprice. Here the defendant was compelled to put her case as high as to say that there was an absolute power of refusal on the mother's part, notwithstanding a previous consent. Now there was a consent of father and mother. There is no suggestion of want of moral character or any circumstances of that kind which would have prevented the parents from giving their consent. The young people had consented to the August condition. I must read this clause fairly, and looking at it as a matter of substance, I think there was a consent given, that it was not against the mother's wish that the marriage should take place, but that it was against her wish that it should take place modo et formâ, as it did take place. In substance, therefore, as far as the marriage itself was concerned, it was in accordance with the wish and consent of the mother that it should take place, and I think it would be too harsh to say that the fact of its having taken place some time anterior to the stipulated date should be a ground for withdrawing consent. As to the settlement, I am far from saying that a parent should not consider the advisability of it. But the true objection appears to have been that the marriage took place before six months had elapsed. On the whole, therefore, having regard to the principle, which I think I can gather from the cases cited, I think that no forfeiture has arisen under this will. I have decided in accordance with the rights of the parties. I am glad to hear, however, that the husband is prepared now to make a settlement substantially in accordance with that offered by his solicitor on the day before marriage.

Order: Plaintiff entitled to legacy of £500 absolutely for her separate use. The share of residue to stand on the same footing.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Morley, Shirreff, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Godden, Son, & Holme.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 7.

THE APOLLINARIS CO. (LIMITED) v. THE NORDDEUTSCHE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Deck cargo—River and canal—Rhine steamers—Dutch code—Liability of underwriters.

The rule which exempts underwriters from liability for loss of deck cargo does not apply to an inland voyage by canal or river plainly contemplated by a policy, on which voyage it is and has been the practice and usage to carry cargoes on deck.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action to recover for a partial loss under a policy of marine insurance dated the 21st of August, 1902, underwritten by the defendants.

The policy contained the following clauses: "£10,000 on corks . . . from London and/or any port or ports on the East Coast of Great Britain to Rotterdam and/or Antwerp and/or Cologne and while there and thence by any conveyance or conveyances to Ramagen or the Apollinaris spring, Neuenahr, or by any other route whatsoever, or vice versâ, including all risks on quays or elsewhere during transit or until warehoused, and/or safely delivered into the hands of the consignees, whether such delivery takes place on shore or on board the export vessel. Including interest from Rotterdam to Remagen only, and/or to the Apollinaris spring, Neuenahr, or vice versâ, the risk commencing from Rotterdam. . . . Deviation or change to be covered at premium to be arranged if notice given by assured on receipt of advice of such deviation or change of voyage. Including risk of . . . fire."

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Attached to the policy was the following: "Including fire risk. . . . Including all risk of landing and reshipping and transhipping. Including all liberties and exceptions, as per B/L., and/or C/P., including negligence clause."

The through bill of lading under which the Holland Steamship Co. carried the goods was as follows: "Viâ Amsterdam. Shipped in good order and condition by the Apollinaris Co. (Limited) on board the steamship Maastroom . . . bound for Amsterdam . . . and for further despatch—from Amsterdam to Neuenahr, Germany, at ship's expense, but shipper's risk, 100 bales of cork . . . and to be delivered subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned . . . either into lighters or on the quay, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, at Port of Amsterdam, and thence by —— to Neuenahr, Germany. Exceptions . . . fire on board, in hulk or craft, or on shore, and all accidents, loss . . . or from perils of the sea and rivers, and all risk of transhipping or railway carriage, or from any act . . . Master . . . the owners being in no way liable for any consequences of the cause before mentioned.—31st December, 1902."

The goods were shipped in London and arrived safely at Amsterdam, and were then shipped on The Amsterdam III. for carriage up the Rhine to Remagen, whence they would be forwarded to the Appollinaris spring.

The corks were stowed on the deck of the Rhine steamer, and during the night of the 17th of January, while the vessel was still at Amsterdam, a fire broke out, and some of the corks were damaged and some destroyed.

The defendants contended that the goods were stowed on deck at the time of the loss and were not covered by the policy. The plaintiffs called evidence to prove that it was the usage and practice to carry deck cargo on the Rhine steamers. Evidence was given that by the Dutch code the owner of a vessel is liable to the shipper for all goods carried on deck without the written consent of the shipper.

A printed form of bill of lading was put in during the trial, which was the common form in use for shipments made by the Holland Steamship Co. on the steamers of the Rhine Steamship Co., the owners of The Amsterdam III., and by it the Rhine Steamship Co. reserve themselves the right, among other liberties, to load goods on deck. This form is intended to be signed by the shipper and the master. No such bill of lading was in fact signed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., Loehnis, and A. Talbot, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and Leck, for the defendants.

The following cases were cited: De Costa v. Edmunds, 4 Camp. Rep. 142; Neale & Wilkinson v. Ross and Others, 3 Com. Cas. 236; Dixon v. Royal Exchange Shipping Co. (Limited), 12 App. Cas. 11; Ross v. Thwaite, 1 Park 26; Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., 2 Crompton & Jervis Rep. 244; Miller v. Titherington, 9 W. R. 437, 30 L. J. Ex. 217; Stewart v. Bell, 5 B. & Ald. 238.

Cur. adv. vult.

WALTON, J.—This is an action upon a marine policy, underwritten by the defendant company, under which the plaintiffs, the Apollinaris Co. (Limited) claim to be indemnified against a loss which they have suffered by the destruction or damage by fire of certain bales of corks which were, as the plaintiffs allege, covered by the policy at the time of the loss. The policy was upon "corks, bottles, and other goods by steamer or steamers and conveyances, including parcel post, at or from London to Rotterdam and/or Antwerp and/or Cologne, and while there and thence by any conveyance or conveyances to Remagen or the Apollinaris Co.'s spring, Neuenahr, or by any other route whatsoever, including all risks on quays or elsewhere during transit or until warehoused and/or safely delivered into the hands of the consignees." The corks were shipped in London by steamers belonging to the Holland Steamship Co., under through bills of lading, by which the Holland Steamship Co., undertook, in consideration of the payment to them of a through freight, to deliver the corks safely at Amsterdam, when the responsibility of the Holland Steamship Co. as carriers was to cease, and to have them despatched from Amsterdam to Neuenahr, in Germany, at the expense of the Holland Steamship Co., but at the risk of the shippers, the Apollinaris Co. The goods arrived safely at Amsterdam, and were there shipped on board a Rhine steamer, called The Amsterdam III., for carriage by canal and river to Remagen, or some landing-place on the Rhine, whence they would be forwarded to the Apollinaris spring. There is no evidence before me which enables me to ascertain the contract under which the bales of cork were shipped by the Holland Steamship Co. on The Amsterdam III. Apparently no bill of lading for these goods was signed by the master or by any person on behalf of the owners of that steamship. A printed form of bill of lading was put in at the trial, which appears to be a common form in use for shipments made by the Holland Steamship Co. on steamers of the Rhine Steamship Co., who were, as I understand, the owners of The Amsterdam III. This form of bill of lading is intended to be signed by the shippers as well as by the master, and bears the printed signature of the Holland Steamship Co. as shippers. By the first of its conditions the Rhine Steamship Co. reserve to themselves, among other liberties, the right to load goods on deck. But there is no evidence upon which I can find that the corks were shipped upon the terms of this bill of lading. The corks were shipped at some time between the 15th of January and the 17th of January, 1903. They were stowed on deck with the intention that, so stowed, they should be carried to their destination on the Rhine. On the night of the 17th of January, while The Amsterdam III. was still lying at Amsterdam, a fire broke out on board by which some of the bales of corks were destroyed and some damaged. The amount of loss is admitted to have been £1,021 16s. 10d. The facts as I have stated them are admitted, and the only defence pleaded by the defendants is that "at the time of the loss the goods were stowed and carried on deck and were not covered by the policy." This case cannot, of course, be disposed of upon any technical point of pleading. But it is not irrelevant to observe that in 1842 the Court of Queen's Bench, in Milward v. Hibbert, 3 Q. B. 120, held that a plea substantially in the form of the defence here pleaded by the present defendants did not disclose a good defence in an action upon a marine policy for the loss caused by the jettison of deck cargo. The claim there was by the owner of the ship under a policy on the ship for the amount of the ship's contribution to general average in respect of some pigs which were carried on the ship's deck and were jettisoned. The defendant pleaded that the pigs were carried on deck. The plaintiff replied that there was a custom to carry pigs on deck on the voyage upon which the ship was engaged. To this replication the defendant demurred. Although the question arose upon a demurrer to the replication, the judgment of the court proceeded upon an exception to the validity of the plea, and the court held that the plea was bad. The technical point actually decided is not important, but the judgment is useful, as it was necessary for the court from the nature of the question before them to consider the principle upon which the earlier decisions as to the carriage of deck cargo were founded. The judgment was delivered by Lord Denman. After referring to the early authorities to the effect that goods should not be stowed on deck and to a passage in the fifth edition of Lord Tenterden's book on Shipping, in which it was pointed out that there are exceptions to the rule, as where usage has sanctioned the practice and where the master has the merchants' consent, the Lord Chief Justice says: "Now it is obvious that there may be other and valid reasons for stowing goods on deck; indeed some goods could be stowed in no other place, such as timber, and in some voyages live animals; and they may certainly be there stowed with proper skill and care so as not to be in the way of the crew in their operations." The Chief Justice was here referring to one of the reasons for forbidding the stowage of cargo on deck which was relied on by Valin and others who wrote at a time when navigation by steam had not been invented. He proceeds: "These matters of fact may vary with every different trade or, indeed, with every single adventure," and in conclusion he says that "the mere fact of stowing them (the goods) on deck will not relieve the underwriter from responsibilty, inasmuch as they may be placed there according to the usages of the trade and so as not to impede the navigation or in any way increase the risks." Without pushing the decision in Milward v. Hibbert too far, it certainly seems to point to this—that the question whether stowage on deck is improper is strictly and properly a question of fact, and apart from express contract must be decided, whether as between different owners of goods in the same vessel or as between assured and underwriters, according to the circumstances of each case, having regard especially to the nature of the voyage and of the cargo and to the usages of the trade. It is, however, quite clear from all the authorities upon this question that it is a fact which has long been well recognized by all who are interested in maritime adventures, and by courts, that on ordinary voyages by sea goods which are carried on deck are exposed to peculiar and extraordinary danger. It follows from this, for reasons which are clearly analogous to those upon which the implied warranty of seaworthiness in contracts of marine insurances depends, that under an ordinary policy on goods for a voyage by sea, where there is no well-known usage to carry on deck goods such as are described in the policy on the voyage thereby insured, underwriters are not liable for the loss of deck cargo. Where from the description of the goods or the voyage, or both, it is apparent that, in accordance with a well-known practice or usage of trade, the goods will or even probably may be carried on deck, then even in the case of voyages by sea, where goods so carried are necessarily exposed to peculiar dangers, still the underwriters will be deemed to have consented to take this risk and will be liable for any loss of deck cargo by perils insured against. The question which arises as to the right to contribution in cases of general average where deck cargo has been jettisoned is very similar to the question between assured and underwriters as to the loss of deck cargo. The questions are not identical, because the obligations in the two cases are different in their nature and origin. But the underlying and governing principle applicable to each is the same. In the ancient collections of customs of the sea, such as the Consolato del Mare, and in the earlier codes, such as the Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681, the question is dealt with in connection with general average. Valin, in his commentary on that article of the Ordonnance which enacts that the owner of deck cargo which has been jettisoned cannot claim contribution in general average, says that it does not apply to boats or small vessels going from port to port when the custom is to load goods on deck as well as below. He is in this passage obviously referring to small coasting craft, sailing vessels, of course, which make short trips from port to port. Emerigon follows Valin and adopts the same exception to the general rule of the Ordonnance. The same view has been recognized in our own courts. Thus in Wright v. Marwood, 7 Q. B. D., at p. 67, in the year 1881, Lord Bramwell, referring to the general rule which requires contribution to be made in general average for cargo jettisoned, and to the exception to such rule in the case of deck cargo jettisoned, says: "There are two exceptions (to the exception) which perhaps resolve themselves into one—viz., that coasting vessels are without the exception, and also those cases where by custom the deck cargo is one customary in the trade and perhaps also from the port." The exception of coasting vessels, apart from custom, is intelligible only on the ground that in the short trips made by coasting vessels deck cargo is not exposed to peculiar danger, at all events to an appreciable extent. And when Lord Bramwell says that the two exceptions resolve themselves into one, I think he means that when the voyage is such that the cargo is carried on deck without peculiar risk it will in practice be so carried whenever it is convenient. I have considered the authorities at some length and endeavoured to arrive at the principle upon which they rest, because I have to deal with a question which, so far as I know, has not been considered in any reported English case—the question, that is to say, whether there is any general rule exempting underwriters on cargo from liability for loss of goods stowed on deck upon an inland voyage by canal and river. As it is well known that there is a great trade upon inland waters in the United States of America, I have thought it desirable to look into the American cases. I am afraid that my investigation has not been exhaustive nor quite up to date. The decisions of the American courts are not, of course, in any sense binding authorities, but we read them with respect, and they afford useful illustrations. In a case of Harris v. Moody in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York, 30 N. Y. C. of A., 266, I find it was decided that the rule that underwriters are not liable for the loss of deck cargo is not applicable to vessels which navigate smooth land-locked waters—in that case it was Long Island Sound—and where deck cargo can be carried without extraordinary peril. This case is cited as an authority by Parsons in his well-known treatise on Insurance. The American decisions, however, are not altogether uniform. The decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Taunton Copper Co. v. Merchants' Insurance Co., 39 Mass. 108, is not perhaps consistent with the judgment in Harris v. Moody. But it proceeded upon different considerations and is not approved by Phillips (see Insurance, vol. 1, section 460). The true view of the matter appears to me to be that the rule against carrying goods on deck is really involved in and depends on a larger and wider rule, which is that goods carried on a vessel should not be stowed so as to be exposed to unnecessary and extraordinary peril during transit. Every one admits that on an ordinary voyage by sea deck cargo is exposed to peculiar and extraordinary danger, and it follows that cargo should not upon such voyages be stowed upon deck. Where, however, the voyage is not by sea, but it is a voyage of a very different kind, other considerations may apply. In order to apply the principle to be gathered from the authorities to the present case I must add something as to the evidence and facts. On the part of the plaintiffs evidence was called to show that it is the usage and practice to carry deck cargo on the Rhine steamers. As against this a Dutch lawyer, who practises also as an average adjuster, was called, who referred to certain articles of the Dutch code, by which the owner of a vessel is liable to the shipper for all damage to goods carried on deck without the written consent of the shipper. He said that these articles applied to a steamer such as The Amsterdam III., carrying goods by canal and river. I assume that this is a correct account of the Dutch law. The Dutch Code has a hard and fast rule which, though intended primarily, as I am satisfied, to apply to sea-going vessels, is wide enough to include river steamers. The effect of this is to impose a certain liability on the shipowner. But the same gentleman who proved the Dutch law also proved that deck cargoes are very commonly carried on the Rhine steamers. I understood from his evidence that the usual form of bill of lading used by the Rhine steamer gives express liberty to stow cargo on deck. The form of bill of lading of the Rhine Steamship Co. to which I have referred is an example of this, and the Dutch law explains why such form provides for signature not only by the captain, but also by the shippers. I have come to the conclusion that it is, and has been for many years, the practice and usage to carry deck cargoes on Rhine steamers plying from Amsterdam. This is a fact which is not altered by the Dutch code. The fact that the shipowners undertake a greater liability for cargo on deck than for cargo carried under deck does not appear to me to affect the question as between the assured and the underwriters. If there is such a liability in the present case the underwriters are entitled to the benefit of it. Mr. Scrutton relied upon certain letters written by the plaintiffs to the Holland Steamship Co., in which they maintained that the goods ought not to have been carried on deck. These letters were written with the knowledge and approval of the underwriters, who quite properly desired to make the shipowners pay for the loss if they were liable for it. I do not think that they ought to affect my decision. I may add that if the goods had been shipped under a bill of lading in the form which was produced, by which liberty was given to stow the goods on deck, the defendants would, in my opinion, have been liable under the clause in the policy, "Including all liberties and exceptions as per bills of lading." It could not have been said that the bill of lading was not in an ordinary form. In that case the defendants would have had no right over by subrogation against the shipowners. But there is, as I have said, no evidence that the goods were shipped under any such bill of lading. There is only one other point which ought perhaps to be mentioned. It was said that even on an inland voyage goods on deck were exposed to a greater danger of fire at all events than were goods under deck. I do not think that this is well founded. Goods on deck in case of fire have certain advantages and certain disadvantages as compared with goods under deck. I am not sure on which side the balance of advantage lies. But there is certainly no peril from fire or other causes to goods carried on the deck of a Rhine steamer which is in any way comparable with or similar to the pecular and extraordinary peril to which deck cargo is exposed at sea. I am by no means satisfied that the rule which exempts underwriters from liability for the loss of deck cargo applies to inland voyages by canal or river. I am satisfied that it does not apply to an inland voyage by canal and river plainly contemplated by the policy, on which voyage it is and has been for years the practice and usage for steamers and other vessels to carry cargoes on deck.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitor for defendants, James Ballantyne.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov 23.

In re THE TEA CORPORATION.
SORSBIE v. THE TEA CORPORATION. (a.)

Company—Voluntary liquidation—Scheme of arrangement—Assets insufficient—Meetings of members in classes—Dissent of class—No interest in assets—Sanction of court—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161—Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 104), s. 2—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 24.

Where the assets of a company in liquidation would, if distributed, be insufficient to do more than satisfy the creditors and those preference shareholders who are entitled to rank first in respect of capital, the ordinary shareholders have no interest in the assets, even if a scheme of reconstruction gives them a prospective advantage. Therefore their assent to the scheme is not required, the advantage it offers them being in the nature of a gift.

This was an appeal from an order of Buckley, J., sanctioning a scheme of arrangement between the company, which was in voluntary liquidation, and its creditors and contributories.

The scheme provided for the formation of a new company, to be called by the same name, which was to take over the liabilities of the old company, and to acquire its assets, property, and goodwill.

The debenture-holders and the preference and ordinary shareholders were to have the following advantages: The debenture-holders were to receive an equivalent for their debentures, paid partly in cash and partly in debentures of the new company, and they were to be paid their arrears of interest; the preference shareholders, who were entitled to priority in respect of capital as well as dividends, were to be allotted, in respect of each of the £5 shares held by them (which were fully-paid), four £1 shares in the new company, each credited with 10s. paid up thereon; the ordinary shareholders, for each of the £5 shares held by them (which were also fully-paid), were to have the option of applying for one £1 share in the new company, credited with 10s. paid up thereon.

This scheme was approved by the requisite majorities at meetings of the debenture-holders, the unsecured creditors, and the preference shareholders, but it was not passed at the meeting held by the ordinary shareholders.

Buckley, J., found, on the evidence before him, that the assets of the company, if distributed, would be insufficient, after paying the secured and unsecured creditors, to pay the preference shareholders in full, so that nothing could be left for the ordinary shareholders. He held that consequently the latter had no interest in the assets, and accordingly he sanctioned the scheme.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this decision H. G. Hemmerde, an ordinary shareholder, appealed.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the appellant, referred to the Companies Acts, 1862, s. 161, and 1900, s. 24, and the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, s. 2, and cited In re Canning Jarrah Timber Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 708, 48 W. R. Dig. 36, and In re Brownfields Guild Pottery Society, (1898) W. N. 80.

Eve, K.C., and Clauson, for the liquidator, referred to the scheme sanctioned in the last-named case, as set out in Palmer's Prec. (8th ed.), Part 2, p. 819.

Manby and Mark Romer, for various other shareholders, supported the appeal.

A. & B. Terrell, for the plaintiff in the action.

Rowden, K.C., and Gordon Brown, for debenture-holders and their trustees, supported the scheme.

Buckmaster, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—With regard to the facts in substance there is little or no question. Buckley, J., has found as a fact that the value of the company's assets was such that the ordinary shareholders have no pecuniary interest whatever. There was no evidence that he was misinformed, and it is not denied that on the evidence before him he arrived at a right conclusion as to the value. It is said that the scheme gives the ordinary shareholders a right to take up shares with a certain amount paid up, but that, it is argued, was a gratuitous offer by the debenture-holders, who had a right to dispose of the assets. That may be quite true. As to the question of law, it is argued, first, that the scheme is one which could have been carried out under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that, being of that character, it ought not to be sanctioned unless it places the shareholders in the same position which they would have held under that section. In my opinion, that proposition is much too wide. Then it is said that the scheme could not have been adopted under section 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, without also adopting section 161 of the Act of 1862. I will not say that, but I think the court would have refused in such a case to sanction it. Now, however, we have the Companies Act of 1900, section 24 of which appears to get over the difficulty. It enacts that "the provisions of section 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, shall apply not only as between the company and the creditors, or any class thereof, but as between the company and the members or any class thereof." In accordance with that section there were meetings of the various classes—the preference shareholders and the ordinary shareholders. The former approved the scheme, but the latter did not, and it is argued that consequently the scheme is defective. But Buckley, J., was of opinion that as the ordinary shareholders had no possible interest, their consent did not matter. If you have the assent to a particular scheme of all classes who are really interested, that is enough. Otherwise the result would be that shareholders who had not the remotest interest could obstruct the scheme unless terms were made with them. In my opinion, the decision of Buckley, J., was right.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge has held, and was justified in holding, that the ordinary shareholders had no interest in the assets of the company. Having regard to the admissions made before him, he was entitled to draw the inference he did. My opinion is based entirely on that ground.

If this scheme can be treated as a compromise between the company and the debenture-holders, and between the company and the preference shareholders, then the provisions of section 2 of the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, extended by section 24 of the Companies Act, 1900, will apply.

It is true that the ordinary shareholders are entitled under the scheme to certain shares, but this must be regarded as a gift and not as something they can lay hold of as showing they have a share in the equity of redemption. The appellants have no cause to complain of the scheme, because it gives them the option of applying for shares. The debenture-holders and preference shareholders are satisfied, and the scheme has been rightly sanctioned.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are three classes who would have a claim in the winding up of this company—the creditors, the preference shareholders (who have priority in respect of capital as well as dividends), and the ordinary shareholders. The assets are insufficient to meet the claims of more than the first two, therefore they only would have a voice if the scheme were limited to dealing with the company's property. But it gives a certain option to the ordinary shareholders. This, in my opinion, is only a concession which the debenture-holders have power to make, and whether it was made against the will of anyone is not now in question. The scheme was one which Buckley, J., was right in sanctioning.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, R. R. G. Norman; S. J. R. Stammers; Linklater & Co.; W. Shewell Morris.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Oct. 30; Nov. 6, 9.

In re A JUDGMENT DEBTOR.
Ex parte THE JUDGMENT CREDITOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Agreement for balance payable by instalments—Default—Garnishee order nisi—Bankruptcy notice—Judgment creditor—Judgment debtor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

A debtor entered into an agreement with his creditor that he should pay a certain sum down, and by way of collateral security consent to judgment for the remainder, payable by certain instalments. Judgment having been signed against him for the balance yet due, the creditor obtained a garnishee order nisi to attach all debts due to the debtor from his bankers. Shortly afterwards, two instalments being still owing on the judgment, the creditor issued a bankruptcy notice for these overdue instalments, after deducting the amount which had been garnished. The registrar set aside the bankruptcy notice on the ground that the creditor having issued a garnishee order, the proceedings on which were still pending, was not entitled under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to issue the notice.

Held, on appeal, that the decision of the registrar was right; and that the notice was bad, as being one which required the debtor to pay in accordance with the provisions of the agreement and not in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In re Feast, 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 286, 4 Morrell 37, discussed.

Petition.

This was an appeal by a judgment creditor against a decision of Mr. Registrar Brougham on the 11th of August, 1903, setting aside a bankruptcy notice which the creditor had served on the judgment debtor. The notice was served under section 4, sub-section 1 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The facts were as follows:

There had been considerable litigation between the creditor, Mr. T. Dott, and the debtor, Mr. H. Bottomley, and also between Mr. Dott and a company called the Associated Mount Jackson Gold Mines (W.A.) (Limited), and several actions resulted.

On the 18th of April, 1903, Mr. Dott obtained an order for judgment by consent by the master in chambers against Mr. Bottomley and the Associated Mount Jackson Gold Mines (Limited) for the sum of £2,700. The consideration for the said judgment by consent was embodied in an agreement of the same date by which it was agreed that the actions should be put an end to and settled upon certain terms, one of which was that the debtor should on or before the execution of the agreement pay to the creditor, the plaintiff in the action, the sum of £300 down, and as a collateral security consent to judgment for the £2,700 which was to be paid by instalments at one, two, three, four and five months, the first instalment to be the sum of £700, and the balance at the rate of £500 a month from the 27th of March, 1903. The defendant, the debtor, paid the £300 down on the same day. The first instalment of £700 became due on the 27th of April. This was not paid, but between the 27th of April and the 20th of May the debtor paid £350, but he did not pay the balance or the two instalments, which by the agreement were due on the 27th of May and the 27th of June.

On the 20th of May Mr. Dott obtained a garnishee order nisi attaching all debts owing or accruing due from the bankers of the debtor, the London and South Western Bank. The order was not served upon the debtor, but the bank informed him that an order absolute had been served upon them.

It appeared that on the 27th of May an application was made to the master in chambers to make the order nisi absolute. The debtor was not represented, not having been served with the summons.

The London and South-Western Bank at the hearing of that application admitted they had a sum of £82 8s. 10d. in hand; but the debtor contended that that sum was due to him only in his capacity as the liquidator of a company, the Associated Financial Corporation, and, being under the impression the order absolute had already been made, instructed his solicitor to claim any money which the creditor might have received under the order. Mr. Dott disputed the amount which the bank alleged they had, and obtained an order for the production of the books of the bank.

On the 2nd of June, 1903, the bank appealed against this order, and on the 5th of June the appeal was dismissed by Swinfen Eady, J., sitting in chambers.

On the 8th of June the matter came again before the master, but was adjourned for a further ten days at the request of the creditor's solicitors.

On the 19th of June the master, having read the affidavit of the debtor, directed an issue to be tried, the bank to retain the admitted sum of £82 8s. 10d., which they had in their hands, and to give inspection to the creditor of all the books relating to the debtor's account, the creditor having alleged that the £82 odd did not represent the true amount standing to the debtor's credit at the bank.

On the 13th of July the creditor issued a bankruptcy notice claiming £1,267 11s. 2d., made up of the instalments due on the 27th of April, the 27th of May, and the 27th of June, less the sum paid on the 20th of May and the £82 2s. 10d. in the hands of the bank. The bankruptcy notice was served on the debtor on the 16th of July.

On the 20th of July the debtor applied to set the bankruptcy notice aside, on the ground that he had a counterclaim exceeding the claim of the judgment creditor.

The application having come before the registrar on the 28th of July, was dismissed by him on the ground that as the debtor was not present he was not prepared to go on with the counterclaim, and he declined to go into the technical point on that application on the ground that technical points on the bankruptcy notice could only be raised by notice of motion.

Notice of motion was accordingly served on the 30th of July, and on the 11th of August, after going fully into the facts, the registrar made an order dismissing the petition on the ground that he was not prepared to hold that the creditor, Mr. Dott, having obtained the garnishee order nisi which was still pending, was entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice. The creditor subsequently issued a second bankruptcy notice, but this was dismissed on the 17th of August, 1903, by another registrar, after an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the petitioning creditor to have the petition adjourned until after the decision of the appeal from the order setting aside the former bankruptcy notice. The main question was whether or not, at the time when the bankruptcy notice was issued, it was a notice requiring the debtor to pay the judgment creditor in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

Section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is as follows: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases (inter alia): (g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or, by leave of the court, elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or to compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not, within seven days after service of the notice, in case the service is effected in England, and in case the service is effected elsewhere then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice, or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

From these decisions of the registrars the judgment creditor appealed, and it was agreed that the second appeal should abide the result of the first, but if the appeals were successful, then the petition was to be restored to the registrar's list, so that the facts might be fully gone into.

Muir Mackenzie and J. S. Green, for the appellant.—The execution on the judgment had not been stayed within the meaning of the section. The bankruptcy notice was perfectly regular with regard to the amount due in respect of the judgment.

The following cases were cited, the first four of which the learned counsel described as "warrant of attorney" cases: Tilby v. Best, 16 East. 163; Barber v. Barber, 3 Taunt. 465; Cuthbert v. Dobbin, 1 C. B. 278; In re Followes, [1895] 2 Q. B. 621, 44 W. R. Dig. 12; and In re Feast, 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 286, 4 Morrell 37.

H. Reed, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the respondent.—The money of a debtor could not be attached by a garnishee order, since it deprived him of the means of paying his debt, whilst at the same time a bankruptcy notice was issued against him. The creditor could not while he held such a security claim this debt by a bankruptcy notice. He had adopted other means, he could not levy execution while the issue was still pending, nor could he by this bankruptcy notice claim a part only of the judgment debt. The agreement was quite apart from the judgment. The cases cited for the appellant were no authority on the question of a bankruptcy notice; the question was as to the whole status of the debtor; the actual terms of the section must be looked to; the case of In re Feast was a case where the whole amount was sued for, but in this case it was for instalments, and the creditor is not suing in accordance with the terms of the judgment; he must take certain steps in accordance with the Act to ascertain what is due. Having regard to the terms the parties arranged, the debt was modified by the judgment, and none of the cases cited are relevant. There was no abandonment of the money, which had not become due at the date of the notice.

They cited the following cases: Ex parte Raymond, 9 Morrell 108 (note), 66 L. T. 400, 40 W. R. Dig. 14; In re Child, 40 W. R. 560, 9 Morrell 903, 40 W. R. Dig. 14; Ex parte Ford, 18 Q. B. D. 369, 35 W. R. Dig. 19.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply.—The debt was due upon the judgment. By the agreement payment of part of it had been postponed, and by the agreement of both the parties a bankruptcy notice might well be issued for the part due; the bankruptcy notice was perfectly regular, the debt was due in accordance with the judgment, and execution would issue on the judgment for the unpaid instalments. The case of In re Feast shows the amount for which you may issue execution, and the amount which the non-performance of the agreement releases is under the judgment and not under the agreement. In principle it does not differ from an agreement after the judgment controlling the right to enforce it; the only amount for which execution could issue would be the amount of the then due instalments. If judgment is for payment by instalments, the right to issue execution is for the amount of the instalments.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have come to a conclusion in this case that I somewhat regret in being compelled to arrive at, as there are not on the part of the debtor any merits which would predispose one to arrive at a decision in his favour. In the case before us there was a negotiation between Mr. Bottomley and Mr. Dott which resulted in an agreement, and that an agreement which really amounts to other things, an agreement that Bottomley owed a particular sum, and that that sum should be paid by certain instalments. By way of collateral security for the due performance of the agreement it was agreed that Mr. Bottomley should consent to judgment. There was nothing said in the agreement as to whether successive executions are to become leviable on default of one or on successive instalments on this judgment. Default was made in payment of some of the instalments, so a bankruptcy notice was issued when Mr. Bottomley owed the whole of the judgment debt. The matter came before the learned registrar on an application to set aside the bankruptcy notice, and in my opinion it was rightly set aside, but Mr. Dott issued a second bankruptcy notice in spite of this, showing upon the margin of the request in which the bankruptcy notice was issued that the sum claimed consisted of the amount of the overdue instalments after giving credit for the amount which had been attached by the garnishee order.

The main question was whether at the time when the bankruptcy notice was issued, it was a notice requiring Mr. Bottomley to pay the judgment creditor in accordance with the terms of the judgment. I do not think that it was. I think that it was a notice requiring him to pay in accordance with the terms of the agreement. With regard to the sections of the Act of Parliament which create a new act of bankruptcy, such sections should be strictly construed. When I say that this was not a notice requiring him to pay in accordance with the terms of the judgment, I think that it is right I should make a few remarks about a fi. fa., and in connection with this particular section. I am far from saying that at common law you could not have execution for part of a judgment debt, but such execution by a writ of fi. fa. would be clearly bad if it did not appear on the face of the fi. fa. that it was for part of the debt. In the case before us the notice, when it was served, was not a notice which showed it was for part of a debt. In addition, this notice is a notice which does not seem to me to fall within the spirit of the section at all. The Act of Parliament intended that an act of bankruptcy should be committed if the debtor did not pay a debt adjudged due from him, and the question here ought to turn on the judgment and not on an agreement more or less complicated. I do not think this notice comes within the terms of the section. There is nothing here to prevent the creditor from issuing a bankruptcy notice when all the instalments have become due. The whole of the judgment debt would then have become due. I do not think the position here is that, and therefore the bankruptcy notice as such fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this bankruptcy notice is bad. The judgment on the face of it does not require payment by instalments. I think it clear that when you have a judgment in that form a bankruptcy notice must require payment of the sum alleged to be due in accordance with the terms of the judgment. The debtor should be able to see from the bankruptcy notice the exact amount which is claimed upon the judgment. There is no doubt that a sum might be claimed other than the real amount due, this would not be fatal to the notice if it was clear that no amount more was to be claimed than in the notice itself. But a notice claiming payment of a part, leaving a balance due to be claimed afterwards, is clearly bad. In this case only part of the debt was claimed, there was something more claimed to be due, and it can only be justified by the express agreement of the parties; it is founded on the judgment as modified by the agreement, and the notice is no better than if it had set out on the face of it the facts, and requiring the debtor to pay according to the terms of an agreement outside the judgment. This was not a notice requiring payment according to the terms of the judgment, and, in my opinion, it is clearly bad. A section of an Act of Parliament specifying acts of bankruptcy needs a very careful and strict construction. The appeal therefore fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the appeal fails. The appellant could not require the debtor to pay in accordance with the terms of the judgment, and by a collateral agreement agree to accept payment by instalments; till payment was due the creditor could not require it. I do not think the Act authorizes a notice in any such terms as here, and I also think that the creditor is not entitled to issue a bankruptcy notice until all the instalments have become due. But in deciding this I am not in any way departing from anything which was laid down in In re Feast, for in that case the agreement provided that in default of payment of any instalment the whole debt should become due. The appeal therefore fails.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I wish to add that a bankruptcy notice for a smaller amount than the judgment debt on account of credit being given for payments already made by the debtor would be a notice requiring the debtor to pay the debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

Appeal dismissed, and application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Solicitors for the appellant, H. H. Wells & Sons.

Solicitors for the respondent, H. W. Chatterton.

From K. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.) } Oct. 29.

CIVIL SERVICE CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY v. GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Contract—Impossibility of performance—Hire of ship for Coronation Naval Review—Money payable and paid before review postponed—Right to recover money so paid—Practice—Costs—Depriving successful defendant of costs—Discretion of judge—Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 5.

In an action the plaintiffs sued to recover £1,500, the amount paid by them for the hire of a steamer belonging to the defendants for the Naval Review at Spithead on the occasion of his Majesty's coronation, which was fixed to take place on the 28*th of June,* 1902, but was postponed.

Held, that, although the money had been paid before it was known that owing to the King's illness the review could not take place, the defendants were entitled to retain the whole of the £1,500 which had been paid to them by the plaintiffs.

Held, also, that there were no materials before the judge at the trial upon which he could exercise any discretion with regard to depriving the defendants of their costs merely because, in his opinion, it was a case for compromise, and his offer to act as arbitrator had been declined by the defendants, and the order on that point was accordingly reversed.

Blakeley v. Muller, 19 Times L. R. 186, 88 L. T. 90, 51 W. R. Dig. 40, approved.

Appeal by the plaintiff society from a judgment of Bigham, J., who tried the case without a jury, sitting as judge to hear commercial causes, and cross-appeal by the defendant company from so much of the judgment as deprived them of their costs.

In the action the plaintiffs claimed to recover back £1,500, money paid by them for the hire of a steamer belonging to the defendants for the naval review which was to have been held at Spithead on the 28th of June, 1902, but was postponed owing to the King's illness.

By a charter-party dated the 22nd of March, 1902, the defendants agreed to let to the plaintiffs their steamer Hirondelle for three days from the hour when she was placed at the charterers' disposal in London on the day preceding the naval review to be held at Spithead on the occasion of the King's Coronation in June or July. The amount to be paid for the hire of the ship was £1,500. Of this sum £250 was to be paid on the signing of the charter-party and the balance ten days before the date fixed for the review. The review was afterwards officially fixed for the 28th of June.

The plaintiffs paid the £250 on signing the charter-party and the balance of £1,250 on the 18th of June.

On the 25th of June the Admiralty issued a notice postponing the review on account of the King's illness, and the review did not take place until August. The plaintiffs brought this action claiming to recover the £1,500 they had paid the defendants as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use on consideration which had wholly failed. At the trial evidence was given that the defendants had incurred substantial expense in preparing the ship for the review, and that they had offered to meet the plaintiffs by returning some part of the money paid. This offer the plaintiffs refused. The learned judge intimated that he thought this was a case in which there should be a compromise, and suggested that the parties should leave it to him to arbitrate in the matter. The defendants refused to accede to this proposal.

Bigham, J., in giving judgment held that, in strict law, the defendants were entitled to retain the whole of the £1,500, and he accordingly entered judgment for them. He considered, however, that they ought to have been satisfied with £500 and their costs, and on the assumption that no compromise could be arrived at he thought that each party should bear their own costs.

No compromise was come to, and judgment was accordingly entered for the defendants, but without costs.

The plaintiffs appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the defendants, who asked that the order so far as it deprived them of costs should be reversed.

Bray, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the plaintiffs.—This case differs from a number of cases which have recently been before the courts in so far that in all those cases the money was not paid in full prior to the postponement of the Coronation festivities being announced, and in all those cases the court has held that each party was excused from any further performance of the terms of the contract. On those authorities it is clear that if the £1,500 had not been paid the defendants could not have sued for it or any part of it. That is clear from Krell v. Henry, 19 Times L. R. 711. That was the case of an agreement to let a flat overlooking Pall Mall, and it was there held by Darling, J., whose decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, that it was not within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was made that the Coronation procession would not take place, and it being an implied condition that the procession would take place, the defendant was not liable. Here the consideration wholly failed, the event contemplated in the charter-party not having taken place, and therefore money paid, the consideration for the payment of which has failed, can be recovered: Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826.

The following cases were also referred to: Appleby v. Meyers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 15 W. R. Dig. 127; Howell v. Coupland, 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q. B. D. 258; Blakeley v. Muller, 19 Times L. R. 186.

Scrutton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants, were heard only on the question of costs. There were no materials here upon which the learned judge could exercise any discretion with regard to depriving the defendants of their costs. Jessel, M.R., in Cooper v. Whittingham, 15 Ch. D., at p. 501, says: "Where a plaintiff comes to enforce a legal right, and there has been no misconduct on his part—no omission or neglect which would induce the court to deprive him of his costs—the court has no discretion and cannot take away the plaintiff's right to costs." That statement of the law has never been questioned, and here there being no "good cause shown" why the defendants should not have their costs. The learned judge acted ultra vires in making an order depriving them of their costs. Granville v. Firth, 88 L. T. Rep. 9, 51 W. R. Dig. 126, is also an authority on this point. Merely because the defendants, after their offer to return half of the £1,500 had been refused, chose to stand on their strict rights and declined to agree to arbitration by the judge, is no ground at all —no misconduct—that could disentitle them to costs.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Eustace Hills, in reply.—Under section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, a judge has much wider discretion than formerly, and although the defendants were in his opinion entitled to judgment, the justice of the case in his opinion would be met by their being deprived of their costs. The learned judge on the facts, sitting as judge and jury, had jurisdiction to decide the question of costs, and under the statute he had power to make the order.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case it appears to me that without overruling a very considerable body of authority we cannot doubt the decision of the learned judge in respect of the main question here —viz., the right of the defendants to retain what they have got and to excuse the parties from any further performance of the contract on the either side. Without overruling a very considerable body of authority on that subject we cannot possibly disagree with what my brother Bigham has decided. I think his judgment in that respect is right. I think he rightly construed what are the obligations of the parties, and I think it may also be said that, without actually deciding this case in the Court of Appeal, the question has been brought before us in such a manner as I think it would in effect, though not perhaps in strict law, be to reverse a decision which this court has already arrived at. The question has been litigated before the Lord Chief Justice and he has taken a view on that subject with which I entirely concur. I observe that Channell, J., referring to the case of Blakeley v. Muller, says, "It does not appear whether there was any express contract as to when the money was payable. If the money was payable on some day subsequent to the abandonment of the procession I do not think it could have been sued for. If, however it was payable prior to the abandonment of the procession, the position would be the same as if it had been actually paid and could not be recovered back and could not be sued for. All Taylor v. Caldwell says is that the parties are to be excused from the performance of the contract, and Appleby v. Meyers from the further performance. It is impossible to import a condition into a contract which the parties could have imported and have not done so. All that can be said is that when the procession was abandoned the contract was off, not that anything done under the contract was void. The loss must remain where it was at the time of the abandonment. It is like the case of a charter-party where the freight is payable in advance, and the voyage is not completed and the freight therefore not earned. Where the non-completion arose through impossibility of performance the freight could not be recovered back. Of course, if the contract for seats had been made subsequent to the abandonment of the procession, that would be different altogether. There the money could be recovered." I concur with every word of that, and I think, substituting the words "Naval Review" for "procession," the words are strictly applicable to the present case. The plaintiffs' appeal therefore fails.

There comes then the question which has been last argued—an important question, and one I think within the power of this court to entertain. No doubt where a judge has expressed his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, and has, with those materials before him, expressed that discretion, it may not be, and I indeed think it is not, in the power of the Court of Appeal to overrule that discretion, if what I have described as the necessary hypothesis is satisfied—namely, material upon which that discretion can be exercised. But in this case, so far as the evidence goes which is before us, I can see no materials whatever upon which the learned judge could exercise a discretion at all. The defendants are sued, and rightly, according to the law, resist the suit, and finally succeed, and in the judgment of this court and in that of Bigham, J., in point of law they are right. What, however, the learned judge did was practically to deprive the person sued of what is primâ facie his right—namely, the costs of the litigation which has been unsuccessfully brought against him; because he would not submit to the learned judge being himself the arbitrator to say what should be done. That is not exercising a discretion upon material properly before him; but it is depriving a suitor of the rights which by law he has, upon grounds which it is not competent for the learned judge to treat as grounds for the exercise of his discretion.

Under those circumstances I am of opinion that the cross-appeal must succeed, and that the defendants are entitled to their costs.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I agree. Upon the merits I have nothing to add. The Lord Chancellor has expressed exactly my view, and I can only say that I do not think that this court could have decided otherwise without overruling the case of Blakeley v. Muller, the judgment of which, particularly the judgment of Channell, J., has been cited by the Lord Chancellor with approval.

On the second point I need only say that it has been laid down in more than one case that section 5 of the Judicature Act of 1890 did not in any way alter the law as to the discretion of a judge, or alter the law as to the power of the Court of Appeal with regard to discretion in dealing with questions of costs.

It merely brought within the orbit of that discretion certain cases as to which it was doubtful whether the costs were in the discretion of the learned judge. If it appears to the Court of Appeal that the learned judge has not exercised his discretion or has decided upon grounds which were not open for him, the Court of Appeal can still deal with his discretion.

I should like to say that the case which the Lord Chancellor probably for the moment forgot to mention, and which he decided in this court a few months ago, the case where a person was deprived of his costs because he pleaded the Gaming Act, is also in point. Therefore I think the cross-appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I concur, and I have nothing to add.

The appeal was dismissed, and the cross-appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Nicholson, Patterson, & Freeland.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. Batham & Son.

From K. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.) } Oct. 29.

STEPHENSON v. LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Clerk in bank—Qualified to receive retiring allowance—"Retiring with the consent of the directors"—Act by clerk contrary to the policy of the bank—Intimation to clerk to resign—Right to pension.

When a clerk breaks an unwritten but well recognized rule of his employer, and receives in consequence a letter requiring him to resign, that notice, although polite instead of peremptory language was used, is a dismissal.

Held, therefore, that the plaintiff, who had received such a notice, was not entitled to a retiring allowance; one of the conditions on which such an allowance was granted being that the applicant "retired with the consent of the directors."

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Wright, J.

The facts were substantially these:

The plaintiff entered the service of the defendant bank on the 24th of February, 1879, and signed a form of rules and regulations for granting retiring allowances to the officers of the bank. The second rule provided that each officer retiring with the consent of the directors should, if he had served twenty years or reached the age of sixty, receive an allowance of one-third his then salary. The fifth rule enacted that no retiring allowance whatever was to be granted to any officer who was dismissed.

In October, 1899, the plaintiff endorsed a promissory note which was drawn by a Mr. Horace Sedger. The note was discounted at a branch of the defendant bank, and the signature was noticed and information given to the directors, it being a rule of the bank that under no circumstances was any officer of theirs to put his name to a customer's bill. The plaintiff was called upon to explain and stated that he had been promised £25 for indorsing the note and that he was unaware that Mr. Sedger was other than a person of sound financial position.

On the 16th of November, 1899, the plaintiff received a letter from the secretary to the bank in regard to this matter, which contained these words, "You are required to resign your appointment in the bank forthwith," and on the 20th of November the plaintiff sent in his resignation.

Wright, J., held that the plaintiff, although he had served for twenty years, could not claim a pension, as he had failed to bring himself within the words of the rule "retiring with the consent of the directors," and he accordingly entered judgment for the bank.

The plaintiff appealed.

W. R. Warren, for the plaintiff.—The Act which the directors objected to the plaintiff doing was an Act per se not wrongful. At most therefore he had been guilty of a technical offence against an unwritten, though known rule, of the bank. It would be most unjust that such an offence should lose him the right to a pension, especially as he had, for the period of twenty years, so much each year set aside from his salary for the fund. There was no resolution of the Board dismissing him—no resolution of the Board that in their opinion he was not entitled to a pension. The words "you are required to resign" did not of themselves amount to dismissal, and he was justified in asking for a declaration that he was entitled to a pension from the bank on retiring from his position of clerk.

Bray, K.C., and Schiller, for the bank, were not called on.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not think we need hear the respondents in this case, for looking at the facts and the rules of the bank, I entertain no doubt on the point. In my judgment my brother Wright has come to a perfectly correct decision. I can quite understand that there may be cases in which a person may be permitted to resign without the intimation that he should do so amounting to a dismissal. But we must look at the whole facts of the case, and in doing so here there can be no doubt left that this plaintiff was dismissed. The defendants here used polite instead of peremptory language; but their doing so does not alter the fact that in plain language what they wrote was "you must go." That was a dismissal and there is an end of the case.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Bate & Co.; Clarke, Rawlins, & Co.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Aug. 6, 1903.

HERNE BAY STEAMBOAT CO. v. HUTTON. (a.)

Contract—Hire of ship—Purpose of hirer—Impossibility of carrying out purpose—Failure of consideration—Breach of contract—Damages.

The fact that in a contract for hire of a vessel the objects of the hirer are stated does not constitute those objects the basis of the contract so as to discharge the parties in the event of the performance of those objects becoming impossible. A ship was hired by agreement in writing "for the purpose of viewing the naval review and for a day's cruise round the fleet." On the postponement of the naval review the hirer declined to proceed with the contract.

Held, that this was not a joint speculation by the hirer and the owners of the ship, but that the risk was the hirer's alone; nor was the taking place of the review the basis for the performance of the contract. Consequently the hirer was not discharged from the contract, and was liable in damages for its breach.

This was an appeal from the decision of Grantham, J.

The plaintiff company owned a steamboat called The Cynthia, which was employed for the daily conveyance of passengers between Herne Bay and Gravesend and other places on the Thames.

On the 23rd of May, 1902, the following agreement was entered into between the defendant and H. C. Jones, a director and secretary of the plaintiff company, on behalf of the company: "The Cynthia to be at Mr. Hutton's disposal at an approved pier or berth at Southampton on the morning of the 28th of June, perils of the sea, &c., permitting, to take out a party, not exceeding the number for which the vessel is licensed, to the position assigned by the Admiralty, for the purpose of viewing the naval review and for a day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, the 29th of June, for similar purposes. Owners to provide crew, coals, and all necessary assistance, Mr. Hutton to pay all tolls, pier dues, &c. Owners to have the right of ten persons above crew, &c., on board. Price £250, payable £50 down, balance before ship leaves Herne Bay."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was also agreed that the plaintiffs should cater for the passengers during the two days at so much a head.

This agreement was signed by both parties, and the £50 deposit was paid to Jones. Considerable correspondence passed between the parties as to the position to be assigned to the ship at the review and other matters; the plaintiffs also assisted the defendant in the disposal of tickets and in posting notices of the intended trips.

Ultimately, on the 23rd of June, Mr. Jones wired to the defendant asking for payment of the balance of £200 and also a definite statement as to the number of people to be catered for, but received no reply.

On the 25th of June, 1902, the official announcement cancelling the review was published.

The ship being then at Herne Bay, Jones wired to the defendant's address "What about Cynthia? She ready to start at six to morrow, waiting cash," but received no reply.

The plaintiffs accordingly decided that the ship should resume her ordinary sailings, which she did, and the plaintiffs made profits thereby on the 28th and 29th of June.

On the 29th of June the defendant called on Jones and stated that as the review had been cancelled he did not require the ship. He declined to pay the balance of £200, or to have anything more to do with the agreement. On the two days in question, although the review was cancelled, the fleet remained anchored at Spithead.

On the 7th of July, 1902, the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action, claiming the balance of £200 under the agreement.

The defendant, in his defence, pleaded that the ship was not put at his disposal, but that the plaintiffs were running her for their own benefit on the 28th and 29th of June, and on each day between the 22nd of June and the 2nd of July inclusive. The defendant further alleged that it was a condition of the agreement, either expressed or implied, that the naval review should take place on the 28th of June, and that the consideration for the agreement wholly failed. The defendant counter-claimed for the return of the deposit of £50.

In their reply and defence to the counter-claim the plaintiffs asserted that they provided a crew, obtained coals, and prepared the ship for the use of the defendant, but that according to the terms of the agreement she was not to leave Herne Bay until payment of the balance of the agreed price, and that they did not run the ship until after the defendant had neglected to pay the balance. As to the counter-claim, they denied that the consideration had failed, and insisted that the £50 was paid down on account of the agreed price of £250.

At the trial the plaintiffs reduced their claim to £110, a profit of £90 having been made by their running of the ship on the two days in question.

The action was tried by Grantham, J., without a jury, and judgment was given for the defendant on the claim with costs, and for the plaintiffs on the counter-claim with costs, but execution was stayed to enable the plaintiffs to appeal.

The plaintiffs appealed from so much of the judgment as refused their claim.

Lush, K.C., and Poyser, for the plaintiffs.

Hansell and Firminger, for the defendant.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments: Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826; Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. 605, 27 W. R. Dig. 95; Nickoll v. Ashton, 49 W. R. 513, [1901] 2 K. B. 126; Hobson v. Pattenden, 88 L. T. 90; Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 169, L. R. 10 C. P. 125; Dean v. Hogg, 10 Bing. 345; and Lucas v. Nockells, 4 Bing. 729.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed.

I wish first to call attention to this, that what the plaintiffs originally claimed in this action was the sum of £200, being the balance of the price of £250 which was agreed to be paid. That actual sum, in my judgment, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. I do not think Mr. Lush could have borne in mind that that was the original claim, and, therefore, he regarded some of the observations of Grantham, J., dealing with the original claim as if they were applicable to the subsequent claim. In my judgment there was, in this case, before the time came for the performance of the contract, a plain repudiation by the defendant of his obligations under it; and this is in fact admitted. He refused to carry out the contract on his part, and the plaintiffs, acting very properly in the circumstances, employed the steamer on her usual daily services, and made what profit they could out of her during the two days for which it was intended by the contract that the defendant should have the use of the vessel. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs' claim is really for damages for the defendant's refusal to carry out the contract, and it is agreed that these damages are not £200, but that sum less the profit made by the plaintiffs from having the use of the ship after the repudiation of the contract by the defendant. These damages, I think, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. In my opinion, this contract really placed the vessel at the disposal of the defendant for these particular days. The contract, which was signed by Mr. Jones, acting for the owners of the ship, runs thus: [His lordship read it, and continued:] According to my understanding of this contract, this ship was placed at the disposal of Mr. Hutton really for those two days. Mr. Hansell says this does not constitute a demise of the ship, and with that I agree. It is very rarely that a charter party does contain a demise of a ship. Generally speaking, the ship is not demised at all, but remains under the management and control of her owner. But at the same time this contract does, in my opinion, place the ship at the disposal of Mr. Hutton, just as a charterparty places the vessel, the subject of it, at the disposal of the charterers.

That being so, what is there besides in the present case? Only this, that Mr. Hutton, in hiring this vessel, had two objects in view: first, to take people to see the Naval Review, and, secondly, to take them round the fleet. Those, no doubt, were the purposes of Mr. Hutton, but it does not seem to me that because, as it is said, those purposes became impossible, it would be a very legitimate inference that the happening of the Naval Review was contemplated by both parties as the basis and foundation of this contract, so as to bring the case within the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell. On the contrary, when the contract is properly regarded, I think the purpose of Mr. Hutton, whether of seeing the Naval Review, or of going round the fleet with a party of paying-guests, does not lay the foundation of the contract within the authorities.

Having expressed that view, I do not know that there is any advantage to be gained by going on in any way to define what are the circumstances which might or might not constitute the happening of a particular contingency as the foundation of a contract. I will content myself with saying this, that I see nothing that makes this contract differ from a case where, for instance, a person has engaged a brake to take himself and a party to Epsom to see the races there, but for some reason or other, such as the spread of an infectious disease, the races are postponed. In such a case it could not be said that he could be relieved of his bargain. So in the present case it is sufficient to say that the happening of the Naval Review was not the foundation of the contract.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I may point out that this case is not one in which the subject-matter of the contract is a mere licence to the defendant to use a ship for the purpose of seeing the naval review and going round the fleet. In my opinion, as Vaughan Williams, L.J., has said, it is a contract for the hiring of a ship by the defendant for a certain voyage, though having, no doubt, a special object, namely, to see the naval review and the fleet; but it appears to me that the object was a matter with which the defendant, as hirer of the ship, was alone concerned, and not the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship.

The case cannot, in my opinion, be distinguished in principle from many common cases in which, on the hiring of a ship, you find the objects of the hiring stated. Very often you find the details of the voyage stated with particularity, and also the nature and details of the cargo to be carried. If the voyage is intended to be one of pleasure, the object in view may also be stated, which is a matter that concerns the passengers. But this statement of the objects of the hirer of the ship would not, in my opinion, justify him in saying that the owner of the ship had those objects just as much in view as the hirer himself. The owner would say, "I have an interest in the ship as a passenger or cargo-carrying machine, and I enter into the contract simply in that capacity; it is for the hirer to concern himself about the objects."

In the present case, with regard to the suggestion that there was something in the stipulations that the plaintiffs were to have the right on their part of placing ten persons on board, which would change the nature of the hiring, I need only say that there is nothing in that provision to lead the court to treat the transaction otherwise than as an ordinary case of hiring a vessel; it does not make it in any sense a joint speculation or anything of that sort. The stipulation that the owners are "to have the right of ten persons above crew, &c., on board" only amounts to this, that in the eye of the law the defendant as the hirer of the ship licenses the owner to send ten persons on board.

The view I have expressed with regard to the general effect of the contract before us is borne out by the following considerations. The ship (as a ship) had nothing particular to do with the review or the fleet, except as a convenient carrier of passengers to see it; any other ship suitable for carrying passengers would have done equally as well. Just as in the case of the hire of a cab or other vehicle, although the object of the hirer might be stated, that statement would not make the object any the less a matter for the hirer alone, and would not directly affect the person who was letting out the vehicle for hire. In the present case I may point out that it cannot be said that by reason of the failure to hold the Naval Review there was a total failure of consideration. That cannot be so. Nor is there anything like a total destruction of the subject-matter of the contract. Nor can we, in my opinion, imply in this contract any condition in favour of the defendant which would enable him to escape liability. A condition ought only to be implied in order to carry the presumed intention of the parties, and I cannot ascertain any such presumed intention here. It follows that, in my opinion, as far as the plaintiffs are concerned, the objects of the passengers on this voyage with regard to sight-seeing do not form the subject-matter or essence of this contract. With regard to the one contention of fact on which the defendant relied—namely, that the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship, had on their part put themselves in the position of not having been able to carry out the contract, and so repudiated it, I can only say that the defendant has not proved his case.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs are owners of a steam vessel for carrying passengers from Herne Bay to Gravesend and other places on the Thames. The defendant is a gentleman who seems to have formed the idea of making a profit by the conveyance of passengers on the 28th and 29th of June from Southampton to see the Naval Review, and afterwards for a cruise round the fleet. From the correspondence it appears to me to be clear that this venture was the venture of the defendant alone, and that although the plaintiffs assisted him by selling tickets and posting notices of what was proposed to be done, yet the risk was entirely that of the defendant.

In that state of things the defendant entered into a contract by which the steamship belonging to the plaintiffs was to be employed by the defendant for the purpose of this venture which, as I say, was his alone. The contract was reduced into writing. I need not read it again, but the most material part is that the vessel is to be "at Mr. Hutton's disposal" to take out the party of passengers. I agree that this contract did not amount to a demise of the ship; it was, however, a contract entered into for valuable consideration as to the employment of the ship on the two days in question, and it at least conferred this interest on the defendant that if the plaintiffs had attempted to violate it, that attempted violation would have been a ground for an injunction at the instance of the plaintiffs to prevent it. That is established by De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276. It is said that by reason of the reference in the contract to the "Naval Review" the existence of the review formed the basis of the contract, and that as the review failed to take place the parties became discharged from the further performance of the contract in accordance with the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell. I am unable to arrive at that conclusion. It seems to me that the reference in the contract to the "Naval Review" is easily explained: It was inserted in order to define more exactly the nature of the voyage, and I am unable to treat it as being such a reference as to constitute the Naval Review the foundation of the contract so as to entitle either party to the benefit of the doctrine in Taylor v. Caldwell. I come to this conclusion the more readily because the object of the voyage is not limited to the Naval Review, but also extends to a cruise round the fleet. The fleet was there, and passengers might have been found willing to go round it. It is true that in the events which happened the object of the voyage became limited, but in my opinion that was the risk of the defendant, whose venture the taking the passengers was.

For these reasons I am unable to agree with the learned judge that in the contemplation of the parties the taking place of the review was the basis for the performance of the contract, and I think that the defendant is not discharged from its performance.

I also agree that there is no evidence that the plaintiffs repudiated the contract before any breach by the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Jones & Hamp; Biggs Roche; Sawyer & Co.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Aug. 4, 6, 1903.

GREENOCK STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. MARITIME INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Voyage policy—Round voyage—Implied warranty of seaworthiness—Insufficiency of coal—Sacrifice of cargo and spars—Negligence clause—Breach of warranty covered by insurance.

There are only two kinds of insurance policies, "time policies" and "voyage policies," and a voyage policy does not lose its character because the voyage is of an indeterminate nature instead of being between specified ports.

A steamship was insured for a round voyage from the United Kingdom to port or ports on the West Coast of South America and back again, with leave to call at any ports or places on the East Coast of South America. The perils insured against were of the seas, and the clauses annexed provided (inter alia) that the insurance should cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. The vessel started on one of the stages of the voyage with an insufficient supply of coal to carry her to the next coaling place, in consequence of which it became necessary to sacrifice part of the cargo, spars, and fittings.

Held, that the starting of the vessel on a stage of the voyage with an insufficient quantity of coal was a breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness on the part of the shipowner.

The principle of The Vortigern, 47 W. R. 437, [1899] P. 140, applied.

Decision of Bigham, J. (51 W. R. 447, [1903] 1 K. B. 367), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bigham, J. (reported 51 W. R. 447; 1903, 1 K. B. 367).

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Gulf of Florida against the defendant company on a policy of insurance dated the 19th of July, 1897.

The policy contained the following terms: "For £3,000 on The Gulf of Florida, valued at £30,000, at and from to port and ports in any order in the United Kingdom and/or Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there and thence to port or ports, place or places, on West Coast of South America backwards and forwards and forwards and backwards in any order or rotation, while there and thence to port or ports of call, and/or discharge in any order in the United Kingdom, and/or Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg, both inclusive, and while there, however employed, until expiry of thirty days after arrival or until sailing on next voyage whichever may first occur. With leave to call at any ports or places for all purposes, and any ports or places on the east coast of South America and/or Falkland Island, both outwards and homewards. The risk not to commence before the expiration of previous policies. Against the risk of total loss only, but including collision clause, general average, and salvage charges. Perils insured against of the seas, &c. Subject to and including Gulf Line Voyage Clauses as annexed."

These clauses included the following: "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. Including all risks incidental to steam navigation. General average salvage and special charges payable as per official foreign adjustment if so made up, or per York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, if in accordance with the contract of affreightment. Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and [or] any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged. It shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns to use, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said ship, &c., and any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance."

On arrival at Montevideo The Gulf of Florida filled up her bunkers with coal, and left on the 18th of December with 563 tons of coal. Meeting with an accident on the same day she put back to Montevideo.

On the 23rd of December she resumed the voyage, having 542 tons in her bunkers, which was considered still sufficient to take her to St. Vincent, her next coaling place.

On the voyage she encountered stormy head wind and seas. The coal was found to be burning quickly; consequently, on the 9th of January, the speed was reduced.

On the next and following days part of the cargo, fittings, and spars was used as fuel. But for this sacrifice the vessel would not have made St. Vincent unassisted.

The quantity of coal when the ship left Montevideo, both on the 18th of December and on the 23rd of December, was, in fact, insufficient for the passage to St. Vincent.

The plaintiff company paid £662 1s. 11d. for the cargo so used as fuel to the consignees, and the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed was £312 4s.

The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to the defendants' proportion of the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed and of the sums paid for the cargo so sacrificed, and alternatively for their proportion of the value of the spars and fittings so sacrificed and of the ship's contribution in general average in respect of the burnt cargo. Further, they claimed that they were entitled to recover on the payment of an additional premium to be fixed by the court.

Bigham, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C., and Leck, for the plaintiffs.—If this policy is a "voyage policy" then we submit that there was no warranty of a sufficient supply of coal for the whole voyage: Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 405. The case of The Vortigern, 47 W. R. 437, [1899] P. 140, is distinguishable. In that case the voyage was from one specified port to another specified port. Here the voyage is indeterminate. This is really a time policy, and no warranty of seaworthiness is implied: Gibson v. Small, 4 H. L. C. 353; Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 25 W. R. 499, 2 A. C. 284.

They also cited Hamlyn & Co. v. Wood & Co., 40 W. R. 24, [1891] 2 Q. B. 488; Strang, Steel, & Co. v. A. Scott & Co., 14 A. C. 601; Montgomery v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Co., 50 W. R. 440, [1902] 1 K. B. 734.

Hamilton, K.C., and Simey, for the defendants.—This case is really covered by The Vortigern. The policy is a voyage policy for a voyage by stages, and if the shipowner has not sufficient coal at the commencement of each stage he fails in defeating the primâ facie inference of unseaworthiness.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think this case is really covered by the decision in The Vortigern. Mr. Carver's argument was in reality an argument that the policy here was in effect a time policy. He felt pressed by the words of the policy, which not only do not describe the risk to be taken as being a time risk, but so describe it as to show obviously that the real risk was to continue from the time of leaving one of the optional ports, either in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, until the arrival back again of the ship at any of the optional ultimate ports. In stress of having to satisfy those words he attempted to say that this was neither a time policy nor a voyage policy and that therefore there was absolutely no warrant of seaworthiness by the shipowner at all. I do not myself think that it very much matters what this policy is called—whether a time policy or a voyage policy. One must look at the policy and see what was contemplated by the shipowner and the underwriters respectively, and whether, having regard to what both parties contemplated, the ship was seaworthy. Speaking for myself I utterly reject the notion that under this policy it is possible to say that there was no warrant of seaworthiness at all. In fact Mr. Carver himself shrank from saying that there was no warrant of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. Once assume that there was an original warranty of seaworthiness, then it seems to me that the principle of the decision in The Vortigern absolutely covers this case. Looking at the judgments in The Vortigern it seems to me that whether one regards the judgment of Barnes, J., in the first instance, or the judgments in the Court of Appeal, the whole of the reasoning applies to the present case. For the purposes of my judgment I must assume that under the circumstances of this case there was a plainly implied warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. If that is so, it seems to me that the case is entirely covered by the judgment of Barnes, J., and of the Court of Appeal. I called attention just now to the passage in the judgment of Barnes, J., at the top of p. 147 of the report of The Vortigern, which seems to me to entirely accord with the following statement of A. S. Smith, L.J. on p. 153: "To obviate this difficulty—and a great difficulty it is in cases of long voyages of cargo-carrying steamships, for it is manifest that no cargo-carrying steamship can ever be seaworthy when she starts upon such a voyage as the present, by reason of the impossibility of her having on board such an equipment of coal as will be sufficient to take her to the port of destination—it has become the practice, by reason of the necessity of the case, for cargo-carrying steamship owners to divide these long voyages into stages for the purposes of replenishing their ships with coal, and thus, as far as practicable, complying with the warranty of seaworthiness which attached when the ship commenced her voyage." Looking at that passage, and also at the passage on p. 155 in the same judgment, it is clear that the holding is that the warranty of seaworthiness in the case of a long voyage is not broken because the steamer does not start in a seaworthy condition, but that the shipowner is entitled to satisfy the implied warranty by taking on board coal at the commencement of each stage of the voyage. It is plain that to hold that there is no such breach of warranty is a concession made by the law in favour of the shipowner rather than of the underwiters; and it is also plain that the way in which the court regards these stages is to look at the voyage which is contemplated at each point at which the ship takes advantage of this liberty and stops to coal—that is to say, the shipowner must coal before the then contemplated voyage. That does not mean, however, in a case like the present, a voyage which is defined in terms upon the face of the policy; but it means that the shipowner, taking advantage of this method of satisfying the implied warranty, must make up his mind to what port he intends to proceed; and he will only satisfy the warranty if he takes on board a sufficiency of coal for that contemplated voyage.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I only desire to add this: We have here a case which, having regard to the enormous extent of sea-carriage in the present day, must be arising every day. A voyage contemplated by a shipowner and underwriters such as we have here, including, as it does, undefined coasting voyages, must obviously be likely to give rise to occasions when the master of the ship is placed in great difficulty, not only in respect of the quantity and quality of the coal which he may be able to obtain, but also as to the time when he will be able to reach another coaling station. In such cases a very great stress must be thrown upon the master—even the most prudent master; and unless the shipowner was content that his ship should go to sea under such conditions as to render it by no means impossible that even with a fairly prudent master he, the shipowner, might find himself uninsured through the breach of warranty of seaworthiness—a warranty which ex hypothesi it is impossible to satisfy at the starting of the ship—one would have thought that, as between the contracting parties, the underwriters would have charged a sufficient premium in such a form that the shipowner's insurance should not be entirely dependent upon the judgment of the master in the decision of this difficult question as to the quantity and quality of the coal which he might require. But for some reason or other the parties to these contracts of insurance seem to consider that the interests of commerce are forwarded by leaving things in a more or less uncertain state, so that the shipowner undertaking a voyage of this sort can never feel very confident that he is really covered by his insurance.

In my opinion the decision of the learned judge was right, and this appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think this case is covered in principle by the case of The Vortigern, by which this court is bound. The form of the policy, on which the case before us turns, is one which to my mind shows that the policy is what is commonly called "a voyage policy"—a voyage policy properly so called. I may here remark that the policy is so described by the parties on the face of it. It is for a voyage from any port or ports in the United Kingdom and the continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg to any port or ports on the west coast of South America, and back again to corresponding ports. Undoubtedly this voyage is a curious one, because it may cover voyages between ports on the west coast of South America. If the case had been one simply for a voyage, say, from any port to be selected in a defined portion of Europe to a port to be selected in any defined portion of the west coast of South America and back again, nobody could for a moment have suggested that that was not a voyage policy in the strictest sense of the term to which the ordinary insurance law applicable to an implied warranty of seaworthiness would apply. The difference between that case and the present is really only one of degree. No doubt the voyage that is defined in this policy was a very onerous one for shipowners to undertake to insure against on one policy, but that was for them to consider. If the shipowners had wished to negative the implied warranty of seaworthiness on such a voyage to any extent, it was for them to do so by express bargain and by express stipulation in the policy. According to insurance law as applicable to the kind of question we have to decide on this appeal, there are only two kinds of insurance policy known—a time policy and a voyage policy. Speaking for myself, I think it would be most unfortunate for commercial law, and therefore for commercial people, if we had been obliged in this case to say that there was also a policy of a third kind known to the law—a kind of policy not hitherto supposed even by lawyers or by commercial men to exist. I do not of course mean to say but that one document might cover two policies—a voyage policy and a time policy—but in the present case the policy is not really two policies. The document does not cover two distinct insurances, and the policy is not in any true sense a time policy. It is as I have pointed out, a voyage policy, and nothing else; and I may point out, as has been frequently pointed out before, that the case of The Vortigern was really decided in favour of the shipowners.

It was to free them in long voyages from what would otherwise have been a most onerous obligation on their part in the case of steamers—namely, that they would have been obliged, however long the voyage might be, to ship coal sufficient to last the whole of the voyage. In the present case, but for the principle of The Vortigern, it would, notwithstanding the curious nature of the voyage, have been obligatory on the part of the shipowners to take care that when their vessel started from the port of departure it was reasonably coaled for the coming voyage.

With reference to an argument that was used before us in which it was said it was impossible for any shipowner to have coaled for such deviations of voyages on the west coast of South America as appear to have been contemplated by this policy, I need only say that this is not necessarily so. What the shipowner would have to do would be to coal to the extent that was reasonable, having regard to the probable nature and duration of the voyages likely to take place on the west coast.

As I have said, if shipowners choose to undertake voyages with steam vessels, and such a voyage as this, so described and so long, it is for them to protect themselves if they do not wish to incur the ordinary obligations that are cast upon them as shipowners in respect of such a voyage.

For the reasons I have given I think this appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with what was said by Bigham, J., in his judgment. He rested his decision, to a large extent, on the case of The Vortigern. That is a decision of the Court of Appeal. It was binding upon Bigham, J., and it is no less binding upon us; and unless it can be effectually distinguished from the present case it seems to me to follow that Bigham, J.'s, decision must be affirmed. Now, how is it sought to distinguish the two cases? In the first place it is said that the case of The Vortigern related to a contract of affreightment, whereas this relates to a contract of insurance. In The Vortigern I observe that the learned counsel who argued for the appellant said in his reply that the doctrine of stages which was relied upon was a doctrine of insurance and ought not to be extended to a case of affreightment. Here the argument is the other way—this is a doctrine which relates to cases of affreightment alone, and ought not to be applied to cases of insurance. Now it seems to me that both the Court of Appeal and Barnes, J., rejected that argument and treated the case as being the same, whether it arises between the steamship owner and his underwriter on a voyage policy, or between the steamship owner and the cargo owner upon a contract of affreightment. I think, therefore, that the two cases cannot be distinguished on that ground.

But then it is said in the second place—and this is really the main contention—that the contract in the case of The Vortigern related to a specified voyage, and that the contract in this case relates to a voyage of a different character. In The Vortigern the voyage was, in substance, from Manila to Liverpool, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and it was there held that the doctrine of stages applied. Now we have before us, undoubtedly, a case in which the voyage is described in much wider terms. It is from a port or ports in the United Kingdom, or within specified limits on the Continent, to a port or ports, or place or places, on the west coast of South America, and then back to a port in the United Kingdom, and between specified limits on the Continent, with power to go backwards and forwards, and forwards and backwards on the west coast of South America. The risk is extended also until the expiring of thirty days after arrival, or until sailing on the next voyage, whichever first happens. Now Bigham, J., held that in these circumstances the policy is what is termed, in the language of insurance, "a voyage policy," and it seems to me that it is. If the voyage had simply been described as one from a port in the United Kingdom to a port on the west coast of South America, and back from there to the United Kingdom, it would have been precisely within the decision in The Vortigern; and the power to go backwards and forwards on the west coast of South America does not seem to me to really affect the substance of the case.

It is possible that there are reasons which may be urged against the law as laid down in The Vortigern; but if such there be, I express no opinion whatever upon them; they must be dealt with, if necessary, by a higher tribunal.

I think The Vortigern cannot be distinguished for the purposes of the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Coote & Ball, for Adamson & Adamson, North Shields; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 27.
Farwell, J. }

In re WEST AND HARDY'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Married woman—Trustee-mortgagee—Transfer of mortgage—Deed not acknowledged—Bare trustee—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 2—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 16.

Two trustees for sale, of whom one was a lady, sold land, and next day took a mortgage from the purchaser for a sum expressed to belong to them on a joint account. The lady having afterwards married, she and her co-mortgagee transferred the mortgage, and, on a sale by a person deriving title under the transferees, the purchaser objected that the deed of transfer had not been executed by the husband of the married woman or acknowledged by her. The vendor replied that, being a mortgagee, she could convey as a feme sole according to the decision in In re Brooke and Fremlin's Contract, 46 W. R. 442, [1898] 1 Ch. 647.

Held, following that case, that the purchaser's requisition had been satisfactorily answered.

This was a summons by the vendor, under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for the determination of the following question:

In 1892 J. K. Barton and Louisa Barton were trustees for sale of a house and land under a trust deed, executed by the beneficiaries under their father's will on the 14th of April, 1892.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They sold and conveyed the property to C. J. West, the present vendor, on the 23rd of January, 1893, and the following day took from him a mortgage in fee thereon for £1,250, which sum was expressed to belong to them on a joint account.

In February, 1893, Louisa Barton married E. G. Armstrong, and on the 14th of February, 1894, she and J. K. Barton, as mortgagees, executed a transfer of the mortgage to two persons (who were since dead) as joint tenants.

C. J. West, the mortgagor, paid off the mortgage, and being legal personal representative of the last surviving mortgagee, he reconveyed the premises to H. Behan to the use of him, C. J. West, in fee, and afterwards entered into the present contract for sale thereof.

On investigation of the title the purchaser objected that as Mrs. Armstrong was a trustee, the deed of transfer in which she joined to convey the property should also have been executed by her husband and acknowledged by her, according to the decision in In re Harkness and Alsopp's Contract, 44 W. R. 683, [1896] 2 Ch. 358. The vendor replied that as Mrs. Armstrong was a mortgagee, her conveyance as a feme sole was good according to the decision in In re Brooke and Fremlin's Contract, 46 W. R. 442, [1898] 1 Ch. 647, or alternatively that she could convey as a bare trustee by virtue of section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893, and he took out the present summons asking for a declaration that the purchaser's requisition had been satisfactorily answered.

Upjohn, K.C., and Curtis Price, for the vendor.—The decision in In re Harkness and Alsopp's Contract turned entirely on trusteeship. In re Brooke and Fremlin's Contract, on which we rely, was a case of a married woman mortgagee. It was followed in In re Howgate and Osborn's Contract, 50 W. R. Dig. 48, [1902] 1 Ch. 451, where the married woman was a trustee-mortgagee. Further, Mrs. Armstrong, as soon as the mortgage money was paid, became a bare trustee for the transferees, and could convey under section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893.

Bradley Dyne, jun., for the purchaser, was asked by the court if he could distinguish In re Brooke and Fremlin's Contract.—In that case the married woman was beneficially entitled to the mortgage money. Here, I submit, Mrs. Armstrong and J. K. Barton, from the date of the mortgage, held, not only the money, but the land, in trust for the persons entitled to the money. In re Harkness and Alsopp's Contract expressly decides that where a married woman holds the property otherwise than beneficially, her husband must execute the deed and she must acknowledge it. In re Howgate and Osborn's Contract was not fully argued. The conveyance of the 23rd of January, 1893, reciting as it does both the devise in trust and the deed of arrangement of the 14th of April, 1892, contained quite sufficient reference to a trust to put the purchaser upon enquiry.

FARWELL, J.—There is nothing in the purchaser's objection. The cases cited show that the Married Women's Property Act, though not applying to a married woman who is a trustee, applies to one who is a mortgagee. The trustees for sale sold the property, and next day invested money in it on mortgage. The joint account clause was no notice of the trust, and there was no other. The decision in In re Brooke and Fremlin's Contract applies, and I therefore follow it.

Declaration in terms of the summons.

Solicitors, C. W. & H. R. Taylor; Hind & Robinson.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 8.
Buckley, J. }

In re EDWARD CHESTER & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Supervision order—Service of liquidator—Costs—Companies Winding-up Rules, 1890, r. 35.

In rule 35 of the Companies Winding-up Rules, 1890, the words "unless presented by the company" govern the rule throughout, and not merely the first paragraph, and therefore, where a company in course of voluntary winding up presents a petition for a supervision order, it is not necessary to serve the petition upon the liquidator, and the costs of doing so will not be allowed.

This was a petition by the above company, which was being wound up voluntarily, for a continuance of the winding up under the supervision of the court. The liquidator had been served with the petition, and appeared.

The order asked for having been made, the petitioners asked that the costs of serving the liquidator, and of his appearing, should be allowed.

Clauson, for the company.—The petitioners were obliged to serve the liquidator under the last paragraph of rule 35 of the Companies Winding-up rules, 1890. The costs of the service, and of his appearing, ought consequently to be allowed.

Hollams, for the liquidator.

Eve, K.C., and W. E. Vernon, for creditors, supported the petition.

BUCKLEY, J.—I do not think that the liquidator need have been served in such a case as the present one. The words "unless presented by the company," in rule 35, govern the rule throughout, and not merely the first paragraph. As, however, the matter was not quite clear I shall allow the costs of the service of the liquidator, and of his appearing in the present case, but I shall not allow them in future cases of this kind.

Solicitors, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley; Slaughter & May.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 4, 7, 8.
Swinfen Eady, J. }

DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) AND PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) v. MOSELEY & SONS (LIMITED) AND INDIA RUBBER AND TYRE REPAIRING CO. (b.)

Patent—Infringement—Combination patent.

A patent, consisting in a particular combination, cannot be infringed unless the whole of it is taken, and the manufacture and sale of a subordinate part thereof is not unlawful unless such part be new, useful, and patentable in itself. Further, a maker and seller of an unprotected subordinate part of a combination patent is not burdened with the duty of enquiring into the intentions of a purchaser of such part, notwithstanding that the ultimate purposes for which the part bought might be used by the purchaser, would infringe the combination patent.

Action.

This was a consolidated action in which the plaintiff companies, which were the owners of the Welch patent for improvements in rubber tyres and metal rims

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by H. STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

or felloes of wheels for cycles and other light vehicles, and the Bartlett patent for improvements in tyres or rims for cycles and other vehicles, asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant, David Moseley & Sons (Limited) from infringing the said patents by making selling and offering to sell beaded edges and other tyres, and to restrain the defendant, the India Rubber and Tyre Repairing Co., from selling those articles when made by and sold to it by the other defendant.

T. Terrell, K.C., J. C. Graham, and A. J. Walter, for the plaintiffs. — Defendant Moseley infringed plaintiffs' patents by making and putting on the market a cover which could not be used except for the purposes of the said patents, the cover being of the substance of the patented combinations. The defendant Moseley had committed an infringement by selling the cover to the defendant, India Rubber and Tyre Repairing Co., which put together the tubes and rims, and became a joint tort feasor in the latter's infringement. Moseley should have enquired into the objects with which the cover was bought. A person who sells powdered zinc with an invitation to the purchaser to use it so as to infringe a patent for using zinc powder to prevent corrosion in steam boilers may be restrained from so doing. Again, a person who takes the pith or marrow of a combination patent infringes the patent, though such part is not specially specified in the claim, since a patentee's rights do not depend on the wording of the claim but on what is really the invention.

They cited United Telephone Co. v. Dale, 32 W. R. 428, 25 Ch. D. 778, 782; Innes v. Short and Beal, 15 Rep. Pat Cas. 449; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Neal, 47 W. R. 632, [1899] 1 Ch. 807.

Cripps, K.C., Eve, K.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for defendant Moseley.

MacNaghten, K.C., and M. Romer, for defendant India Rubber and Tyre Repairing Co., contended that plaintiffs' patents had not been infringed either by the making and selling of the covers by the former defendant or by the selling of them by the latter defendant after their manufacture and sale by the former.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—It is not disputed that the defendant, David Moseley & Sons (Limited), was making and selling outer detachable tyre covers, or covers with a lining suitable for the insertion of wires in such a manner that the covers as sold by it were adapted for use in the manner described in the Welch patent, but not necessarily solely for that purpose, and that it also made and sold a cover with beaded edges which was capable of being used as described in the Bartlett patent, and this for a considerable period of time; the only issue is infringement or no infringement of the plaintiffs' patents, and it is alleged that the covers can only be used in one or the other of the patents and that their mere sale infringes the patents in question. Both patents have been the subject of numerous decisions and I can add nothing to the construction placed on them. With respect to the Welch patent it is clear that the invention consisted in a particular combination. [His lordship cited Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) v. New Lamb Tyre Co., 19 Rep. Pat. Cas. 384, 388; Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) v. East London Tyre Co., 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 573, 581; Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) v. Leicester Pneumatic Tyre Co., 16 Rep. Pat. Cas. 531, 542.] With respect to the Bartlett patent it is also clear that a particular combination is the basis of the patent (citing Gormully and Jeffery Manufacturing Co. v. North British Rubber Co., 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 245, 254). It has been settled by the House of Lords in Clark v. Adie, 2 App. Cas. 315, that there is no infringement of a patent solely for a combination unless the whole is taken, and that in order to protect a subordinate integer it must be new and useful and patentable per se. Now it is clear that rims usable in both the tyres have for a long time been openly made and sold, and, in short, are ordinary articles of commerce. It is alleged that the defendant Moseley has infringed the patents by selling covers which probably would be used in either the Welch or Bartlett combination: but those combinations do not exhaust the possible purposes for which they can be used. As a matter of law, the defendant Moseley is not infringing either patent, otherwise it could not carry on its trade of manufacturing rubber. Selling for export is lawful, so is selling to licensees of the plaintiffs and to say that the ultimate purposes of purchasers might infringe the patents, and that it is the duty of the defendant to make inquiry as to the uses to which the covers are to be put by their purchasers is to throw on it a burden not required by the law. The mere manufacture and sale of one of the component parts is not an infringement of the whole patent, notwithstanding the dictum of Pearson, J., in United Telephone Co. v. Dale, 32 W. R. 428, 25 Ch. D. 778, 782, that "if there was a patent for a knife of a particular construction, and an injunction was granted restraining a defendant from selling knives made according to the patent, and he was to sell the component parts so that any schoolboy could put them together and construct the knife, surely that sale would be a breach of the injunction."

Mr. Terrell laid stress on Innes v. Short and Beal, but that case is distinguishable from this; he insisted also that the intent of the defendant was material, but since the defendant may lawfully make and sell these covers it may make and sell them with any intent. [His lordship here cited McCormick v. Gray, 9 W. R. 809, 7 H. & N. 25.] On the point whether a sale of one component part infringes an entire combination it is quite clear that, in the case of a combination patent, it is only the combinations claimed that may not be used, the other elementary combination may be used unless it is within the purview of the claim (citing Townsend v. Haworth, 12 Ch. D. 831*n*; Sykes v. Howorth, 27 W. R. Dig. 147, 12 Ch. D. 768; and distinguishing Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Neal, 47 W. R. 632, [1899] 1 Ch. 807). With respect to the India Rubber and Tyre Company the plaintiff's proof has entirely failed to meet his allegations.

Action dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, J. B. & F. Purchase; Gregory, Rowcliffe, & Rawle, for Woodcock, Manchester.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } Oct. 30.
Divorce. }

CONSTANTINIDI v. CONSTANTINIDI AND LANCE. (a.)

Divorce—Adultery of petitioner—Statutory discretion—Conduct conducing—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.

The Court held that if a wife leaves her husband because she has transferred her affections to another man, and her husband is aware that that is the cause, and he thereafter commits adultery, such conduct in the wife is conduct conducing to the husband's adultery; and exercising its discretion under section 31 of the Divorce Act, 1857, it further held that, in the circumstances of the case, it was justified in granting the husband a decree nisi for dissolution of marriage.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The petitioner, Demetrius Sophocles Constantinidi, prayed for a decree dissolving his marriage with Julia Constantinidi, née Ralli, on the ground of her bigamy and adultery with Dr. Henry William Lance, against whom damages were claimed.

The respondent and co-respondent denied the charge, and the respondent further alleged that before she married the co-respondent at Sioux Falls, Minnehaha, U.S.A., she had obtained a decree for the dissolution of her marriage with the petitioner in the court of the city of Sioux Falls.

The respondent counter-charged adultery against the petitioner with a woman named Madame Lester, otherwise Blitz, at Ostend, which charge was also denied.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Priestley were for the petitioner.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Barnard, for respondent.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Cassell, for the co-respondent.

In the result the jury found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery, and that the petitioner had committed adultery, and they assessed the damages at £25,000. The petitioner prayed the court to exercise its discretion under section 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857.

The following cases were cited in the course of argument: McCord v. McCord, 3 P. & D. 237; Morgan v. Morgan, 1 P. & D. 644; Grosvenor v. Grosvenor, 34 W. R. 140; Goode v. Goode, 2 Sw. & Tr. 253: Collins v. Collins, 9 P. D. 231; and Coleman v. Coleman, 1 P. & D. 81.

The facts are fully stated in the following judgment.

JEUNE, P., said: In this case adultery was proved to have been committed by both the petitioner and the respondent; and the question is whether, in the exercise of the discretion vested in me by section 31 of the Divorce Act of 1857, I ought to pronounce a decree against the wife. The facts, so far as they are material, are as follows: The parties were married on the 26th of October, 1889, and made the acquaintance of the co-respondent in 1896. Before that time the husband and wife had lived on terms of great affection; but in the autumn of that year the respondent and co-respondent met in the country at the house of her father, whose medical adviser the co-respondent was; and when the husband returned from a visit to Switzerland in October, 1896, a marked coldness was exhibited by the wife towards the husband, and matrimonial intercourse was refused by her. The wife left her husband and went to Ireland in 1897, clearly with the intention of never returning to him. In December, 1899, the husband obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion, the wife offering no real defence. In February, 1901, she went to Sioux Falls, in the State of Dakota, U.S.A., and so commenced what was no doubt a residence intended to qualify for a divorce under the law of that State. She obtained such a divorce in February, 1902, and almost immediately after married the co-respondent, who had joined her in Dakota, and thenceforward cohabited with him. It was proved that in July and August, 1901, and also 1902, the husband committed adultery with a woman of loose character. From the facts proved in the case I draw the following conclusions: (1) That when the wife left the husband in 1897 she did so because she had transferred her affections to the co-respondent, and the petitioner believed this at the time; (2) that the husband's misconduct did not cause or conduce to that of the wife, inasmuch as, without inferring any act of adultery on her part before the marriage with the co-respondent, as no such adultery was either directly proved or charged, there can, I think, be no doubt that at least when she went to Dakota in February, 1901, and probably some time before, she was contemplating an American divorce from her husband and consequently a marriage to and adultery with the co-respondent; (3) that the wife's conduct in leaving her husband in order, after an interval, to commit adultery with the co-respondent, may, in the sequence of events, have caused, or conduced to, the adultery of the husband. How far it did so I shall presently consider. In Symons v. Symons, [1897] P. 167, 45 W. R. Dig. 46, I had occasion to consider the exercise of a discretion under section 31 in a suit by a wife against a husband, in which it was proved that the husband had committed adultery, and that the wife had subsequently committed adultery, and in which it was, as I held, also shown that the husband by his wilful neglect or misconduct had caused, or conduced to, the adultery of his wife. In that case I thought it my duty to consider carefully the terms of the Act and the authorities bearing on it; and in the result I held that the wife was not, by reason of her adultery, disentitled to a decree dissolving her marriage. I do not think it necessary in the present instance to repeat the various considerations which I stated on that occasion. But the very able argument of Mr. Lawson Walton having left on my mind the impression that the present case was governed by Symons v. Symons, I reserved my judgment in order that I might carefully reconsider that case and the numerous authorities relating to the matter. It is not, I think, desirable to allow ourselves to dwell exclusively, or even principally, on these authorities. The question, after all, is one of the effect to be given to the provisions of section 31 of the Divorce Act of 1857, and the state of the law in view of which that section was enacted. There can be little or no doubt as to the object of the Legislature in conferring the discretion which is permitted by that section. Before the Act of 1857, the Ecclesiastical Court, with regard to divorce a mensa et thoro, in cases of mutual misconduct, held fast by the maxim of the canon and also the civil law: "Viro atque uxore invicem accusantibus, causam repudii dedisse utrumque pronuntiatum est: id ita accipi debet ut ea lege quam ambo contempserunt neuter vindecetur; paria enim delicta mutua pensione dissolvuntur" (Digest, 24, 3, 39). How rigidly the Ecclesiastical Courts adhered to this principle may be gathered from the case of Otway v. Otway, 13 P. D. 141, 37 W. R. Dig. 84, in the Court of Appeal. The case of Proctor v. Proctor, 2 Hagg. C. 292, decided in 1819, contains, in the judgment of Sir William Scott, a complete exposition of the law of the Ecclesiastical Courts on this subject, and makes it clear that those courts proceeded on the fixed and almost mechanical principal of compensation or set-off, and did not at all regard the special circumstances of individual cases. I have pointed out in Symons v. Symons, [1897] P. 167-175, that the House of Lords took a very different course, and always inquired into the conduct of a petitioner seeking a divorce, refusing relief if it was shown that there had been on his part a want of due care and caution. I came then to the conclusion to which I now adhere, that the intention of the Legislature was to correct the over-rigid procedure of the ecclesiastical courts, and in preference to follow the more elastic and juster procedure of the House of Lords; and with this intention they conferred a discretion on the court without imposing specifically any limitation or other directions with regard to its exercise. It is quite true that in Morgan v. Morgan, 1 P. & D. 664, Lord Penzance used language, repeated with approval in subsequent cases by Sir James Hannen and Mr. Justice Butt, which has been considered to impose special restrictions on the discretion of the court and to render it imperative in every case to proceed on some specific principle. But I think that these restrictions are more apparent than real. If it is remembered that the causes for which the court may in the exercise of its discretion allow a divorce, notwithstanding misconduct by a petitioner, are to be taken in combination, and according to their several degrees of force, and also that the list of such causes is not a closed book, but may be extended as occasion arises, I think that the expressions used by the learned judges whom I have mentioned will be seen not to amount to more than an emphatic assertion of the grounds on which and the manner in which a judicial, as opposed to an arbitrary, discretion should in any and every case be exercised. It is not, I think, easy to understand why the Legislature, having determined to abrogate the fixed rule of the Ecclesiastical Courts, still thought it desirable to maintain the refusal of a divorce to petitioners guilty of misconduct, and to insist on retaining within the bonds of matrimony two persons, both of whom have proved unmindful of their marriage vows; and therefore it is difficult to conjecture with any confidence the principles upon which the Legislature intended that judges should act in the exercise of the discretion conferred on them, of the nature of which principles the Legislature abstained from giving any indication. I think, therefore, one can find guidance only by reference to general principles of justice; and no principles of justice in regard to this matter seem to me clearer than these; first, that a petitioner by whom adultery has been committed should not be allowed to obtain a divorce if such adultery in any serious degree contributed to the misconduct of the respondent; and, secondly, that a respondent should not be allowed to avoid the consequences of proved misconduct by putting forward an act or acts of misconduct on the part of the petitioner for which the respondent was himself or herself in any serious degree responsible. To hold otherwise would be to allow a wrongdoer to profit by wrongdoing. I have no doubt that the Legislature intended that the court should act on these principles, whether or not it intended that the court should act on any other principles. On these grounds I had no hesitation in Symons v. Symons in coming to the conclusion, to quote the headnote in that case, that "the circumstances to be considered by the court in exercising its discretion under section 31 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to grant a divorce to a wife who has been guilty of adultery, include the case of the husband causing or conducing to her adultery by his own wilful neglect or misconduct." I do not, of course, forget that in Hulse v. Hulse and Tavenor, 2 P. & D. 259, when the adultery of the petitioner was committed after the decree nisi, it might in the above view have been contended that the divorce should be allowed because the adultery of the petitioner was probably caused, in some degree, by the adultery of the respondent. But, in fact, no such point was raised, the petitioner being content, I presume, to rely on the argument that misconduct after decree nisi was not misconduct during the marriage within the meaning of the 31st section. I am of opinion that the present case is in law governed by Symons v. Symons. I am quite unable to accept the argument pressed on me, especially by Mr. Barnard, that a husband and a wife are in a different position of responsibility each to other, and that a guilty wife should be entitled to escape a divorce on account of misconduct on the part of her husband, even if she actually and directly caused it. No doubt the case of a wife's going so far as this is improbable, though not inconceivable; and no doubt also the cases in which a husband has been allowed a divorce in spite of adultery by him are extremely rare. But in principle I must decline to draw any distinction between the responsibility of the sexes in this respect, and I know of no authority for doing so. The law therefore appears to me clear. But there remains the question—whether on the facts it is shown in the present case that the respondent conduced to the adultery committed by the petitioner. I think that the verdict of the jury goes a long way to decide this question; because they could not have given the decision they did unless they were satisfied that, when the respondent left the petitioner in 1897, she was already under the influence of the co-respondent and had in fact then transferred her affection to him. But I do not think I am bound by the decision of the jury in this matter, though I agree with it. And, forming my own opinion, I cannot for a moment doubt that the petitioner was quite right in what he told us was his belief, that his wife had yielded to the co-respondent, whether to the extent of actual adultery or not I do not pause to consider, before his return from Geneva in October, 1896, and that when she deserted him in 1897 she was unfathful to him in heart and intention, though perhaps not then in person. Under these circumstances, did the wife's conduct conduce to the subsequent adultery of the husband? I have in Synge v. Synge, [1900] P. 180, 48 W. R. Dig. 56, and I think also in other cases, repudiated, as emphatically as I could, the suggestion that a wife who refuses directly or virtually by desertion the matrimonial rights of her husband, thereby justifies him in committing adultery, or can properly be said to cause his so doing by such refusal. But when a wife not only leaves her husband, but does so because she has transferred her affections to another man, and her husband believes this to be the case and is right in his belief, I cannot bring myself to say that she has not conduced to misconduct on his part. What, in fact, has she done? She has shattered his ideals of the purity of womanhood and of his wife. She has set him a glaring example. She has deprived him of what is to most men the strongest, to some men probably the only, safeguard of their virtue, respect for the mutual obligations of married life and respect for the women whose love and honour and happiness are in their keeping. After the respondent left the petitioner—for no reason, as I believe, except her intention to be unfaithful to him—I do not think she can be heard to say that she is not in a very serious degree responsible for the misconduct of her husband afterwards—and, it is to be remarked, it was apparently a long time afterwards, when all hope of reconciliation must have vanished—falling a victim to the wiles of a professional seductress. In this case I do not think it necessary to rely on a point pressed on me, that unless a divorce be granted the pecuniary relations of the husband and wife cannot be adjusted, and the large property of the wife will, in whole or part, fall into the hands of the "seducer." No such principle has ever, so far as I know, been invoked, and I do not discuss it now; but I do not wish to say that in a future case it may not be admissible. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that this is not a case in which I ought to refuse to the petitioner the relief to which his wife's infidelity has entitled him, and there will be a decree nisi with costs.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Hollams, Son, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the respondent and co-respondent, Lewis & Lewis.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Aug. 6, 1903.

BWLLFA AND MERTHYR DARE STEAM COLLIERIES v. PONTYPRIDD WATERWORKS CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Act—Compensation—Notice to treat—Colliery-owner to leave coal unworked—Subsequent rise in price of coal—Basis of assessment—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 6, 22, and 25.

Where a notice to treat has been given under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, for the assessment of compensation payable in respect of certain seams of coal which a waterworks company requires the coal owner to leave unworked, the arbitrator is entitled to take into consideration, in assessing compensation, a rise in the value of coal which has taken place subsequently to the notice to treat.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 627, [1902] 2 K. B. 135) reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 627, [1902] 2 K. B. 135) (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Mathew, L.JJ.), which reversed that of the King's Bench Division (Ridley and Phillimore, JJ.) (50 W. R. 135, [1901] 2 K. B. 798), where the award stated in the form of a special case is set out at length.

The facts are given in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Upjohn, K.C., and W. D. Benson, for the appellants.—This is not a case of a purchase of the coal: Great Northern Railway v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 49 W. R. 261, [1901] 1 Q. B. 416. The compensation should be what the mine-owner would have received if he had been allowed to work the coal.

Smith v. Great Western Railway, 3 App. Cas. 165, was referred to.

Balfour Browne, K.C., and Trevor Lewis (Francis-Williams, K.C., with them), for the respondents.

Upjohn, K.C., replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think in this case that Phillimore, J., stated the question for debate with perfect accuracy when he said that "the true inquiry here is not of the value of the coalfield or what the value of the coal is, but what would the colliery company, if they had not been prohibited, have made out of the coal during the time it would have taken them to have got it."

It was not a purchase of the coal, nor is it analogous to a purchase of the coal. It is what it is, and it appears to me that considering what it is I think the question propounded is solved by the statement of what it is. If it were a purchase, the rights and liabilities, and profits, if there were any, would pass to the purchaser, and its value, with all its possibilities, would pass at the time the notice to treat was given; but, if the question is that which I think it was, then the person who had to make the calculation of what was the compensation ought to have arrived at the sum which experience has now shown to be the correct amount. It is true that he probably would not have been able to arrive at that sum accurately, but he ought to have calculated, upon such material as he had, what would be the true sum. He ought to have considered the possible rise or fall of prices; but, as I have said, he probably would have made a mistake. We now know what would have been the true sum, and the proposition baldly stated appears to be that, because you could not arrive at the true sum when the notice was given, you should shut your eyes to the true sum now you do know it, because you could not have guessed it then.

It is, of course, only an accident that the true sum can now be ascertained with precision; but what does that matter? It seems to me that the whole fallacy of the contention that you may not look to the facts that have occurred rests upon the false analogy of a sale. I am of opinion that the analogy is a false analogy, and I move that the decision of the Court of Appeal be reversed and the original judgment restored, and that the respondents pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This is a question of compensation under the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. The appellants are mine-owners. They are, in fact, lessees, but the term granted was long enough for working out all the minerals comprised in the lease. In reply to a notice under section 22 of the Act of 1847, the respondents, by notice in writing dated the 15th of October, 1898, required the appellants to leave unworked a seam of coal lying under a parcel of land about five and three-quarter acres in extent. On this notice the parties went to arbitration, but owing to delays, for which neither party was to blame, proceedings under the reference did not commence until June, 1900. The arbitration was finished on the 1st of February, 1901, and on the 26th of April following the arbitrator stated his award in the form of a special case. The material paragraphs in the case are as follows: "9. Coal rose in value subsequently to the date of the said notice of the 15th of October, 1898. 10. . . . the coal company claimed that, in consequence of such rise, the compensation to be paid by the waterworks company should be assessed not on the basis of the knowledge . . . possessed at the date of the said notice of the 15th of October, 1898, which basis is hereinafter called 'the first alternative,' but on the basis of the knowledge which was subsequently acquired, which last-mentioned basis is called 'the second alternative.'" The arbitrator found that, according to the first alternative, the compensation payable was £2,950; according to the second, £5,650. The Divisional Court held the appellants entitled to the larger sum. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision. They held that the appellants were only entitled to the lesser sum—that is, a sum assessed according to the first alternative.

The statement in the special case as to the rise in the value of coal seems to require a little further explanation. There is no dispute as to the facts. It was stated by the appellants and not disputed by the respondents that, but for the notice given by the respondents, the coal in the protected area would have been reached about June, 1900, and would have been worked out in about two years from that date. The appellants gave evidence before the arbitrator to prove—first, the tonnage of coal in the protected area that would have been brought to bank within each consecutive period of three months; secondly, the cost and expense of getting that coal; and thirdly, the market prices current during each period in respect of such coal. The appellants also gave evidence to prove that at the time when the rise in price came they would have been in a position to make forward contracts for the delivery of the whole of the coal within the protected area, and would thus have been enabled to secure the full benefit of the rise. It was contended by the respondents that the arbitrator ought to have rejected this evidence altogether, and to have been guided in making his award solely by facts and circumstances known at the date of the notice of the 15th of October, 1898, and such inferences, if any, as to the probable course of future events as experts (if experts there be in such matters) could properly have drawn at the date of the notice, supposing them to be unbiassed and unprejudiced in their forecast by knowledge of what actually did occur. That view was adopted by the Court of Appeal.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question turns on three sections of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 6, 22, and 25. These sections cover much the same ground. They are to be read together; and if any defect or obscurity be found in any one recourse is to be had to the whole series of enactments: See Smith v. Great Western Railway. Section 6 requires the undertakers to make "full compensation" for the value of lands used for the purpose of their special Act, and for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in them by the special or any general Act. It also provides by reference to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for the adjustment of compensation and the enforcement of payment. Section 22 enacts that if a mine-owner desires to get the minerals lying under the property of the undertakers, or within the prescribed distance from their works, he is to give thirty days' notice before commencing to work, and then, where danger is apprehended, the undertakers may by counter-notice prevent working within a specified area on the terms of making compensation. In the absence of agreement, compensation is to be made "as in other cases of disputed compensation." Section 25 provides for payment by the undertakers of all "expenses and losses" occasioned by the exercise of their powers as well as payment for any mines or minerals not purchased by the undertakers which cannot be obtained by reason of making and maintaining the works or by reason of apprehended injury from the working of such mines or minerals; and again, in regard to the question of compensation, reference is made to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. I cannot find in this group of sections any provision or even any suggestion to the effect that a line is to be drawn at the date of the counter-notice, and that all that occurs after that date is to be as if it had never happened.

It appears to me that the case put forward on behalf of the respondents is based on a false analogy. The counter-notice by the undertakers following a notice of the mine-owners under section 22 does not operate to make a contract or to transfer property. It is not even a step towards a contract or a step towards expropriation. The undertakers acquire no property in the minerals. The property remains where it was. The mine-owner is prohibited from working, and the undertakers are bound to make full compensation. This is all. If the question goes to arbitration the arbitrator's duty is to determine the amount of compensation payable. In order to enable him to come to a just and true conclusion, it is his duty, I think, to avail himself of all information at hand at the time of making his award which may be laid before him. Why should he listen to conjecture on a matter which has become an accomplished fact? Why should he guess when he can calculate? With the light before him why should he shut his eyes and grope in the dark? The mine-owner prevented from working his minerals is to be fully compensated—the Act says so. That means that as far as money can compensate him he is to be placed in the position in which he would have been if he had been free to go on working. Here it has been proved to demonstration that if he had not been interfered with he would have made between £5,000 and £6,000. I cannot understand upon what principle it is maintained that he should be content with half—and that half is full compensation.

I think the appeal ought to be allowed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored, with costs here and below.

Lord Shand has asked me to add that he concurs in this opinion.

Lord ROBERTSON.—The following propositions in law seem to be perfectly clear: The coal in question was not taken and acquired (and could not be taken and acquired) by the respondents; but, on the contrary, remained the property of the appellants. After the notice of the 15th of October, 1898, the appellants were disabled from working the coal. The resulting pecuniary obligation on the respondents was to pay compensation to the appellants for being thus prevented from working the coal. It follows that what is due to the appellants is not the price on a transaction of sale, but compensation for a continuing embargo on working. The sum to be paid would thus be whatever sum could best be made out to be the profit that would have been made by the appellants if they had been free to work. Any estimate of this profit necessarily involves the question, How long would the coal in question take to work out?—if for no other reason than in order to compute the cost of working. If the question thus presented has to be solved ab ante, the arbitrator, or whoever has to deal with it, must form the best conjecture he can of probable prices and probable wages during the period required to work out the area in question. But these calculations are resorted to merely in the absence of facts, and not because the time to be considered is that moment of time when the notice of the 15th of October, 1898, was presented. And if, owing to the course of the procedure, the period required for the working out of the coal in question has come to be a matter of history, then estimate and conjecture are superseded by facts as the proper media concludendi. I do not mean that the proper course in awarding compensation is to wait for the expiry of the period required for working out the coal. On the contrary, it is natural that the compensation should be assessed once for all, and by estimate. But the point is that, as in this instance the facts are available, they are not to be shut out.

I have only to add that my view exactly coincides with that of Phillimore, J., when he says, "The true inquiry here is not of the value of the coalfield or what the value of the coal is, but what would the colliery company, if they had not been prohibited, have made out of the coal during the time it would have taken them to have got it."

The opposite view seems to me to rest on the erroneous analogy between the notice given on the 15th of October, 1898, and a notice where land is taken. The notice of the 15th of October is merely, and purports to be merely, a notice of the willingness of the respondents to make compensation for what they require to be left unworked, and so it is described in section 23 of the Act in question.

Lord LINDLEY concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for C. & W. Kenshole, Aberdare.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wrentmore & Son, for Frank James & Sons, Cardiff.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 19.

RIGBY & CO. v. COX. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Appeal—Costs—Refusal of judge to direct review of taxation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Sched. I., cl. 12; Sched. II., cl. 4.

An appeal will not lie to the Court of Appeal from the refusal of a county court judge to direct a review of taxation of the costs of an application to vary a weekly payment under Schedule I., clause 12, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Emden, sitting at the Bromley County Court.

The employers of a workman, who had been injured by an accident, agreed to pay him a weekly sum as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and a memorandum thereof was registered under clause 8 of Schedule II. to the Act. The employers subsequently applied to the Bromley County Court judge under clause 12 of Schedule I. for a review of the weekly payment upon the ground that the workman was able to resume work. The county court judge dismissed the application with costs on scale B. Upon taxation the registrar taxed the costs under scale B., as upon an interlocutory application in the arbitration, upon the ground that the judge had made a general order applicable to all his courts that the costs of an application to review a weekly payment were to be so taxed. The workman applied to the county court judge to direct a review of taxation, when the judge stated that he had laid down a general rule that the costs of an application to vary an award or an agreement registered under clause 8 of Schedule II. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, should be taxed as a mere application in the matter of the arbitration and not as an original arbitration or proceeding; and he accordingly refused to direct a review of the taxation.

The workman appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Duckworth, for the employers, took the preliminary objection that the appeal did not lie direct to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal has only jurisdiction to hear appeals from a county court judge when acting as an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897: see Schedule II., clause 4. The county court judge's functions as arbitrator came to an end when he made the award dismissing with costs the application to review the weekly payment. The application for a review of the taxation of those costs was a proceeding subsequent thereto, and was made to the judge in his capacity as county court judge, and subject to the County Court Rules: Keane v. Nash, 88 L. T. 790, 51 W. R. Dig. 102; Leech v. Life and Health Assurance Association, 49 W. R. 482, [1901] 1 K. B. 707; Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, r. 33. The appeal, if any, did not lie direct to this court.

Harold Morris (Chester Jones with him), for the workman.—The application to review the weekly payment under Schedule I., clause 12, was an arbitration under the Act, and the taxation of the costs took place in that arbitration. The application for a review of the taxation was therefore made in the arbitration, and an appeal lies direct to the Court of Appeal. In Keane v. Nash there was an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, which was dismissed, and the county court judge thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff, proceeded to assess compensation under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The question in that case arose as to the taxation of the costs of the action. Here there was no action, only an arbitration under the Act, and the question arises as to the taxation of the costs of that arbitration. The appeal therefore lies to this court.

He referred to Skeggs v. Keen, 1 Minton-Senhouse W. C. C. 35; Jones v. Great Central Railway Co., 4 Minton-Senhouse W. C. C. 23.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion the preliminary objection must prevail. The county court judge made an award dismissing an application to review a weekly payment and allowing the workman his costs on scale B. He clearly at that time was exercising the functions of an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The registrar taxed the costs as upon an interlocutory application, and upon an application for a review of the taxation the county court judge stated that he had given a general direction that the costs of such an application should be so taxed, and he refused to direct a review of taxation. An appeal is then brought here. It seems to me that the case is covered by the decision in Keane v. Nash. The headnote in that case states that "an appeal will not lie to the Court of Appeal from the refusal of a county court judge to direct a review of the taxation of costs under an order made under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897." That decision, I may say, applies equally whether the judge reviews or refuses to review the taxation. In the present case the judge, as in that case, refused to direct a review of taxation. No appeal therefore lies from his decision to this court. I express no opinion as to whether there is any appeal at all. I merely say that no appeal lies direct to this court.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I say so with some reluctance, because I cannot help thinking that there is apparently a contradiction between the award of the county court judge allowing costs upon scale B and the taxation of those costs. The judge seems to have acted upon a general rule which, in my opinion, he ought not to have laid down.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I desire to express my agreement with the observations of Mathew, L.J., as to the propriety of this general rule.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the workman, Shaen, Roscoe, Massey, & Co.

Solicitors for the employers, W. Hurd & Son.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 17.

HIGGINS v. CAMPBELL & HARRISON (LIMITED).
TURVEY v. BRINTONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Disease — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A workman who was employed in a wool-combing factory had to cart some wool to the washing machine in the factory, and in doing so he had to pass close to some Persian wool and thereby caught anthrax, which was a disease commonly imported in Persian wool.

A workman, who was employed as a wool sorter in a factory, in the course of his duty had to handle Persian wool, from which he caught anthrax.

Held, that, in both cases, the injury was caused by "accident" arising out of and in the course of the employment within the meaning of section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

These were two appeals under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

HIGGINS v. CAMPBELL & HARRISON (LIMITED).

Appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Bompas, at the Bradford County Court.

The applicant was a workman in the employment of the respondents, Campbell & Harrison (Limited), in a wool-combing factory at Bradford. The bales of wool, when unloaded from the carts which brought them to the factory, were placed on cars, and the applicant's duty was to run those cars of wool to the washing machine, where the wool was washed. On the 14th of November, 1902, when the applicant was running the cars, he had to pass close to some brown Persian wool, and consequently caught a disease called anthrax. Anthrax was a disease that was common in Persian sheep, and when the infected sheep were killed their skins were packed with other skins and sent over to this country. The anthrax germ or bacillus was in this way imported into this country. Persian skins did not necessarily contain the anthrax bacillus, some consignments being free from it. The applicant on the day in question had a pimple on his neck, and his collar rubbed it off, and the medical evidence was to the effect that the anthrax germ probably settled on the raw surface where the pimple was rubbed off, and brought on the disease which was known as cutaneous anthrax. The evidence showed that workmen employed in wool-sorting were exposed to the risk of catching anthrax, but that it was not inevitable that they should catch it; and that wool-sorting was one of the unhealthy employments which were placed under strict regulations by the Home Office under the Factory Acts. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was contended that this was personal injury by "accident" arising out of and in the course of the employment within section 1 of the Act. The county court judge held that there was a distinction between accidents and disease, and disease as such did not come within the Act. It seemed to him that the Act only applied if the accident itself caused the injury. In the present case the anthrax germ alighted on a raw surface on the applicant's body. That in itself caused no injury; it was the disease which arose from the germ multiplying in the blood that was the cause of the injury, and that, in his opinion, was not within the Act. In the cases which had been decided on the meaning of the term accident in policies of insurance the distinction between accident and disease had been repeatedly pointed out—see especially the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in the case of Sinclair v. Maritime Passengers Assurance Co., 3 E. & E. 478—and he made an award in favour of the respondents.

The award in this case, and also the award in the next case, were made before the decision of the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., ante, p. 81, [1903] A. C. 443.

J. J. Wright, for the appellant.—This was an "accident" within section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. There was here a fortuitous element, as it was not inevitable that a workman employed in a wool-combing factory should catch anthrax. It was a mishap or untoward event not expected or designed: Fenton v. Thorley & Co., ante, p. 81, [1903] A. C. 443; Boardman v. Scott, 50 W. R. 184, [1902] 1 K. B. 43. The fact that it was the applicant's duty to deal with this infected wool made it an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Hensey v. White, 48 W. R. 257, [1900] 1 Q. B. 481, has been overruled by Fenton v. Thorley & Co.

He also referred to Walker v. Lilleshall Co., 48 W. R. 257, [1900] 1 Q. B. 481; and Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., 5 F. 120.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Minton-Senhouse, for the employers.—There was no "accident" here. This disease is called wool-sorters' disease, and the risk of catching it is an ordinary incident of the applicant's employment. The injury was caused by disease and not by accident. In Fenton v. Thorley & Co., Lord Macnaghten carefully stated that the words "injury by accident" were introduced into the Act for the purpose of confining "injury" to a certain class of injuries, and of excluding other classes, such as injuries by disease or injuries self-inflicted by design. Every disease was in one sense accidentally contracted. If a workman contracted typhoid fever in his master's factory, as, for example, if a furnaceman to quench his thirst drank a glass of impure water, or if a workman, when working in an open building, caught cold, that could not be said to be an injury by accident within the Act. The judgment of the county court judge was right.

Wright replied.

TURVEY v. BRINTONS (LIMITED).

Appeal from an award of his Honour Sir Richard Harington, the judge of the Kidderminster County Court.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman named Turvey who was employed in a factory as a wool-sorter. While Turvey was sorting some Persian wool he caught anthrax in one of his eyes and died from the effects of it. He had at the time no abrasion on his body. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge said: "I find as a fact that the anthrax which was the immediate cause of death was caused by the accidental alighting of a bacillus from the infected wool on a part of the deceased's person, which afforded a harbour in which it could multiply and grow and so cause malignant disease and consequent death. I can see no distinction in principle between the accidental entry of a spark from an anvil or the accidental squirting of scalding water or some poisonous liquid into the eye. The only difference is that in those cases the foreign substance would be so large as to be visible, in this case the foreign substance is microscopic." The judge went on to state that his judgment was based on the fact that there was in this case a fortuitous intrusion of a foreign substance into the eye which by its presence there caused death; and he awarded £201 3s. 2d. compensation.

The employers appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and Albert Parsons, for the employers, adopted the contentions advanced on behalf of the employers in the last case, and pointed out that the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, had drawn a distinction between accidents, which were dealt with by sections 19 to 22, and dangerous and unhealthy trades which were likely to cause disease, and which were dealt with by sections 73 to 86 of the Act.

Pritchett, for the applicant.

COLLINS, M.R.—These two cases raise the same point, though the decision of the county court judge in each case is different. In the first case a workman who had an abrasion on his neck caused by his collar rubbing a pimple, was, in the course of his work, brought into contiguity with some infected wool and caught a disease called anthrax. He recovered and took proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The county court judge held that there was no "accident" within the meaning of the Act, and made an award in favour of the employers. In the second case the workman had no discernable break in the skin, and when he was handling some infected wool he caught anthrax in the eye and died from the effects of it. The county court judge held that there was an "accident" within the meaning of the Act, and he awarded compensation.

Now, the whole principle which governs the construction to be placed upon the word "accident" in the Act has been altered, or at any rate modified, by the decision of the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. We must look to that decision as the expression of the highest tribunal in the country as to the meaning of the word "accident" as used in the Act, and we must discard the principle upon which this court proceeded in Hensey v. White, which case was overruled by the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. I do not stop to inquire, as it is not necessary to do so, whether the two other cases—Lloyd v. Sugg & Co. and Walker v. Lilleshall Co., which are reported with Hensey v. White, are affected by the decision in the House of Lords. It is clear, however, that in so far as either of them was decided upon the same principle as that upon which Hensey v. White was decided they are overruled. I propose to deal first of all with the second case, because the learned county court judge has there stated the case as well as it could possibly be stated. [His lordship read that part of the county court judge's judgment set out above between inverted commas.] That appears to me to be the meaning of the word accident as used in the Act, a meaning which is well founded both in logic and on principle. The case, in my opinion, falls within the decision in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. Lord Macnaghten in that case said: "I come therefore to the conclusion that the expression 'accident' is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word." If the learned lord had stopped at that point, a difficulty might have arisen, because it might be said that injury by disease is not an accident in the popular and ordinary meaning of the word. But he goes on: "As denoting an unlooked-for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed." In my opinion the catching of anthrax in the present case was an unlooked-for mishap or an untoward event which was not expected or designed. A passage in Lord Macnaghten's speech, a little before the passage just quoted, was pressed upon us for the purpose of showing that the catching of the disease was not an accident. That passage was as follows: "Now the expression 'injury by accident' seems to me to be a compound expression. The words 'by accident' are, I think, introduced parenthetically, as it were, to qualify the word injury, confining it to a certain class of injuries, and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self-inflicted by design." In my opinion this passage was not intended to and does not cut down the later passage to which I have already referred. It seems to me that the word disease in that collocation is not meant to bear the meaning which counsel attributed to it. It means disease which is already in the workman and which he brings with him to his work. The passage does not cover the accidental catching of infection or, as I may perhaps put it, the receipt of a blow, however infinitesimal, from a germ—that is to say, the incursion of a bacillus or germ of disease into the body, in the course of the workman's employment, which may be an accident within the Act. I do not think that that passage displaces the other passage to which I have referred. In my opinion, the catching by the deceased workman here of this disease was an injury by accident within the Act. The disease arose out of and in the course of the employment, but it is not every contagion nor every disease or illness that can be said to so arise. The workman's employment was in connection with this wool, and the infected wool which he had to deal with was the direct cause of his catching the disease. In my opinion both these cases fall within the same category, and come within the definition of accident laid down by Lord Macnaghten in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. The observations of Lord Shand are similar, and none of the other lords say anything inconsistent with that view. In each case, therefore, there was an accident within the meaning of the Act. The consequence is that the appeal in the first case must be allowed and the appeal in the second case must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision of the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. comes to this, that if the injury is caused by an unlooked-for mishap or an untoward event not expected or designed it is caused by an accident within the meaning of the Act. This court in the earlier cases thought if the injury was due to the workman's physical infirmity and weakness it was not caused by an accident. The House of Lords have swept that away, and have made that point quite clear. In that case, however, Lord Macnaghten used words which were pressed upon us as limiting the view which the House of Lords took of the word accident, and which, if they have the effect contended for, would, in my judgment, take away a great deal from the beneficial effect of the decision. Lord Macnaghten said that "the words 'by accident' are, I think, introduced parenthetically, as it were, to qualify the word injury, confining it to a certain class of injuries, and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self-inflicted by design." It is said that the injuries in the present cases were due to disease, and that Lord Macnaghten took especial care to exclude diseases of all sorts. That does not seem to me to be a proper conclusion to draw from his language. He was there referring to the case of a workman bringing a disease with him to his work. Lord Macnaghten's description of "accident"—namely, that it "is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked-for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed"—is not, in my opinion, affected by that passage. In the same way Lord Lindley says that "an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss." The facts in these two cases show that the disease was unexpected. The workman, when dealing with the infected wool, as it was his duty to do, did not expect to catch anthrax. It was quite unexpected. It was an unlooked-for mishap or misadventure throughout. The cases seem to me to be covered by the decision in Fenton v. Thorley & Co.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to say what conclusion I should have arrived at apart from the decision of the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., and in this connection one must not forget that the award of the learned judge of the Bradford County Court, as well as the award of the learned judge in the second case, was made before the decision of the House of Lords in that case. Having regard to that case I do not think that it is open to us to adopt the view of the judge of the Bradford County Court. It seems to me that upon the facts here there was something unexpected arising by reason of the workman dealing with this raw material in the process of manipulation. It was an an accident arising out of and in the course of the workman's employment. I desire to emphasize that, because many of the illustrations which were put before us raised considerations which were clearly outside the Act. I should be sorry to hold that every disease or illness which was contracted by a workman in his employment was an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. It is not necessary to discuss that question. Where the infection is communicated, as it was in this case, it is an injury by accident arising out of the employment.

Appeal in the first case allowed; appeal in the second case dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant in the first appeal, Wrensted & Hind, for W. H. Scott, Bradford.

Solicitors for the employers, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble.

Solicitors for the applicant in the second appeal, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for W. Waldron, Brierley Hill.

Solicitors for the employers, Helder, Roberts, & Co., for Tunbridge & Co., Birmingham.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 15.

GREEN v. BRITTEN & GILSON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Factory—Warehouse—Wholesale business—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A place which is used for storing goods for sale in a wholesale business, and as ancillary thereto, is a "warehouse" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Burr v. Whiteley, 19 Times L. R. 117, discussed.

Appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Addison, at the Southwark County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a workman in the employment of the respondents, Messrs. Britten & Gilson, who carried on business as oil and colour merchants and drysalters and wholesale and retail dealers in glass. The respondents had a shop in Union-street, Southwark, where they sold oils, colours, and drysalters' goods, and in connection with the business they had two railway arches on the opposite side of a narrow street. These two arches communicated with each other, and from one of the arches, which was used as a lead and glazing shop where stained glass was made, there was an underground way to the shop. The other arch was used for storing cases of heavy glass and was called the "plate arch," the glass being polished there. It was 80 feet in depth, 36 feet wide, and 15 feet high. The cases of glass came from abroad, and when sold they were delivered in vans. Glass was constantly coming into the plate arch in carts and being sold, but customers did not go into the arch, no buying or selling going on there. One witness stated that he had seen 400 or 500 cases of glass in the arch. The business of the respondents' firm was conducted in the shop, and the glass was either supplied to the shop for customers giving their orders there, or was taken away direct from the arch in the respondents' carts when the orders were received from the respondents' travellers. No more glass was stored in the arch than was necessary for the current business, only things required in the course of the business being kept in the arches. The respondents' business was mainly a wholesale one, the retail business forming a small part of it. While the applicant was working in the plate arch unloading some cases of glass, three cases fell upon his leg and injured it. The county court judge in giving judgment said: "I find that the plate arch was used as ancillary to the business carried on in Union-street, and only so used—a store-room from which the wholesale and retail customers giving their orders either in the shop or to the travellers were supplied, goods being daily delivered there and also delivered out, and so it was not a 'warehouse' within the meaning of the Act." He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

P. T. Blackwell and Martin O'Connor, for the applicant. — Whether the plate arch is a "warehouse" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is not solely a question of fact. It is a mixed question of law and fact. When the facts have been found, it is a question of law whether a place is a "warehouse" within the Act: Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49. The county court judge decided it as a question of law and not as a question of fact, and he misdirected himself in laying it down that because the arch is ancillary to a wholesale and retail business, it is not a "warehouse." The Act contains no definition of warehouse, and therefore the word must be construed in its ordinary and popular signification: Haddock v. Humphrey, 48 W. R. 292, [1900] 1 Q. B. 609. Johnson's Dictionary (1870 ed.) describes a warehouse as a "storehouse for merchandize"; and the Century Dictionary as "a house in which wares or goods are kept; a storehouse," and "a store for the sale of goods at wholesale; also, often, a large retail establishment." This arch comes within that description. A warehouse in business language includes a place where goods are stored when they come from the factory for sale in the shop. In Burr v. Whiteley, 19 Times L. R. 117, the place in question was simply used as a place where goods were kept for sale by retail in the shop above. The arch in the present case is mainly used for storing goods in connection with the respondents' wholesale business. It is therefore not a shop nor a store-room ancillary to a retail shop, but a "warehouse" within the meaning of the Act.

They also referred to Wilmott v. Paton, 50 W. R. 148, [1902] 1 K. B. 237; Watson v. Cotton, 17 L. J. C. P. 68.

Shakespeare, for the respondents.— The county court judge has found that the respondents' business is carried on in the shop. The goods are sold either in the shop or through travellers, and the fact that goods are delivered out of the arch without being first taken into the shop can make no difference. No more goods are stored than are necessary for the current business, and the arch is used and used only as ancillary to the business carried on in the shop. The case comes exactly within Barr v. Whiteley, and the arch is not a "warehouse" within the meaning of the Act. In no business carried on in a shop are all the orders given in the shop itself, and nearly every such business has a place where goods for which there is no room in the shop are stored. If this arch is held to be a warehouse, then every shop in London has a warehouse attached to it. A warehouse within the meaning of the Act must be a place which is used as an ordinary warehouse. The business of the occupier of the place must be looked at. If he carries on a warehousing business, the place is a warehouse within the Act. But where a person merely stores his own goods as ancillary to his real business, the place of storage is not a warehouse. The Act is intended to cover particular trades, of which the trade of a warehouseman is one. The last clause of section 4 shows that the real business of the employer is to be regarded, and not that which is merely ancillary or incidental to his real business. [He also referred to Colvine v. Anderson, 5 Fraser 255.] Further, this is a question of fact upon which no appeal lies from the decision of the county court judge, unless, indeed, which is not the case here, the evidence is such that the place is necessarily a warehouse. It is also a question of fact whether the arch was used merely as ancillary to the real business of the respondents.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Blackwell replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Southwark County Court, and the question arises in this way: A workman met with an accident in what I will at present call a warehouse. The accident happened while the workman was unloading some heavy cases of glass. Three cases fell upon him and injured his leg. It appears that two railway arches were occupied and used by the respondents, one being used for storing cases of heavy glass, and the other being used for other purposes. The respondents also occupied a shop in which they carried on both a wholesale and a retail business, and the arch in question was used for storing cases of glass in connection with the wholesale and retail business carried on in the shop. Orders were given by customers either in the shop or to travellers, and the goods ordered were sent out from this warehouse. This arch, so far as the wholesale trade is concerned, fulfilled all the purposes of a warehouse. The retail trade which the respondents carried on formed but an insignificant part of their business. The question is whether the arch is a "warehouse" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The county court judge held that it was not.

It is exceedingly difficult, by reason of the course which the decisions have taken, to draw the line between that which is, and that which is not, a warehouse. The decisions have gone a long way, and have excluded certain lines of definition. It is no longer possible to say that a warehouse within the meaning of the Act is limited to a place for storing goods in contiguity to a dock, wharf, or quay, or to water. Nor is it possible to limit the word to a place where the public have a right, upon pavment, to send their goods to be stored, such as one of the large furniture repositories with which one is familiar. It has been applied to places which are only used by the owner for the storage of his own goods, and which have no connection with water transit. Was, then, this arch a warehouse within the meaning of the Act? In a recent case we adopted a principle laid down by Judge Wightman Wood in Hunt v. Grantham Co-operative Society, L. T. Journal, Feb. 15, 1902, that where a store is merely ancillary to a retail shop it is not a warehouse within the Act, as neither shops nor shopkeepers are brought within the Act. Adopting that principle, we held in Burr v. Whiteley that a large receptacle used for storing goods kept for the purpose of sale in a retail shop was not a warehouse within the meaning of the Act. Now we have a case where a wholesale business is carried on, and at the same time a retail business is carried on in the shop. Looking at the whole of the facts it seems clear that this arch was used almost entirely for the purposes of the wholesale business, and, in my opinion, the county court judge misdirected himself in saying that the store was merely ancillary to the business carried on in the shop, and was therefore not a warehouse within the Act. That result does not necessarily follow, because one must see what is the business carried on, and if it is substantially a wholesale business, the store may well be, and as far as I can see, as a matter of law it must be, a warehouse within the Act. A store which is merely ancillary to a retail business is very different from a store which is ancillary to a wholesale business. If this arch is ancillary to the wholesale business it is a warehouse; if ancillary to the retail business it is not a warehouse. It is a mixed question of law and fact, and in my opinion the county court judge misdirected himself in point of law. It seems to me that the business carried on by the respondents was in the main a wholesale business, and the arch was used substantially for the purposes of that business. The Legislature, in introducing the word warehouse into the Act, was dealing with the probable danger to workmen by reason of the handling of goods on a large scale, and that is just as likely to occur where the place in which the goods are handled is ancillary to another place in which the actual sale of the goods wholesale takes place. The case of Colvine v. Anderson was cited to us as being inconsistent with the view which I am now putting forward. I do not think so. When that case is looked at I can see no inconsistency between it and our decision in the present case. I am willing to adopt the language of the Lord President, where he says: "Upon these facts I am of opinion that the respondents' premises are not a 'warehouse' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. There is no definition of 'warehouse' in the Act of 1897, and we know that the term is used in a variety of senses, but I think that, as used in that Act, it does not include a retail shop, which the respondents' premises practically are, otherwise every such shop would come under the provisions of the Factory Acts, which have not hitherto, so far as I am aware, been held applicable to them. While it may be difficult to define 'warehouse,' I am of opinion that, as used in the Act of 1897, it involves the idea of a place normally of considerable size, mainly used for the storage of goods in bulk, or in large quantities, and in which, consequently, the dangers incident to the handling of goods in bulk or in large quantities might naturally arise." That seems to me to express as accurately as possible the meaning of the word "warehouse" in the Act. All the elements mentioned by the Lord President are present in this case. In my opinion the county court judge was too strict in holding that the rule laid down as to a store that is ancillary to a retail business applies to this case. The arch here is ancillary to the wholesale trade, and is therefore a warehouse within the meaning of the Act. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The county court judge has given us a full statement of the grounds of his decision, and in my opinion upon the evidence furnished to us the store was used so as in law to be a warehouse within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The glass is brought to the arch for the purpose of being polished, and it is stored there in the first instance for that purpose, and when polished it remains there in large quantities and in heavy packages awaiting sale whether by orders given by customers in the shop or by orders given to travellers. The county court judge thought that there was a wholesale and retail business, and that the store was ancillary to the shop where the business was carried on. In other words, that the store itself was a shop. That conclusion was arrived at by the use of the word ancillary. Without doubt that is a proper word to use where the store is merely auxiliary or appurtenant in the sense of being subsidiary to the purpose for which the business is carried on. In the present case the store was necessary and indispensable and not merely subsidiary to the carrying on of the wholesale business. I feel therefore relieved from the difficulty which the county court judge created by the use of the word ancillary. It seems to me that the mistake made by the judge lay in treating the store as nothing more than the shop. Our decision entirely follows from the decisions in Burr v. Whiteley and Colvine v. Anderson. This arch is used in connection with the wholesale business as a store where goods are kept for safe custody and for delivery to customers when sales take place. It is therefore a warehouse within the Act.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I have felt and still feel some doubt in this case, but it is not sufficient to cause me to differ from the Master of the Rolls and Mathew, L.J.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the applicant, W. B. Blackwell.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. Hurd & Son.

From K. B. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } July 8, 9, 1903.

OLIVER v. NAUTILUS STEAM SHIPPING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Damages—Payments by employer—Receipts "without prejudice"—"Proceeding"—Action against third person—Exercise of "option"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 6.

The mere fact that a workman has received money from his employer and given receipts therefor, which receipts are expressed to be without prejudice, does not amount to an exercise of his option, under section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to proceed against the employer, so as to preclude him from subsequently pursuing any legal remedy which he may have against some person other than the employer. And in dealing with any particular case it should be regarded as a matter of substance, so that the omission of the words "without prejudice" from the first receipt will not irrevocably bind the workman so as to make it impossible for him to pursue his legal remedy, notwithstanding that the subsequent payments show that the parties must, as between themselves, have treated him as not irrevocably bound by the first payment.

This was an appeal from a decision of Jelf, J.

The plaintiff was an engine-fitter in the employ of John Rodgers & Co. (Limited), ship repairers, at Cardiff, who in November, 1901, were carrying out repairs on board the steamship Elm Branch, belonging to the defendants.

On the 26th of November the plaintiff, by the direction of his employers, went on board the vessel, and while he was working close to the disconnected end of the steampipe from the donkey-engine a man in the employment of the defendants, and in charge of the donkey-engine, suddenly, and without any warning to the plaintiff, started it, with the result that the plaintiff was severely scalded by the escaping steam, and had to be taken to the Cardiff Infirmary. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was in receipt of wages of £2 1s. a week.

On the 2nd of December, 1901, he wrote to his employers from the infirmary informing them of his accident, but not making any formal claim for compensation. At that time he was aware that in order to claim compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, notice of the accident must first be given to his employers.

On the 8th of January, 1902, the agent of the insurance company, with whom the employers had effected the insurance against accidents to workmen in their employ, and to whom they had handed the notice, called on the plaintiff at the infirmary to ascertain his condition, and the plaintiff was also examined by a medical practitioner on behalf of the employers.

On the 15th of January the agent called again and paid the plaintiff £4 13s. 4d., being at the rate of £1 a week for four weeks and four days up to the 11th of January. He handed to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff signed, a receipt stating that the sum had been received from his employers per the insurance company "on account of compensation which may be or become due to me under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the accident which occurred to me on the 26th day of November, 1901."

On the 22nd of January the insurance agent called again and tendered the plaintiff £1 as a payment for the week from the 11th to the 18th of January. In the interval the delegate for a trade union of which the plaintiff was a member had called upon the plaintiff and cautioned him against accepting any further payments without stipulating that he did so "without prejudice." The plaintiff accordingly informed the insurance agent that he could only accept further payments "without prejudice." The agent assented, and said that he would make a note of it, which he then did in his note-book, and he subsequently informed the insurance company that the plaintiff would only accept payments subject to that qualification. The plaintiff then accepted the £1 and signed a receipt as before, which did not itself contain the words "without prejudice."

On the 1st of April, 1902, the plaintiff left the infirmary. Weekly payments of £1 continued to be made to him as before until the 29th of May, when he refused to accept any further payments.

On the 5th of June, 1902, he issued the writ in this action against the defendants, the owners of the steamship, claiming damages for personal injuries.

The action was tried at Cardiff by Jelf, J., without a jury, the damages being agreed at £375 in the event of the judge finding in favour of the plaintiff.

The learned judge held that the plaintiff was in the circumstances debarred by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from pursuing his common law remedy against the defendants, and ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

By section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act: "Where the injury for which compensation is payable under this Act was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages in respect thereof, the workman may, at his option, proceed either at law against that person to recover damages, or against his employer for compensation under this Act, but not against both, and if compensation be paid under this Act, the employer shall be entitled to be indemnified by the said other person."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and J. Sankey, for the plaintiff.—Under section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the plaintiff had an option to proceed either against the defendants for damages or against his employers for compensation, but not against both. The plaintiff cannot be said to have exercised his option, because there is nothing to show that when he accepted the money he was aware of his legal remedy against the defendants. Nor has he taken any "proceeding" against his employers so as to give up his rights against the defendants. All he has done has been to accept a sum of money paid to him by way of compensation, and this does not amount to a "proceeding" nor to a claim for compensation against the employers.

Abel Thomas, K.C., and Parsons, for the defendants.—The only question is whether the plaintiff in the present case has not "proceeded" and so exercised his option under the Act. When a workmen receives as compensation from his employers a weekly sum, knowing that it is as compensation, that amounts to an exercise of his option. Here the workman signed a receipt which is inconsistent with his not having exercised his option, and Jelf, J., has found as a fact that he has exercised it.

S. T. Evans, K.C., replied.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: Powell v. Main Colliery Co., 49 W. R. 49, [1900] A. C. 366; Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons (Limited), 48 W. R. 533, [1900] 2 Q. B. 240; Randall v. Hill's Dry Docks Engineering Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 530, [1900] 2 Q. B. 245; Perry v. Clements, 49 W. R. 669; Tong v. Great Northern Railway Co., 86 L. T. 802; Field v. Longden & Sons, 50 W. R. 212, [1902] 1 K. B. 47; Little v. Maclellan, 2 Fraser 387; Beckley v. Scott & Co., [1902] 2 I. R. 504; Thompson & Sons v. North-Eastern Marine Engineering Co. (Limited), [1903] 1 K. B. 428, 51 W. R. Dig. 106; Lee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 19 W. R. 729, L. R. 6 Ch. 527; and Ellen v. Great Northern Railway Co., 49 W. R. 395.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the plaintiff sues the Nautilus Steam Shipping Co. (Limited) upon the ground that he has been injured under circumstances which throw upon the defendants primâ facie a legal liability in respect of the injury which he has sustained. It is not in dispute that that is true. The defendants who are under this primâ facie liability rely for their defence upon section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. I will read that section in a moment, but I want to say beforehand that the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is not a very easy Act of Parliament to construe. It is an Act of Parliament as to which I think I may properly say that the difficulties of construction are so great that it is not desirable that in any case judges should decide more than is absolutely necessary for the decision of the particular case before them. However, I do not propose to do so myself if I can help it. Now, section 6 says this: "Where the injury for which compensation is payable under this Act was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages in respect thereof." I pause for a moment to remark that we have that here, because the defendants, the Nautilus Steam Shipping Co. (Limited), are persons other than the employer liable to pay damages in respect thereof. The section goes on to provide: "The workman may, at his option, proceed either at law against that person to recover damages, or against his employer for compensation under this Act, but not against both, and if compensation be paid under this Act the employer shall be entitled to be indemnified by the said other person." Now, "the said other person" in the present case are the defendants. They contend that the plaintiff has proceeded "against his employer for compensation under this Act": that he has not only proceeded "against his employer for compensation under this Act," but that he has succeeded in obtaining payment of compensation under this Act; and that, under those circumstances, by the very terms of the 6th section, the workman cannot now bring an action against any other person legally liable to pay damages, because he has proceeded against his employer, and has received compensation from the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. I do not understand Mr. Evans to argue that, if it was true to say in this case that a workman had received from his employer compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as such, he could afterwards sue the "other person." I do not think he contends so; but, whether he does so or not, I say that in my judgment if that had happened it is perfectly plain, whichever view you may take of the 6th section, that a workman who has received compensation from the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, cannot afterwards sue that other person. Therefore really the sole question in this case is: Has the plaintiff received compensation from his employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897? Mr. Evans addressed to us an argument which, I think, was based upon Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Co. He says that in that case it was held—there being a receipt in the identical form of the receipt in the present case—that the plaintiff there who had received moneys, much as this plaintiff has received moneys, had not thereby commenced proceedings so as to exempt himself from the operation of the limitation which is provided by section 2, sub-section 1. That is the section which says "Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury." He contends that, because the Court of Appeal held in the case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Co., that the payment and the existence of the receipt in the same form as the receipt in this case, was not held to be a claim for compensation within the six months so as to oust the operation of the statutory limitation, therefore we ought to hold in the present case that there has been no claim under the Act of 1897, and no payment under such a claim. I can only say that I do not agree with that argument. It must be remembered that, at the time when that case was decided, it was supposed—following the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal in Powell v. Main Colliery Co. (Limited)—that the claim for compensation which must be made within the six months was a claim which must be made by a step in legal proceedings, such as filing a claim for arbitration in the county court. Therefore I shall not trouble any more about that case, because I really do not think that it affects the question which we have to decide here at all. The only question which we have to decide here is whether or not there has been money paid under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by the employer to the workman. I should have been inclined to say that if it had not been for the evidence about the receipt being "without prejudice"—which was expressed by the workman upon the occasion of receiving the second payment, and which, moreover, was noted by the agent who made that payment in his book—the action against the person other than the employer could not possibly have been brought, having regard to the terms of section 6 of the Act of 1897. I think, however, that what was said by the workman in the hospital about "without prejudice" and accepted by the agent paying the money, makes all the difference. Mr. Abel Thomas, who always is willing in any case which he argues to meet the real difficulty in the case, most frankly accepted the proposition that if there had been no first payment made without being subject to this expression of "without prejudice," he really could not have supported his case here. He accepted the position that the result of the expression "without prejudice" was that which was described by the learned judge in the court below, who said in his judgment: "I find also as a fact that the insurance company intended to pay the compensation under the Act, and that the plaintiff intended to take it under the Act; but that the plaintiff tried, after the first occasion when he got the £4 13s. 4d., to keep open any other remedy if he could." If that was so, Mr. Abel Thomas was perfectly right in saying, that, having regard to all those payments which were made under the reservation of "without prejudice," it could not be said that those payments were payments which prevented the plaintiff suing the "other person" mentioned in the 6th section of the Act, because those payments were made without prejudice (as the learned judge in the court below says) to any other remedy which the plaintiff might have. And I should go further myself and say: "Altogether without prejudice in any respect." Here there was an agent who was standing in the shoes of the employer, and who might be expected to act in the same way that an employer, taking an interest in his workmen, might be expected to act—that is to say, come to the man lying in a state of suffering, as he then was, and say: "You are entitled under the Act of Parliament, if you claim compensation, to receive each week a sum of money being the statutory proportion to your wage. Here it is, take it, and take it without prejudice; which means leaving you exactly in the same position as if you had not taken it, and not binding you to retain the money in any way if you, upon rising from your sick bed, should think it better not to accept this money from me, your employer, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but elect to take the remedy against the other person who has the legal liability described in the 6th section of the Act."

Now, having said that, it seems to me that the only difficulty which remains is the difficulty which arises in respect of the first payment—that is, the payment which was made up on the 15th of January, 1902. That was not made subject to any such reservation as "without prejudice." The real question is, Ought we to treat the first payment as having been made subject to the same condition as the later payments? I think we ought. My reason for that is this: After all, a receipt does not in itself create any estoppel of any sort or kind. You may take all the circumstances surrounding it into consideration and ask yourself the question what really was intended by the parties when the receipt was given and taken. One must not forget—although I am not going to quarrel with Jelf, J.'s, findings—that the plaintiff understood what he was doing when he gave the receipt—understood, that is to say, that he was receiving a payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. I do not think that it would be a fair inference to draw that the plaintiff at that moment was in such a state of bodily health and mind that really he could make no election as to what would be the best course to pursue. To my mind, you cannot have a stronger piece of evidence that this is true as to the state of things upon the 15th of January, 1902, than the evidence of the acts of the agent of the insurance company. What does the agent mean when, upon the next occasion, the next week, he accepted, as he clearly did accept, the receipt which was given subject to the qualification of "without prejudice"? He accepted it upon that occasion, and he accepted it upon all subsequent occasions until the month of May, 1902, when the plaintiff refused to receive any more payments. What did the agent think it all meant when he accepted that qualification or that reservation? Did he really think, and did he ask the learned judge who tried the case, and does he ask us now to say—or do those who really rely upon his evidence ask us to say—that when this reservation was given and accepted by him it did not matter whether the plaintiff made a reservation or whether he did not make a reservation, because he had already committed himself by the first receipt and the first acceptance; and that it was idle for him to think of reserving any other remedy that he might have because he had already precluded himself from any further option by the first payment which was made, and in respect of which he was content to give a receipt? I do not think that the agent would be willing to have that view taken of his conduct. My own view is that by quietly accepting that reservation or qualification "without prejudice," which he entered in his book and communicated to his principals without making any protest or objection to it to the plaintiff, he agreed really that the qualification was to override the whole of the receipts. Once you have got it that that qualification is to override all the receipts, it seems to me that there is an end of the defence set up by the defendants here. It may be perfectly true to say that where there is a receipt which without any qualification acknowledges the receipt of money under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, there has been a claim or a proceeding within the meaning of section 6. But, in my judgment, that cannot properly be said where the payment in question is not an unqualified receipt of the money, but a receipt given by a sick man who, at the moment of giving the receipt, expressly makes the acknowledgment of the receipt subject to the qualification of "without prejudice." In my judgment, this is sufficient to dispose of the case. I think that, under those circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to bring his action; and, as the damages have been agreed, I think that we ought to allow this appeal and reverse the decision of Jelf, J., and enter judgment for the plaintiff for £375. I only have to add that I have tried not to express any opinion, or give any judgment, upon any points other than those necessary for the decision of the present case, beyond saying that if there is a payment and a receipt of money under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that receipt is in no way qualified, I think that that is sufficient to bring the case within the operation of section 6, and put the workman in a position of a man who has proceeded against his employer for compensation and recovered it. I express no opinion whatsoever upon the numerous points which have been very properly raised in the discussion of this case before us.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion.

To my mind the question upon which the present appeal turns is simply whether the plaintiff before he commenced this action had exercised the option given to him by section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by proceeding against his employers so as to preclude him, by virtue of that section, from now suing the defendants. The learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had exercised the option in the sense that I have mentioned. But this, to my mind, is chiefly because the learned judge drew certain inferences from the facts of the case which were really not much in dispute. It is quite open to us, in my opinion, to differ from the learned judge upon the conclusion of fact which he has come to in this case. This is not like a case where a judge has seen the witnesses and has had to decide a question of fact that depended upon which side the witnesses were speaking the truth, where there was a direct conflict of evidence. Where there is a direct conflict of evidence on the main issue of fact, and the judge has seen the witnesses and declared that he believes one side and not the other, naturally enough the Court of Appeal would not like to differ from the judge in such a case as that. That is to my mind wholly distinct from the present case. I think that this case is one, as I have said, where the learned judge has proceeded upon certain inferences which he has drawn from the facts and from these facts it is as well open for us to draw inferences, as the learned judge in the court below. I think, therefore, that I am at liberty to decide this question of fact for myself upon the evidence; and looking at the evidence I come to the conclusion that it would not be right for us to hold that the plaintiff had precluded himself by what he did from now suing the defendants. In the first place let me point out that under section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it cannot, I think be said that a workman must necessarily be held to have exercised the option given to him by that Act as against his employers or as against the stranger liable, because he has taken some proceeding either at law against the stranger or under the Act against his employer. Whether the proceedings would in fact be such as to bind the workman must depend upon the circumstances of each case, including a consideration of what has resulted from the proceedings and whether or not any injustice will result if the proceedings are held not to irrevocably bind the workman. Farther, I should like for myself to say that in dealing with any particular case, I should try and look at it as a matter of substance, and decide it on the substance rather than on matters of form. I will further add that as at present advised, though it is not necessary for me to express a final opinion for the determination of this case, I am disposed to think that proceedings should not be held to irrevocably bind the workman unless those proceedings have resulted in some compensation as such, having been paid to and received by the workman so as to bind the parties.

With those observations I proceed to deal with the facts of the present case. The workman after he was injured sent in a notice of injury. That was a proceeding taken, and properly taken, by him by way of caution, and certainly was an innocent act and one that would not bind him in any way so far as concerns the point involved in this appeal. Now, until I come to deal with the question of certain payments that have been made to him, beyond sending that notice of injury it seems that the workman did absolutely nothing in this case—he did not make a formal claim; he sent in no notice of claim. The fact that a doctor subsequently visited him I only mention in passing, because it appears to me that it really has no materiality. I therefore proceed at once to the question of the payments that were made to the workman. To my mind it is most material to see how those payments were made, and in what respect they were paid, and how they were received by the workman. They were paid in this wise: The workman was lying seriously ill. I take it that, although seriously ill and in great pain, he understood sufficiently to know what was passing. An agent comes from the insurance company who have indemnified the employers—and therefore are the persons really bound to pay if the employers are liable—and offers to make a certain payment—something like a weekly payment to the workman and take a receipt. That receipt has been so often read that I need not repeat it. It purports to be a receipt of a sum on account of compensation which might be or become due to the workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. I will take it that the workman knew what was in that receipt, and that he knew that he had a claim or might make a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. But when the receipt is considered, this is at any rate clear, that it in no wise bound the employers to any recognition of liability on their part. It left everything open to them except—although I need not decide the question—that it is possible after the receipt has been given it might be implied as between the parties that a claim was supposed to have been made by the workman under the Act. But the payments were not made, as I have already pointed out, as admitting any liability on the part of the employers; nor can the payments be taken, therefore, as against the workman, to have been received by him irrevocably, or as having been made on an admission as between the parties of liability on the one part and receipt in respect of an admitted right by the workman on the other. It seems to me to have left, even on the form of the receipt, the position of the parties in an intermediate state. Neither party, it appears to me, was absolutely bound by the payments, nor by the form of the receipt. But the matter does not stand there. After the first payment had been made, the agent of the insurance company comes again to make a further weekly payment. In the meantime, between the first payment and the second, the plaintiff is informed by an officer of his trades union that payments ought to be received by him expressly without prejudice, and accordingly the next payment and all the subsequent payments are made to the workman on the terms that they are received by the workman expressly "without prejudice." I infer from the officer of the trades union having come to the workman, and from the evidence in this case, that between the first payment and the second the plaintiff had been informed of what he was previously ignorant, that he might have a claim against the defendants and not necessarily a claim against the employers at all under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. At any rate this is clear, that the second payment and all subsequent payments were made to and received by the workman expressly without prejudice. It is noticeable that no objection was made on behalf of the agent for the insurance company to the payments being made and received on that footing. It appears to me that under those circumstances we ought not to consider the first payment to be left standing as it were by itself as an isolated and fatal fact, but that we must look to see what subsequently took place. I think that the second payment and subsequent payments made expressly without prejudice show under the circumstances that the parties must have treated the first payment as being held as between the parties not to have irrevocably bound the workman, but to be taken also for the purpose I am now considering as being likewise without prejudice. It is admitted before us that for the purpose of this appeal the plaintiff cannot be said to have been at all prejudiced or affected by any of the payments after the first. But it is said, and the learned judge in the court below has so decided, that because of that one payment made, and that one without anything expressly being said by the workman at the time of payment, notwithstanding the form of the receipt and notwithstanding the other circumstances—that that first payment and retainer of the money irrevocably bound the workman, and made it impossible for him, notwithstanding all the circumstances thereafter, to say that the defendants remain liable to him, as they undoubtedly were liable, at common law. I think that under the circumstances we ought not to agree with the learned judge in that conclusion. It seems to me that, looking at the substance of this case, justice requires that we should hold that the workman has not irrevocably bound himself by what he has done; and that he has not exercised his option under section 6 in such a manner as to enable the defendants to say in this case that they are free from all liability to the plaintiff under the common law. I need only say in conclusion that, in my opinion, the case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan is perfectly distinct from the present case. In fact, if the judgments of the learned judges who decided that case are looked at, it will be seen that they base their decision on grounds which emphasise the distinction between that case and the present. They found there, as a matter of fact, the payments were made to and received by the workman as payments due in respect of an admitted liability, and as a satisfaction pro tanto, as they went on, of the liability under the Workman's Compensation Act, 1897. The circumstances of that case are quite distinct from the present; and, as I have said, the very reasons on which that case was based show, to my mind, that, if the learned judges had had to decide the present case, they would have decided it in the way in which we are doing. At any rate, it forms no authority against the views I am now expressing. I agree, therefore, that this appeal ought to succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I respectfully differ from Jelf, J., on one point. I think, as my brethren do, that he has attached too little importance to the fact that all the payments after the first were made without prejudice. I do not differ from him or question any of his findings of fact as they stand. But I think, in the conclusion at which he has arrived, he neglected to give the weight which is attributable to that circumstance. And I agree with the view which my brethren have taken of the case, having regard to the fact that the payments subsequent to the first were so made. I wish, however, to say for myself that I have great difficulty in seeing how Jelf, J.'s, decision is reconcilable with the decision in Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Co., which was cited by Mr. Evans. That case must be read in connection with the case which preceded it of Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons (Limited). I understand Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons (Limited) to be a decision that, where an agreement is arrived at between the employer and the servant, that there is a statutory liability on the part of the employer to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but the amount of compensation is left to be settled afterwards by a judge or arbitrator, the employer will not be allowed to set up the defence that no claim was made within six months of the accident. That I understand to be in accordance with the decision in the Scotch case of Ryan (or Little) v. MacLellan, which has been referred to. That being the state of things in Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons (Limited), the case of Rendall v. Hill's Dry Dock Co. occurred shortly afterwards. There what took place was this: There was apparently no notice of the injury sent under the Act; nor was there any formal claim put forward. But payments were made by an insurance company on behalf of the employers and receipts were taken precisely in the same form as are found to have been taken in the present case. In that state of things the county court judge before whom the case came held that a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, did not mean only an application for arbitration. He further held that if, having regard to the defence of the appellants, it was open to them to object that the weekly receipts signed by the respondent were not claims for compensation, such receipts were either claims for compensation or were evidence that a claim had been made; and that the appellants, by taking such receipts and paying the weekly sums therein mentioned, either waived a claim for compensation or were estopped from taking their objection. He held, therefore, that the employers were not entitled to set up the objection that no claim had been made within the six months. I think that it is quite true, as has been pointed out by my lord, that at the time the decision in Powell v. Main Colliery Co. (Limited) in the Court of Appeal was standing, and the case was decided with reference to that decision. But it does not seem to me that that exhausts the case, because Smith, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, after referring to the receipt says, (at p. 249 of [1900] 2 Q. B.): "Do these circumstances show a waiver of the six months' limitation, or amount to an estoppel against setting up that defence? Clearly they do not." Then, after referring to the case of Wright v. John Bagnall & Sons (Limited), he says: "What was the ratio decidendi in that case? There the claim for compensation had not been made within six months of the accident, and the county court judge held, as my brother Collins says, that the parties had agreed that there was a statutory liability on the respondents to pay compensation, and that each of them had reserved the right to go to the court to have the amount determined. My brother Williams seems also, during the argument, to have said what was exactly to the same effect. Where is there any evidence in the present case that the parties agreed that there was a liability on the part of the employers to pay compensation? I can see no evidence of any such agreement." The evidence before the court in that case was exactly similar to the evidence which occurs here. And it seems to me that that case constitutes a great difficulty in the way of upholding Jelf, J.'s, decision in the present case. I desire to abstain from expressing any opinion as to what might be held to be the true meaning of the word "proceed" in the 6th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, only saying that it seems to me that great weight should be attached to the judgments which have been delivered in the Irish case of Beckley v. Scott & Co.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Riddell, Vaizey, & Smith, for Harry Williams, Neath; Botterell & Roche.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Nov. 20, 21, 23-26; Dec. 14.

In re WELLCOME'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark—Fancy word not in common use—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64.

It is not necessary in order that a word may be validly registered as a trade-mark under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 64, as "a fancy word not in common use," that it should be wholly unsuggestive. The word "tablet" was well known in reference to solid drugs long before 1884. In 1884 the word "tabloid," which had not been in use before, was registered under the Act in respect of substances used in medicine and pharmacy.

Held, that, although there was a suggestion and atmosphere of description about the registered word, yet that as it did not "really intelligibly describe the thing sold," it was a "fancy word" within the above section.

This was an application by Messrs. Thompson & Capper, carrying on business as chemists in Manchester, to have the register of trade-marks rectified by removing therefrom the trade-marks of "tabloid" and "tabloids," belonging to J. S. Wellcome, trading as "Burroughs, Wellcome, & Co."

The motion came on with an action by J. S. Wellcome against the applicants for an injunction restraining them from infringing the trade-marks and from passing off their goods as those of the plaintiff.

The word "tabloid" was registered by the respondent J. S. Wellcome or his firm on the 14th of March, 1884, a trade-mark in class 3 in respect of substances not included in class 1 used in medicine and pharmacy, and on the 27th of January, 1885, they registered in the same class the representation of a box with the word "tabloids" upon it. Previously to these registrations the firm were manufacturing and selling compressed drugs in a solid form, and of a lenticular or bi-convex shape.

The registrations had been renewed and were in force. The respondent firm had continually made and sold compressed drugs in connection with the word "tabloid" or "tabloids." The word "tablet" was well known with reference to solid drugs as early as the time of Lord Bacon, as appeared from a quotation given in Johnson's Dictionary, edition of 1848. In the Imperial Dictionary, published in 1868, tablet was defined as "a medicine in a square form." The word "tablet" had also been used to denote compressed drugs made up in the bi-convex shape in question by the respondent firm in connection with Wyeth's tablets, and by some other persons. The firm had registered "tablet" for the same class, intending to use it as their trade-mark, but finding that it could not be sustained, the word "tabloid" was invented and was registered. It was used by the respondent firm for the first time at the time of registration.

Moulton, K.C., Neville, K.C., Levett, K.C., Sebastian, and D. M. Kerly, for the plaintiffs in the action and the respondents in the application.—"Tabloid" is a fancy word, and is similar to the word "Bovril," which was held to be a fancy word: In re Trade-Mark "Bovril," 45 W. R. 150, [1896] 2 Ch. 600. So "Mazawattee," although compounded of a Hindoo and a Cingalese word, was held a fancy word: In re Densham's Trade-Mark, 43 W. R. 515, [1895] 2 Ch. 176. "Solio" was held an invented word in Eastman's Photographic Materials Co. v. Comptroller-General, 47 W. R. 152, [1898] A. C. 571. An invented word must be a fancy word.

A. J. Walters and J. H. Gray, for defendants and applicants.—"Tabloid" is merely the word "table" or "tablet" with the well-known suffix "oid" added. The word only means a kind of tablet. It is similar to the words "rhomboid" and "fungoid." It does not follow that because that particular form of the word was not in existence before the registration that it is a fancy word. "Electroid," although not to be found in any dictionary, was held not a fancy word: In re Hannay's Trade-Mark, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 46. The respondents had no right to appropriate a word which was the natural development of the English language. The words "Melrose Favourite Hair Restorer" and "Electric Velveteen" have been held not to be fancy words: In re Van Duzer's Trade-Mark and In re Leaf & Co.'s Trade-Mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623. So also the word "reversi": Waterman v. Ayres, 37 W. R. 110, 39 Ch. D. 29. The word "tablet" was in common use to designate articles used in pharmacy before the registration.

They also referred to In re Jackson & Co.'s Trade-Mark, 6 Rep. Pat. Cas. 80; Meaby & Co. (Limited) v. Triticine (Limited), 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 1; and J. C. & J. Field (Limited) v. Wagel Syndicate (Limited), 48 W. R. 390, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 266.

Dec. 14.—BYRNE, J.—The registrations of the marks in question were under the Act of 1883, and having regard to the terms of section 64 (1) (c) the question is whether or not "tabloid" was a distinctive fancy word not in common use at the date of registration. The case of In re Trade-mark "Bovril" before the Court of Appeal relieves me from a close examination of earlier cases, and gives me a guide in endeavouring to determine whether or not "tabloid" was a fancy word. The earlier leading cases of Van Duzer's Trade-Mark and Leaf & Co.'s Trade-Mark were cases in which, as pointed out by Lord Lindley in the "Bovril" case, a coined word was not under consideration at all, but ordinary English words. "Where," Lord Lindley says, "you have got a fanciful use of a known word, you must have a word which is obviously non-descriptive." I think that I also get this from that case, that it is not necessary that the word should be absolutely unsuggestive. The word "Bovril" was suggestive of "ox"; but as a whole it was held not to be descriptive. The argument in the present case for the applicants was that this was a word compounded of "table" or "tablet" with a common suffix "oid," the suffix meaning "in the form of" or "like" or "allied to," as used in many English words, especially in connection with a scientific nomenclature. On the other hand, it was forcibly urged that the only attribute common to the things denoted by the words "table" and "tablet" is a suggestion of flatness on one side or other, or on both sides of the object, without any notion of convexity. If the suffix is appended to "tablet" the new word is "tabletoid" and not "tabloid," and though "tabloid" would probably be a natural way of adding the suffix "oid" to "table," and though solid drugs in certain forms were known as "tabellae," or "tabulae," yet there is nothing that I can find to denote convexity or compression in the word. I think that the case is near the line, but, treating it as a matter of fact in the particular case, I come to the conclusion that in March, 1884, the word was not "really intelligibly describing the thing sold," which is the way Lord Lindley in the Bovril case ([1896] 2 Ch. p. 609) puts the proper form of direction to the jury. I agree that there is a suggestion or atmosphere of description about the word as here used, but I do not think that it can be said to be other than a "fancy word" as applied to goods in the class in which it was registered.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[His Lordship afterwards granted an injunction in the action].

Motion dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs and the respondents, Markby, Stewart, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants and applicants, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchard, Barham, & Lawford, for Alsop, Stevens, Harvey, & Crooks, Liverpool.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Nov. 10, 11.

In re CALVERLEY'S SETTLED ESTATES.
CALVERLEY v. CALVERLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Settled land—Housing of the Working Classes Acts —Improvements—Cottages for labourers, &c.—Additions or alterations to enable house to be let—"Available for the working classes"—"Building not injurious to the estate"—37 & 38 Vict. c. 38, s. 25 (x., xx.); 48 & 49 Vict. c. 72, s. 11 (1) (b); 53 & 54 Vict. c. 70, s. 74 (1) (b); 53 & 54 Vict. c. 69, ss. 13 (ii.) and 18.

Section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, which authorizes, as improvements under the Act, "the making of additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let," refers to a future letting. Therefore, where a scheme submitted by tenant for life to trustees included additions to a house occupied by a tenant,

Held, that the trustees would have discretion to approve the work if the present tenant should give notice to quit, or even if they were satisfied he was resolved to do so.

The expression "available for the working classes" in section 74 (1) (b) of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (replacing a repealed enactment), means "actually available," and cannot apply to dwellings which are in the occupation of persons whom the Acts do not define as belonging to those classes.

The condition in the same sub-section limiting it to dwellings, "the building of which, in the opinion of the court, is not injurious to the estate," applies only where it is desired to build, and does not restrict the powers conferred by section 25 (xx.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Semble, a cottage occupied by a labourer, farm servant, or artizan is substantially within section 25 (x., xx.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, notwithstanding that it is rented in the name which his wife formerly bore as widow of a man not answering any of those descriptions.

This was an action, commenced by originating summons, by the tenant for life of settled estates, for the determination of the question whether certain proposed works, of which a scheme had been submitted by him to the respondent trustees, were improvements within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890.

There was not in the hands of the trustees a sufficient amount of capital money arising under the Acts to pay for the proposed work.

The settlement was created by the will dated in 1868 of Edmund Calverley, who died in 1897, having by a codicil appointed the said respondents trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the said Acts. The persons entitled in remainder were also respondents and opposed the scheme—mainly in regard to the following items, which for the purposes of this report are distinguished by the letters A, B, and C:—

A.—Repair and part reconstruction of a cottage rented by the widow of a miner. She had, since the scheme was propounded, been re-married to a labourer employed on the settled estate, but the cottage was still held in her name.

B.—The addition of a wash-house and privy to a house occupied on a yearly tenancy by one Dr. Buck. From an affidavit by the applicant it appeared that the doctor had taken the house from a former tenant for life under the settlement, on the condition that this work should be done, and that it was expected he would leave if it were not carried out. The house was rated at less than £100 a year.

C.—Sanitary work which had been ordered by the local sanitary authority to be done to 133 tenements rated, as to the greater number, at less than £8, and none of them at so much as £100 each per annum.

Austen-Cartmell, for the applicant relied, on the following enactments: The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 25, which (by sub-section x.) names the building of cottages for labourers, farm servants, and artizans, and (by sub-section xx.) their reconstruction, enlargement, or improvement, as authorized improvements under the Act: The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, s. 74 (1) (b) (replacing s. 11 (1) (b) of the Act of 1885), which extends the above-named provisions to "any dwellings available for the working classes, the building of which, in the opinion of the court, is not injurious to the estate." The Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 18, which enacts that the provisions of the last-named section shall have effect as if the expression "working classes" included all classes of persons who earn their livelihood by wages or salaries, but applies only to buildings rated at £100 a year or less; and section 13 (ii.) of the same Act, which provides that improvements authorized by the Act of 1882 shall include making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let.

He cited In re Duke of Norfolk's Parliamentary Estates, 48 W. R. 328, [1900] 1 Ch. 461, and Stanford v. Roberts, 49 W. R. 315, [1901] 1 Ch. 440. [The court referred to In re Millard's Settled Estates, 41 W. R. 577, [1893] 3 Ch. 116.]

Wace, for the remaindermen, contended that, as to A, the tenant was not a labourer, farm servant, or artizan, so as to bring her dwelling within the terms of section 25 (x., xx.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882; that, as to B, since the house was already let, the works were not necessary or proper to enable it to be let; and that as to C, the tenements were not available for the working classes, since many of them were occupied by tradespeople.

Stafford Crossman, for the trustees, said they were in a difficulty with regard to the sections which had been cited from the Housing of the Working Classes Acts. The point will be found mentioned in the judgment.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, allowed the work mentioned above under A, as being substantially within the meaning of section 25 (clauses x., xx.) of the Settled Land Act, 1882. As to B, his lordship said: "This little matter involves the consideration of section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890. The wording of that sub-section points to a future letting. If the present tenant gives notice to quit, the proposed works will come within the meaning of the sub-section, and being within it, the trustees will have discretion to approve them. The trustees are, in my opinion, not bound to wait till a formal notice is given; it will be enough if they are satisfied of the tenant's intention to leave, and as to this, in order to be quite secure, they should satisfy themselves by inquiry. The works are trifling, but not too small to be within the Act—unless, indeed, they are so small as not to affect the letting capabilities of the house."

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As to C, his lordship held that the word "available" in the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, meant "actually available," and therefore could not apply to dwellings now let to tradespeople and the like; and as to these, the applicant could not succeed. As to the rest, there was considerable difficulty, but he must bear in mind what was said in Bruce v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 41 W. R. 318, [1892] A. C. 356, the view there taken being that the object of the Legislature was to preserve settled land from going out of cultivation. The working classes had no doubt received special attention in these Acts, possibly because it was thought they were less able to take care of themselves than farmers, for instance, were. So far as the tenements now in question fell within section 25, sub-clause x., it was not disputed that sub-clause xx. also applied to them. It had been pointed out by Mr. Crossman that sections 11 (1) (b) and 74 (1) (b) of the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, which extend the scope of section 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, applied only to dwellings, "the building of which in the opinion of the court is not injurious to the estate," and that, therefore, the scope of sub-clause xx. was only extended where (as was not here the case) the dwellings had originally been built with the sanction of the court. But his lordship refused to so limit the operation of the Acts, holding that the use of the present and not the past tense in the qualifying words showed them to apply to cases where it was desired to build dwellings for the working classes and not where it was desired to reconstruct, enlarge, or improve those already built. He therefore held that the proposed works, so far as they related to dwellings available for the working classes, were within the Acts.

Solicitors, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for Dibb & Co., Leeds; Pearce & Aldridge, for Greenwood, Teale, & Marriner, Leeds.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Nov. 27.

MORRIS v. BAKER. (a.)

Practice—Land in possession of receiver—Leave to issue writ for recovery of possession—Writ of possession issued without leave—Injunction.

Leasehold land was in the possession of a receiver appointed by the court on behalf of a mortgagee of the lessee. Leave was given by the court to the lessor to issue a writ against the lessee for the recovery of possession of the land. The lessor obtained judgment and, without obtaining further leave from the court, attempted to execute his judgment by issuing a writ of possession.

Held, that the leave given by the court did not extend beyond leave to obtain judgment, and, consequently, that the lessor could be restrained by injunction from interfering with the possession of the receiver.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

This was an application on the part of the plaintiff in an action of Morris v. Baker that Thomas Jones and certain other respondents, hereinafter called the Moggridge trustees, who were not parties to the action, might be restrained from disturbing or interfering with the possession of Charles Morris Ayliffe, the receiver appointed in the action, of a certain seam of coal, and from in any way trespassing on the said seam of coal.

Thomas Jones and the Moggridge trustees, who together were entitled to the minerals in question, had by a lease and an agreement for a lease, respectively demised and agreed to demise their undivided shares to the defendants, W. Baker and J. W. Baker, for terms of years not yet expired. The instruments creating the terms contained covenants to pay rent and not to assign without licence from the lessors.

By a foreclosure decree made in the present action on the 26th of March, 1903, it was declared that the plaintiff was to be deemed a mortgagee of the lessees' interest in the minerals, and by an order of the 6th of April, the receiver was appointed.

On the 17th of September the master made orders giving the respondents (who alleged that the lessees had broken their covenants by not paying rent and by assigning without notice, and that the leases were thereby forfeited) leave to issue writs for the recovery of the possession of the property. Writs were accordingly issued in the King's Bench Division against W. Baker and J. W. Baker. They did not enter an appearance, and judgment was entered for the lessors in both actions for possession of the property and the amount of arrears of rent. No notice of these actions was given to the receiver.

On the 16th of October the respondents, without making any further application for leave to proceed against the receiver, took out writs of possession.

On the 3rd November the sheriff's officer purported to give possession of the minerals to an agent for the respondents, but did not in fact do so, the minerals having ever since the 6th of April been in the possession of the receiver or his caretaker.

It was the intention of the plaintiff and the receiver to apply under ord. 12, r. 25, to be added as defendants to the ejectment actions, and also to pursue proceedings for relief against forfeiture.

Under these circumstances the present motion was brought. At the hearing it was arranged that the judgment debts due to the respondents in their King's Bench Division action, should be paid into court to the credit of those actions, that the plaintiff should prosecute his application for relief in the ejectment actions with due diligence, and that the respondents should not in the meantime proceed further with their writs of possession, or sue out fresh ones.

The liability to pay the costs of the motion depended on whether the respondents had acted rightly or wrongly in not obtaining the leave of the court before they took out writs of possession.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Rowlands, for the applicant.—The leave obtained by the respondents to bring the ejectment actions only entitled them to pursue the actions to judgment, not to execution. They sued only the lessees, and gave no notice to the receiver, who is entitled, if he can make out his case, to have the judgments set aside, on condition that he procures himself to be added as a defendant in the actions: Minet v. Johnson, 63 L. T. 507, 39 W. R. Dig. 164. The court in giving leave to bring the actions against the lessees only, meant that the question of the right to possession should be tried as between the lessors and lessees. The proper stage for the court to intervene to protect the rights of the receiver, would be the interval between judgment and execution. Execution, by means of a writ of possession, which is a proceeding independent of an action to recover possession required the leave of the court. The attempt to enforce the writs of possession was an interference with the receiver which could be restrained by an injunction.

J. K. Young, for the respondent Jones.—There is no authority directly bearing on the point, but the cases appear to suggest that where the leave of the court has once been obtained to bring an action of ejectment in respect of land which is in the possession of a receiver, no further leave is required to enable the plaintiff to enforce his judgment. If it is desired to protect the possession of the receiver, the court may impose terms in the order by which it gives leave to bring the action. If no terms are imposed, the inference is that the receiver does not require protection: Angel v. Smith, 9 Ves. 335; Evelyn v. Lewis, 3 Ha. 472; In re Battersby's Estate, 31 L. R. Ir. 73. A writ of possession is not an independent proceeding, but follows on, and can only be issued after, a judgment for possession.

Cozens-Hardy, for the respondents, the Moggridge trustees.

Buckmaster, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—The whole substance of this motion has been disposed of. All that remained, in view of what the parties agreed, was that I should hear the motion in order to determine who ought to pay the costs. That turns on the construction to be placed on the words "leave to issue a writ for the recovery of possession," which occur in the order of the master of the 17th of September, 1903. The facts are that certain property being in the possession of a receiver, so that there could be no interference with it without the leave of the court, the court was asked to give leave for proceedings in ejectment. That leave was given. The question is whether the leave thus given extended beyond proceeding to judgment, to the issue of a writ of possession. In my opinion it did not. The true way of looking at the matter is this: The court being in the possession of land or chattels by a receiver, is asked to allow proceedings to be taken by one person against another to determine the title. Leave is given. The party who succeeds ought to say to the court, "This is my land, these are my chattels, but the fruits of my victory are in your possession, and I want them." If there is nothing more in the case the court would give leave for possession. But the party is not entitled, as against the receiver, to obtain possession without leave—that is to say, without the consent of the court, in whose possession the property is. Take another case. Suppose that an action is sued to judgment. Does that always in itself give the right to issue execution? The answer is that it does not. When judgment has been obtained the court has, in certain cases, to be approached again, in order to see whether it will give leave to issue execution or whether there are not other circumstances to which the court ought to have regard. It does not follow that because judgment has been obtained, some other person is not entitled to rights in the property in respect of which leave is to be asked to issue execution. It is the duty of the court, while the property is, as it were, in medio, to see that the rights of all parties in respect of it are protected. Exactly that state of circumstances arises here. I decide simply that the leave which was given to issue a writ for the recovery of possession did not extend beyond leave to try the question who was entitled to judgment for possession. That is the whole point material to determine who is to pay the costs. I therefore order the respondents to pay the costs.

Solicitors, Baker, Baker, & Co.; Martyn & Martyn; Waterhouse & Co.

Chan. Div. } Oct. 29; Nov. 5, 11.
Joyce, J. }

GARNER v. MURRAY & WILKINS. (a.)

Partnership—Dissolution—Insufficient assets to repay capital—Question of adjustment—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 24, sub-section (1); s. 44.

Where the contributions of partners to the capital were unequal, but each were to share equally in profits; and in the distribution of assets upon a dissolution it was found that there was a deficiency of assets,

Held, that the assets must be applied in paying rateably to each partner what was due from the firm to him in respect of capital, account being taken of the equal contributions to be made by each towards the deficiency of capital.

Adjourned summons.

In pursuance of a declaration to that effect, the partnership subsisting between the plaintiff and defendants was dissolved and a receiver appointed. The capital of the partnership had been contributed in certain uneqal shares, but each partner was to be entitled to one-third of the net profits. There was standing in court to the credit of the partnership a sum of £764 9s. 4d., the balance resulting after all debts and outgoings due from the firm had been paid, and the question now arose how this sum was to be properly distributed.

Mr. Wilkins, one of the partners, was indebted to the firm at the time of taking the certificate of the 29th of July, 1901, in the sum of £263 3s. 1d., and this was treated as irrecoverable. By the certificate of the 29th of July, 1901, the capital as found to be due in respect to the partnership was:

Plaintiff (Garner) £2,500 (eight-ninths); Murray, defendant, £314 3s. 4d. (one-ninth)—total, £2,814 3s. 4d.

The assets (treating Wilkins' debt as irrecoverable) available to repay the £2,814 3s. 4d. due for capital, amount to £1,916 19s. 8d.

The deficiency of capital is accordingly £897 3s. 8d."

The question for the court was, how as between the two partners Garner and Murray, this deficit, due to the default of the third partner (Wilkins) was to be borne.

Younger, K.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiff.—Where one partner has contributed more than another, when a distribution of assets at the time of dissolution of partnership takes place, the partner who has made the greater contribution is entitled to be paid the difference between his contribution and that of his partner: Ross v. White, [1894] 3 Ch. 326, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 630; Seton on Decrees, vol. 3, p. 2171. Where the contributions were originally equal, but had become unequal by reason of the unequal amounts drawn out by the partners, there is no distinction in principle between that case and the present. Before the defendant Murray can receive anything the plaintiff's loss must be reduced to an equality with that suffered by Murray. The rule in such a case is to begin by equalizing the loss of capital as between the partners: vide sections 24 (1) and 44 (a) of the Partnership Act, 1890.*

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lindley on Partnership (6th ed.), 601; Binney v. Mutrie, [1886] 12 A. C. 160, 165, 35 W. R. Dig. 143; Nowell v. Nowell, L. R. 7 Eq. 538, 17 W. R. Dig. 117; Ward v. Scoles, 1 Ch. 369; In re Hodge's Distillery Co., 19 W. R. 113, L. R. 6 Ch. 51; Potter v. Jackson, 28 W. R. 411, 13 Ch. D. 845, were also referred to.

Hughes, K.C., and Hon. F. Russell, for defendant Murray.—The word "rateably" in section 44 (b) (3)† presumes that all the contributions have not been paid up in full. Where the assets are insufficient to pay everyone in full the partners are to divide them rateably. The true principle of division in this case is for each partner to contribute to the assets an equal share of the deficiency of capital and then divide the whole rateably between them.

Younger, K.C., in reply.

JOYCE, J.—The real question in this case is how, as between two partners, the ultimate deficit, which arises in the partnership assets from the default of a third partner to contribute his share of the capital, is to be borne by them. We have now in the Partnership Act, 1890, a code which defines the mode in which the assets of a firm are to be dealt with in the final settlement of the accounts after a dissolution.

Section 44 is plain. I don't find anything in that section to make a solvent partner liable to contribute for an insolvent partner who fails to pay his share. Sub-section (b) of section 44 proceeds on the supposition that contributions have been paid or levied. Here the effect of levying is that two partners can pay and one cannot. It is suggested by Mr. Younger that each partner is to bear an equal loss. But when the section says losses are to be borne equally it means losses sustained by the firm. It cannot mean that the individual loss sustained by each partner is to be of equal amount. There is no rule that the ultimate personal loss of each partner, after he has performed his obligations to the firm, shall be the same as or in any given proportion to that of any other partner. I have to follow the Act, and I see no difficulty in doing so in this case.

In the result I agree in the main with Mr. Russell's scheme. The assets must be applied in paying to each partner rateably what is due from the firm to him, account being taken of the equal contributions to be made by each towards the deficiency of capital.

There is nothing in the authorities or in the passage in Lindley on Partnership to which reference has been made, which is inconsistent with the result at which I have arrived.

Solicitors, Crowder, Vizard, & Oldham, for William Warman, Stroud; Balfour Allan, & North.

* Section 24 (1).—All the partners "must contribute equally towards the losses whether of capital or otherwise sustained by the firm."

Section 44 (a)—"Losses, including losses and deficiencies of capital, shall be paid . . . if necessary by the partners individually in the proportion in which they were entitled to share profits."

† Section 44 (b) (3) of Partnership Act, 1890.—"The assets of the firm, including the sums (if any) contributed by the partners to make up losses or deficiencies of capital, shall be applied in the following manner:

"In paying to each partner rateably what is due from the firm to him in respect of capital."

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 10.

WEAVING v. KIRK & RANDALL. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Undertakers"—"Actual use or occupation"—Warehouse—Making additions to—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), s. 104—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

The respondents had contracted with the Government to erect certain pigeon-holes or cupboards in a warehouse in Woolwich Dockyard for storing military accoutrements. The warehouse had just been built for the Government by another contractor, and it consisted of two floors each about 25 feet high, the pigeon-holes which were being erected by the respondents being on the upper floor. A workman in the employment of the respondents was killed by an accident while engaged in the work of erecting the pigeon-holes. At that time the lower floor was already occupied for the storage of military accoutrements, and a foreman and two men in the employment of the building contractor were engaged, in the same room where the respondents were erecting the pigeon-holes, finishing doors putting on locks and painting, and the Government by their own workmen were fixing hydraulic cranes at each end of the room. The clerk of the works for the Government was in charge of the work to see that it was properly carried out. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,

Held, that the respondents had the actual use or occupation of a definite portion of the warehouse for the purpose of carrying on the work within the meaning of section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and were therefore liable as the undertakers within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Bartell v. Gray & Co., 50 W. R. 310, [1902] 1 K. B. 225, followed.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Addison, at the Woolwich County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was the widow of a workman who was in the employment of the respondents, and was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The respondents, Messrs. Kirk & Randall, entered into a contract with the Government to erect some cupboards or pigeon-holes for the storage of military accoutrements on the upper floor of a warehouse which had just been built for the Government by Messrs. Mundy in Woolwich Dockyard. The warehouse, which occupied a space 150 feet long by 100 feet wide, consisted of two floors, each floor being about 25 feet high. The erection of the building had been completed by Messrs. Mundy, with the exception of some cupboard doors and locks on the upper floor, and the lower floor was already used for the storage of military accoutrements. The Government, requiring some pigeon-holes on the upper floor, entered into the above-mentioned contract with the respondents for their erection. At the time of the accident, the foreman and two men in the employment of Messrs Mundy were engaged in the same room finishing doors, putting on locks, and painting, and the Government, by their own workmen, were engaged at each end of the room in fixing hydraulic cranes. The clerk of the works for the

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Government was in charge of the work to see that the men did their duty, and that the contractors complied with the specifications. The premises were locked and unlocked by the person in charge of the dockyard. The keys were kept by the man at the gates. The deceased workman was engaged in erecting the pigeon-holes when he was killed by an accident. His widow brought an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, but the county court judge dismissed the action, and, at the request of the plaintiff, he proceeded to determine the question of compensation under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. In giving his decision he said that the question seemed to turn upon the conclusions of law to be drawn from the above facts. Giving the fullest effect to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bartell v. Gray & Co., 50 W. R. 310, [1902] 1 K. B. 225, and to the observations of the present Master of the Rolls in Merritt v. Wilson, Sons, & Co., 49 W. R. 161, [1901] 1 K. B. 35, he was unable to find any user or occupation by the respondents of the warehouse that would make them "undertakers" within the meaning of the Act. That, however, was a matter of law, and if the Court of Appeal could see its way to a contrary conclusion, they would enter judgment for the applicant for £312. He accordingly decided in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and W. M. Thompson, for the applicant.—This warehouse was admittedly a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the only question is whether the respondents were the "undertakers" in respect thereof within the meaning of that section. Undertakers in respect of a factory means the occupier thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895. By section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, an Act which has taken the place of the former Factory Acts, the person having the actual use or occupation of a warehouse, which is a factory, shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory. Bartell v. Gray & Co., 50 W. R. 310, [1902] 1 K. B. 225, shows that the respondents here had the actual use or occupation of this warehouse within the meaning of that section. The applicant is therefore entitled to compensation.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and W. Addington Willis, for the respondents.—To make a person an occupier of a factory within the Act he must occupy some defined space in the factory: Merrill v. Wilson, Sons, & Co., 49 W. R. 161, [1901] 1 K. B. 35. Further, the occupation must be an occupation of the place as a warehouse; that is, for the purposes for which a warehouse is usually occupied. That was not the case here. The respondents were therefore not the "undertakers," and are not liable to pay compensation. Secondly, this is a question of fact upon which no appeal lies.

They also referred to Bruce v. Henry & Co., 2 F. 717; Low v. Abernethey & Co., 2 F. 722; Purves v. Sterne & Co., 2 F. 887.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Woolwich County Court judge, who has placed all the facts of the case before the court. An action was brought by the widow of a workman who was in the employment of Messrs. Kirk & Randall at the time when he was killed by an accident. Kirk & Randall had undertaken a contract to erect pigeon-holes for storing military accoutrements in a warehouse, the building of which had just been completed by another contractor. Kirk & Randall were executing work which was necessary for making the warehouse complete, and they were in such occupation as was essential for carrying out the work which they had to do. The workman was killed by an accident while employed on the work. The question which we have to decide is whether Kirk & Randall are liable to pay the applicant compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that resolves itself in this, were Kirk & Randall "undertakers" in respect of this warehouse? The warehouse is admittedly a factory within the meaning of the Act. By section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act "undertakers" are defined as meaning in the case of a warehouse "the occupier thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895." That brings us to the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, which, so far as material to the present case, has taken the place of the previous Factory and Workshop Acts. By section 104 of this latter Act "the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse or of any premises within the same or forming part thereof . . . shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory." The question accordingly comes to this: Had Kirk & Randall the actual use or occupation of this warehouse? It seems to me that the answer to that question is supplied by the decision of this court in Bartell v. Gray & Co. Kirk & Randall had the actual use or occupation of a definite space within this warehouse, and they had that use or occupation for the purpose of carrying out the work which they had undertaken to do. It is said that they did not occupy the place as a warehouse ordinarily is occupied and that therefore they are not within the Act. I hardly think that that is necessary; but even if it were, this warehouse could not exist as a complete warehouse unless those necessary and essential additions which Kirk & Randall were carrying out were made. In my opinion, upon the authority of the decided cases, Kirk & Randall were in actual use or occupation of the warehouse, and were therefore "undertakers" in respect thereof within the meaning of the Act. The applicant is therefore entitled to compensation under the Act. In coming to this conclusion I do so as a matter of law. At the first hearing we thought it was probably a question of fact, and we sent the case back to the learned judge for him to state more in detail what the facts were. He now states that he decided the question as one of law. He has stated the facts fully to us, and he has stated his conclusion of law upon those facts. I cannot agree with the conclusion of law which he has arrived at, and the appeal must be allowed, and we will enter judgment for the applicant for £312.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have thought that after the case of Bartell v. Gray & Co. the matter was quite clear, at all events so far as this court is concerned.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. Kirk & Randall had the actual use and occupation of this warehouse for the purpose of carrying out the work which they had contracted to do, and that being so, Bartell v. Gray & Co. is in point.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the applicant, T. E. Crocker.

Solicitors for the respondents, Treadwell & Aylwin.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 9.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. REGENT'S CANAL AND DOCK CO. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Company—Consolidation of debenture stock—Issue of loan capital—Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 8.

By a local and private Act passed in 1900, the debenture stocks which had been issued by the defendant company, bearing interest at 3 per cent., 4 per cent., and 4¼ per cent., were extinguished, and there was created in lieu thereof a new debenture stock bearing interest at 3 per cent. Each stockholder received such an amount of the new stock as would yield him the same amount of interest as had been payable in respect of the stock previously held by him. The total amount of the debenture stocks existing before the Act was £411,852. The amount of the new debenture stock was £529,136.

Held, that the defendant company were liable to pay the stamp duty imposed by section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, on any company who "propose to issue any loan capital."

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., on a special case stated by consent in an action by the Attorney-General, as informant, claiming duty and penalties under section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899 (reported [1903] 2 K. B. 86, 51 W. R. Dig. 70).

The defendants were a company formed and established in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the above-named section, having been incorporated by the Regent's Canal City and Docks Railway Act, 1882. Between the years 1882 and 1900 the defendants from time to time, under the said Act of 1882 and other Acts in that behalf empowering them, issued, and there was existing at the date of the passing of the Regent's Canal and Dock Act, 1900, debenture stock to the amount of £411,852—viz., £110,000 of 3 per cent. stock, £101,852 of 4 per cent. stock, and £200,000 of 4¼ per cent. stock.

By the Regent's Canal and Dock Act, 1900, after reciting that it was expedient that the debenture stock issued by the company should be consolidated into a single debenture stock bearing a uniform rate of dividend of 3 per cent., it was provided (inter alia) as follows:

Section 2.—"Part 3 (relating to debenture stock) and part 4 (relating to change of name) of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, are, except where expressly varied by this Act, incorporated with and form part of this Act. The new debenture stock by this Act created shall be deemed to be debenture stock created by the company within the meaning of and in accordance with the provisions of part 3 of the Companies Clauses Act. 1863."

Section 3.—"(1) On the 31st day of December, 1900, the following stocks of the company shall be by this Act cancelled and extinguished (that is to say): The three per centum debenture stock, the four per centum debenture stock, the four-and-a-quarter per centum debenture stock. (2) On the said 31st day of December, 1900, there shall be by virtue of this Act without further or other authority created in lieu of the stocks extinguished by this Act debenture stock of the company (hereinafter referred to as new debenture stock) of such nominal amount as may be necessary for giving effect to the provisions of this section. (3) Every holder of any of the stocks by this Act extinguished shall be entitled to and shall receive in substitution for every one hundred pounds of such stock held by him and so in proportion for every fraction of one hundred pounds new debenture stock as follows (that is to say): In the case of holders of existing three per centum debenture stock, the same nominal amount of new debenture stock. In the case of holders of existing four per centum debenture stock and of four-and-a-quarter per centum debenture stock respectively, new debenture stock to such nominal amount as at the rate of three per centum will yield to the holder in cash the same amount as the amount of the interest now payable in respect of the existing debenture stock held by him. (4) The new debenture stock shall bear the dividend of three per centum per annum."

The amount of new debenture stock which was required to carry out the provisions of the said Act was £529,136, and debenture stock to this amount was inscribed in the names of the persons entitled thereto under the said Act, and certificates in respect of the same were given in exchange for the old certificates.

Section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, provides as follows: "(1) Where any local authority, corporation, company, or body of persons formed or established in the United Kingdom propose to issue any loan capital, they shall before the issue thereof deliver to the commissioners a statement of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue. (2) Subject to the provisions of this section, every such statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty of 2s. 6d. for every £100, and any fraction of £100 over any multiple of £100 of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue, and the amount of the duty shall be a debt to her Majesty." Sub-section 4 imposes penalties for failure to comply with the section. By sub-section 5, the expression "loan capital" in this section means, inter alia, any debenture stock.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the defendants had under the said Act proposed to issue, or issued, any loan capital, and, if so, to what amount? (2) Whether a statement of the whole or any part of the new debenture stock was deliverable by the defendants to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 8, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1899, and, if so, of what amount? (3) Whether the defendants were liable to pay to his Majesty the sum claimed, or any and what part thereof?

Ridley, J., was of opinion that the defendants had not proposed to issue any loan capital within the meaning of section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, and that the stamp duty imposed by that section was not payable.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Rowlatt, for the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C., and A. M. Talbot (Loehnis with them), for the defendants.

The following cases were cited: Midland Railway Co. v. Attorney-General, 50 W. R. 433, [1902] A. C. 171; Attree v. Hawe, 9 Ch. D. 337.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question in this case is whether the Regent's Canal and Dock Co., by doing what has been authorized to be done by their private Act of 1900, have brought themselves under the obligation which is imposed by section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, on a company which proposes to issue any loan capital. At the time of the passing of the private Act the company had created debenture stocks at different rates of interest—viz., 3 per cent., 4 per cent., and 4¼ per cent. By the new arrangement authorized by the Act there has been substituted for the then existing debenture stock a debenture stock at the uniform rate of 3 per cent. The rate of interest has thus been lowered, but the amount of the stock has been correspondingly enlarged. From the figures it appears that the total amount of the previously existing debenture stocks was £411,852, and that the amount of the new debenture stock is £529,136. This means that the indebtedness of the company has been increased. The result of the operation, therefore, is that one debenture stock has been substituted for three classes of debenture stock, one uniform rate of interest has been substituted for three different rates of interest, and a larger indebtedness has been substituted for the old indebtedness. The debenture stockholders now hold a new debenture stock. Yet it is argued that this company is not a company of whom it can be said that they have proposed to issue loan capital. There can be no doubt that this debenture stock is loan capital, and the persons who hold it are possessors of new stock. How is it possible in fact to put into persons' hands stock which was not existing before without an issue? I cannot see. It seems to me that all the conditions which are involved in an issue are fulfilled in this case. I think that this case is in substance similar to Midland Railway Co. v. Attorney-General, though that was a case under the Stamp Act, 1891, and there is a difference between the wording of that Act and the wording of the Finance Act, 1899. There the company had altered the nominal amount of their capital by converting various classes of stock, preference and ordinary, into stocks of a larger amount bearing a correspondingly lower rate of interest. This court thought, and the House of Lords thought also, that, though nothing had been added to the working capital of the company, the company came under an obligation to pay duty on "an increase of the amount of the nominal share capital" of the company under section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891. In the present case, by the carrying out of the arrangement authorized by the company's private Act, stock has come into the hands of persons who did not hold that stock before, and it seems to me that the company did propose to issue loan capital, and have therefore come under the obligation to pay duty under section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899. I cannot agree with the judgment of Ridley, J. The Crown waiving the penalties, there will be judgment for the Crown for duty and interest.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Dec. 11.

In re CLARK'S ESTATE.
MCKECHNIE v. CLARK. (a.)

Will — Construction — Personalty — Local situation — Bequests of property in United Kingdom and in South Africa—Separate trusts and trustees—South African debtors by specialty and simple contract—Shares in South African companies transferable both there and in London—Certificates at London bank.

For the purpose of construing a will which disposes of "personalty in the United Kingdom" in one way, and "personalty in South Africa" in another way, the debts owing to testator, whether on simple contract or by specialty, are to be considered as locally situated where the debtors are, the distinction made between simple contract and specialty debts in relation to probate duty not holding good in questions of construction.

In construing such a will, shares in companies constituted according to the law of a South African state, but having offices both there and in London, in either of which places transfers can be registered and certificates issued, are to be considered as locally situated in that one of the two countries in which the share certificates are kept at the date of testator's death.

Originating summons by an executor for the determination of questions as to the construction of a will.

By his will dated in 1890, William Gordon Clark, after giving certain pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed all his real estate in the United Kingdom, and all the residue of his personal estate and effects whatsoever within the United Kingdom (all which real estate and the residue of personal estate he thereinafter included in the expression "residuary estate") to his wife, his son Douglas, and the plaintiff, Donald McKechnie the elder, whom he thereinafter called his home trustees, upon certain trusts for the benefit (in the events which happened) of his wife, his two sons Douglas and Colin, and his daughter; and he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal property, estate, and effects in Natal, the Orange Free State, and elsewhere in South Africa to his said son Douglas and his friends N. M. McKechnie and Donald McKechnie the younger (who were thereinafter referred to as his foreign trustees) in trust for his said two sons.

The two trusts were distinct the one from the other.

The will conferred powers of sale on the foreign trustees with regard to the South African property, and the testator declared that their receipts for any moneys, stocks, funds, shares, or securities which should be paid or transferred to them by virtue of that his will should effectually discharge the persons paying or transferring the same from liability to see to the application thereof; and that his home trustees should not be bound to see to or inquire into any matters relating to the sale, collection, getting in, and conversion of any of his said property in South Africa, but that his foreign trustees should exclusively be responsible therefor. The persons named as executors were the same at those called home trustees.

The testator died in 1902, domiciled in England and possessed of considerable personal property, as to which the doubt arose whether it was included in the gift of residue of personal estate and effects within the United Kingdom or in the gift of personal property, estate and effects in South Africa; and a declaration on this point, as also on the question out of which property the funeral and testamentary expenses and pecuniary legacies were to be paid, was sought by the present summons, which was taken out by Donald McKechnie the elder, one of the executors, the beneficiaries under the respective trusts being made defendants.

Of the property mentioned in the summons a decision was ultimately required in regard to the following items only: Debts by simple contract due to the testator in respect of his London mercantile business from persons carrying on trade in South Africa: Specialty debts, being bonds of the Port Elizabeth Waterworks Co.: Shares in gold mining and other companies constituted under the laws of the late South African Republic, and having their directors and principal offices in the Transvaal, though they had offices in London, where transfers could also be registered and certificates issued. The shares were bought on the London Stock Exchange. The above-named bonds, which were payable to bearer, and the certificates for the said shares, were all, at the date of the testator's death, deposited with his London bankers.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mark Romer, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C. (Clayton with him), for the defendant Mrs. Clark (the widow) and her infant daughter (beneficiaries under the home trust), cited Attorney-General v. Bouwens, 4 M. & W. 171; Attorney-General v. Dimond, 1 Cr. & Jer. 356; Stern v. The Queen, 44 W. R. 302, [1896] 1 Q. B. 211; Attorney-General v. Hope, 1 C. M. & R. 530; Guthrie v. Walrond, 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 573.

Jenkins, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the testator's sons (beneficiaries under the foreign trust), cited Nisbett v. Murray, 5 Ves. 149; Attorney-General v. Higgins, 22 H. & N. 339, 5 W. R. Dig. 227; In the Goods of Wm. Ewing, deceased, 6 Prob. D. 19; Arnold v. Arnold, 2 M. & K. 365; Tyrone v. Waterford, 8 W. R. 454, 1 D. F. & J. 613, 628.

FARWELL, J.—This testator has unfortunately used words which give rise to a great deal of difficulty: "I devise and bequeath all my real estate in the United Kingdom and all the residue of my personal estate and effects whatsoever in the United Kingdom (all of which real estate and residuary personal estate is hereinafter included in the expression where hereinafter used of 'my residuary estate') unto"—and then he mentions three persons whom he calls his "home trustees." He then proceeds: "I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal property, estate, and effects in Natal and the Orange Free State and elsewhere in South Africa"—in another way, and he appoints certain "foreign trustees" for that purpose. Then this declaration is relied on: "And I declare that the receipts of my foreign trustees for any moneys, stocks, funds, shares, or securities which shall be paid or transferred to them by virtue of this my will shall effectually discharge the persons paying or transferring the same from liability to see to the application thereof, and that my home trustees shall not be bound to see to or inquire into any matters relating to the sale, collection, getting in, and conversion of any of my said property in South Africa, but that my foreign trustees shall exclusively be responsible therefor"—and then there is an appointment, as executors, of the home trustees only.

Now, the testator had, amongst other property, bonds of the Port Elizabeth Waterworks Co. (numbered 33 in the schedule to the summons), and it is only those bonds, and certain shares to be mentioned presently, that I have to deal with now, the other items having been disposed of in the course of the argument.

With regard to the bonds, it is conceded that if they were simple contract debts the rule is, in construing a will, that the debts, so far as they can have a locality at all, are to be considered to be located where the debtor is, and I do not see, for this purpose, any ground for drawing a distinction between a bond and a simple contract debt. For fiscal purposes no doubt a distinction may be drawn between the two, but there does not appear to be any reference to the construction of the will on that point in the case of Guthrie v. Walrond, 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 573, and it appears that Fry, J., did not intend to draw any distinction, or that there was any distinction drawn for this purpose; but that so far as there was any locality in question it was merely where to sue the debtor.

Then there is this question, which I feel considerable difficulty about. The testator was possessed of shares in a number of South African companies, i.e., companies constituted according to the law of the Transvaal or of the Orange Free State. Those companies all have offices in London as well as in South Africa, with boards of directors and officers for the purpose of conducting the business and the issue of shares and certificates here, as well as in South Africa. So far as regards any locality or situation of the shares, it is impossible to say whether South Africa or England has the greater claim to be regarded as a guide to the court as to what the testator meant by the words he used. I am asked to construe the will, really, as if the words were not "my real and personal estate in the Orange Free State and elsewhere . . . " but as if they were "all my real and personal estate and shares in the companies situated" there, but that is not what the words cover. I have got to find out the locality of the personal estate, whether English or South African. The first thing I have to deal with is a share, an impalpable thing, represented by a certificate, without which no transfer can take place. The actual active transfer can be done equally effectually in South Africa as in England, and the only conceivable distinction I can see in any shares so far as regards the point of locality is the possession of the certificate which, for this purpose, is essential to complete the title to the shares. So far as I can see that is the only thing I have to go on. There is no distinction between the locality of shares in this country, and therefore I hold, so far as the certificates of the shares in these companies were in England, where the companies have offices in London and power of transfer as well as in South Africa, that they pass under the gift of property situated in England, and not in South Africa. There will be a declaration that the simple contract and bond debts due from South African debtors are part of the South African property, but that the shares in South African companies which are transferable both here and in South Africa, and of which the certificates are in London, are English property. As to the other question, the testator's funeral and testamentary expenses and the pecuniary legacies, and also his debts (as to which last the will contains no directions for payment) must be paid out of the English property—the use of the word "residue" being, in my opinion, an indication of such intention. The costs, as Mr. Jenkins does not press his objection, will be borne in moieties by the two funds.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors, Minet, Harvie, May, & Co., for plaintiff and for the beneficiaries under the foreign trust; Vanderpump, Son, & Wood, for beneficiaries under the home trust.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 3.
Buckley, J. }

In re BAKER (DECEASED).
BAKER v. BAKER. (a.)

Will—Forfeiture—Construction—"Become payable"—Equitable charge—Cancellation of charge.

B., being entitled under a will to a life interest in a share of the testator's estate, executed a document charging his interest with the repayment to the lenders of a sum advanced. The will contained a clause that B. should not have power to dispose of his share by way of anticipation, and that if he did anything whereby his share, or any part therof, "would become payable to or vested in some other person," it was to go to his son. Upon becoming aware of the forfeiture clause, and before any payment of capital or interest had been made by B., under the charge, B., and the lenders cancelled it.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that some part of B.'s share became payable to other persons immediately upon the execution of the charge; that the forfeiture took effect, and that the subsequent cancellation made no difference.

George Baker, by his will made in September, 1896, gave his residuary estate to his trustee upon trust to pay one-fourth shares to a daughter and to a son Walter for life, and another such share to another son Arthur, and the remaining one-fourth share to his son Henry during his life, and after Henry's decease upon certain trusts in favour of his wife and children as therein mentioned. And on the death of either the testator's daughter or son Walter their shares were to be added to the shares of Arthur and Henry. After these dispositions, the will continued as follows: "Provided always, and I hereby declare that neither my daughter, or my son Walter or Henrys shall have power to dispose of their share or any part thereof by way of anticipation, and in the event of either of my two sons becoming bankrupt or doing anything whereby their said share or some part thereof would become payable or vested in some other person (whichever of the said events shall first happen), then I direct that the share of such son shall be payable to his son during his life."

The testator died in November, 1896, and Walter Baker, his son, died in 1897.

An action was commenced in 1898 to administer the estate, and in 1899 the usual judgment was given.

In February, 1903, Henry Baker borrowed £4 10s. and signed the following document addressed to the lenders: "In consideration of your advancing to me this day the sum of £4 10s. (four pounds ten shillings) I hereby charge all my interest in the estate of my late father, George Baker, with the repayment to you of the said sum with interest thereon until repayment, at the rate of five pounds per cent. per annum."

In March, 1903, he borrowed of the same persons a further sum of £15, and signed another document addressed to them as follows: "In consideration of your advancing to me this day the sum of £15 (fifteen pounds sterling), I hereby charge all my share, estate, and interest, after the rate of five pounds per centum per annum in the estate of my late father, George Baker, with the repayment to you of the sum of twenty pounds on the 24th of September, 1903, and with interest after the rate of five pounds per centum per annum on the sum of twenty pounds after the 24th day of September, 1903, until the day of repayment."

Evidence was given that at the time of signing the above documents Henry Baker had forgotten the fact of the forfeiture clause in the will. Upon his attention being called to it, on the 21st and 24th of July, 1903, respectively, before any payments of interest or capital had been made or anything had been done, under the documents of charge, he and the lenders cancelled them.

The present summons came on with the further consideration of the action, and was taken out in the action to have it determined whether in consequence of the above documents of charge Henry Baker's share and interest in the estate of the testator had become forfeited.

A. H. Jessel, for Henry Baker and the trustees.—The interest of Henry Baker did not become either "payable to or vested in" the mortgagees. The words of the clause are not "might" but "would" become payable; "would" means "will": Ex parte Dawes, as decided by Cave, J., 17 Q. B. D. 275, 282, the case being decided by the Court of Appeal on another point. But even if the memorandums of charge would otherwise have offended against the clause, the forfeiture was prevented by the cancellation (Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280; In re Loftus-Otway, 43 W. R. 501, [1895] 2 Ch. 235), as nothing ever became actually due and payable to the mortgagees. Seymour v. Lucas, 8 W. R. 599, 1 Dr. & Sm. 177, is also in favour of this view. In the case of Hurst v. Hurst, 31 W. R. 327, 21 Ch. D. 278, there was a gift over upon the property being "charged," which is not the case here.

Wrangham, for the children of Henry Baker.

BUCKLEY, J.—The will states that Henry Baker shall not have power to dispose of his share or any part thereof by way of anticipation. It is true that there is no gift over in so many words upon that event, and that a man cannot be restrained from anticipation without a gift over; but I think those words have some bearing upon the construction of the clause. The question is whether a forfeiture has been incurred. I think that it has. The thing we have to ascertain is whether there was a moment when Henry Baker gave someone else a right to receive part of his share. In my opinion, at the moment when, in February and March respectively, he executed these charges, he gave to the mortgagees a right to receive in payment of their advances parts of his share. Mr. Jessel has been driven to argue the case as if the language of the clause had been become payable "in any event." If that view were right, then even if Henry Baker had assigned his share absolutely, yet it might not have caused a forfeiture if the share had been reassigned to him before any moneys became payable from the estate in respect of it. That would be an extravagant contention. The right to receive part of the share having been once given, the fact that the persons to whom the right was given subsequently released it had no effect upon the question, and I hold that the clause of forfeiture took effect.

Solicitors, Aird, Hood, & Co.; Robert J. Clark.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wright, Kennedy, Darling, and Phillimore, JJ.) — Nov. 27.

REX v. TURNER. (a.)

Criminal law — Undischarged bankrupt — Obtaining credit to extent of £20 or upwards—Misdemeanour—Maximum punishment—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), ss. 11, 13, 14—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 31.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 31, it is provided that "Where an undischarged bankrupt, who has been adjudged bankrupt under this Act, obtains credit to the extent of £20 or upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, and the provisions of that Act shall apply to proceedings under this section."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the maximum punishment for an offence under the above section is imprisonment with hard labour for one year, as the section refers to the class of misdemeanours mentioned in section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and not to the class mentioned in section 11 of that Act.

Case stated for the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

This was a case stated by F. A. Bosanquet, K.C., Common Serjeant of London.

The prisoner was tried and convicted before the learned judge on an indictment under section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52) for obtaining credit exceeding £20 without disclosing that he was an undischarged bankrupt. That section provides that a person committing such an offence may be punished as if guilty of a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62).

Section 11 of the Debtors' Act specifies a number of acts for which a person adjudged bankrupt is liable to be imprisoned with hard labour for any time not exceeding two years.

Section 13 specifies certain cases in which any person on conviction thereof shall be guilty of a misdemeanour for which he is made liable to be imprisoned with hard labour for a period not exceeding one year.

The learned judge sentenced the prisoner to be imprisoned with hard labour for fifteen months subject to the question whether he was liable to be punished as if guilty of a misdemeanour under section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869. If the prisoner was only liable to be punished under section 13 the sentence was to be reduced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that: "Where an undischarged bankrupt who has been adjudged bankrupt under this Act obtains credit to the amount of twenty pounds and upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, and provisions of that Act shall apply to proceedings under this section."

E. F. Lever, for the prisoner.—Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does not refer to misdemeanours mentioned in section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, but to a misdemeanour of the class mentioned in section 13, the maximum punishment for which is one year's imprisonment with hard labour. The Common Serjeant was therefore wrong in sentencing the prisoner for a longer period than one year.

He referred to Reg. v. Dyson, 42 W. R. 526, [1894] 2 Q. B. 176.

Guy Stephenson, for the prosecution.—The Common Serjeant was entitled to pass a sentence of fifteen months' imprisonment upon the prisoner. The offences provided for in section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, are cognate offences to those provided for in section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The former section deals with "any person adjudged bankrupt," and the latter section with a person "who has been adjudged bankrupt." Section 11 deals with offences committed only by a bankrupt, whilst section 13 deals with offences committed by "any person," whether he has been adjudged bankrupt or not.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the prisoner was indicted and convicted under section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that an undischarged bankrupt convicted thereunder "may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869." There is nothing on the face of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to show to which of the sections of the Act of 1869 it refers, but when you look at the three sections, 11, 13 and 14 of the latter Act, it seems to me that there is an indication that the lesser punishment is the right one. If there is nothing to guide one, the general rule is that the lesser punishment ought to be taken as the right one. I think, though, that there is here something to guide one. Section 11 of the Act of 1869 deals with specific offences in the actual conduct of the bankruptcy. Section 13 deals with the case of a person who, in incurring any debt or liability, has obtained credit under false pretences, or by means of any other fraud. Section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, makes the offence a misdemeanor, even though there is no intent to defraud, because the mere non-disclosure of the bankruptcy constitutes the offence. In my opinion this section is very kindred to section 13 of the Act of 1869. I think, by reference to the class of offence, section 13 is much more analogous to section 31 than section 11 is, and that the prisoner was only liable to a maximum punishment of twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. The sentence, therefore, must be reduced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitor for the prisoner, H. R. Newson.

Solicitor for the prosecution, Solicitor to the Treasury.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 9, 17, 1903.

REX v. PARKE. (a.)

Contempt of court—Practice—Offence triable at assizes only—Power of High Court to commit for contempt—Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 16, 29.

Where preliminary proceedings having been begun in a petty sessions court for an offence which was only triable at assizes, and before the person charged was committed for trial, there was published comment in a newspaper tending to interfere with the fair trial of the charge, it is within the power of the High Court to commit the publisher for a contempt of court, the assize court being by sections 16 and 29 of the Judicature Act, 1873, constituted a part of the High Court.

This was the hearing of a rule nisi calling upon S. H. Parke to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court.

The facts of the case and the arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Danckwerts, K.C., and C. W. Mathews, showed cause against the rule.

Lush, K.C., and Randolph, in support of the rule.

WILLS, J., read the judgment of the court, which was to the following effect: One S. H. Dougal was, on the 19th of March, brought up before the Saffron Walden Petty Sessions charged with forgery, and remanded without any evidence being taken. He was again brought up on the 2nd of April, and remanded, after some evidence, till the 8th of April. Articles appeared in the Star newspaper, of which the defendant is the editor, on the 19th, 20th, 21st, 23rd, 24th, 26th, and 27th of March, some of which contained statements undoubtedly very much to the disadvantage of Dougal. To take one instance only. In the issue of the 20th of March, before any evidence had been given in the case, it was stated that on the 27th of January an affiliation order had been made against him; that a remarkable story of immorality had been disclosed; that he had admitted a conviction for forgery in December, 1895, and that he had been sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. It is unnecessary to go through the various articles complained of, but they were unquestionably calculated to produce the impression that, apart from the charges then under inquiry, he was a man of bad and dissolute character.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 7th of April the rule now under consideration was granted by this court calling on the defendant to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court. After many subsequent hearings Dougal was committed for trial to the Essex Assizes on charges of forgery and murder. True bills were found in respect of all the charges. The only indictment actually tried was for murder, and, as the prisoner was convicted, the others were not proceeded with.

The important question has been raised whether the High Court has jurisdiction in such a case; and it has been argued by Mr. Danckwerts, on behalf of the defendant, that there can be no such jurisdiction, because at the time of the publication of the articles complained of there was no proceeding actually pending in any court but the petty sessional court; that the jurisdiction to punish the publishers of articles of this kind is confined to cases in which at the moment of publication there is some cause actually depending in the High Court, and that the High Court cannot deal by way of attachment for contempt with interferences with the due course of justice in any court other than itself.

It may be conceded that the jurisdiction to commit for contempt of court is confined to contempt of the court exercising the jurisdiction. Upon the wider and more general question whether this court will treat in this fashion inroads upon the independence of inferior courts we propose to say a few words towards the close of this judgment. As far as the present case is concerned, it does not seem to us to arise. By the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 16 and 29, the court of a commission of assize is made a branch of the High Court. The crime of forgery of which Dougal was accused, a forgery cognizable for the purposes of the petty sessional inquiry at Saffron Walden, could not in the regular course of things be tried anywhere but at the Essex Assizes, and therefore, if a committal should take place at all, it must be to those assizes.

It has been argued that publication of articles of the kind in question cannot be treated as contempt of the assize court unless the committal has taken place or a bill been found, for then only (it is urged) is there a case pending in the assize court, and then (it is also urged) the jurisdiction ought to be exercised by that court itself. A moment's consideration, it seems to us, is sufficient to dispose of such a proposition. The reason why the publication of articles like those in this case is treated as a contempt of court is because their tendency, and sometimes their object, is to deprive the court of the power of doing that which is the end for which it exists—viz., to administer justice duly, impartially, and with reference solely to the facts judicially brought before it. Their tendency is to reduce the court which has to try the case to impotence, so far as the effectual elimination of prejudice and prepossession is concerned. It is difficult to conceive an apter description of such conduct than is conveyed by the expression "contempt of court." If it be once granted that such is the nature of the offence, what possible difference can it make whether the particular court, which is thus sought to be deprived of its independence and its power of effecting the great end for which it is created, be at that moment in session or even actually constituted or not? It is perfectly certain that by law it will and must be constituted, and that when constiuted it and it alone can take cognizance of the particular offence which is the subject of the preliminary inquiry. The wrong can hardly be the less because the purpose or tendency of the act complained of is that the assize court never shall have undisturbed power to fulfil its functions satisfactorily. The High Court exists always. To so act beforehand that one of its branches—which, although it does not at the moment exist, yet must according to the immemorial custom, and now also by statutes and rules having the same effect, come into existence—shall be hampered and hindered in the effectual discharge of its duties as soon as it is constituted, if called upon to try a particular case which it is, at all events, proposed to bring into that court, is surely an offence against the High Court itself. Looking, therefore, to the principles upon which this jurisdiction rests, and to the mischief to prevent which it exists, we can have no doubt that it is properly invoked in the present case. Great stress has been laid by Mr. Danckwerts upon an expression which has been used in judgments upon questions of this kind, that the remedy exists where there is a cause pending in the court. We think undue importance has been attached to it. It has been the fact in very nearly all the cases that there has been a cause actually begun, but the expression, quite natural under the circumstances, accentuates the fact, not that it has been begun, but that it is not at an end. That is the cardinal consideration. It is possible to poison the fountain of justice before it begins to flow. It is not possible to do so when the stream has ceased.

We proceed shortly to notice the authorities upon which reliance has been placed and which we have been able to obtain from the Crown Office. It will be observed that they are almost all of quite recent date. That is what might be expected. Before the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, the publication of proceedings before magistrates preliminary to committal was of doubtful legality: see note to Rex v. Fisher, 2 Camp. 563, in 11 Revised Reports 799, from which it appears that doubts had begun to be cast upon the older doctrine as early as 1858. It was considered, at least until 1858, that the inevitable tendency of such publication was to have the case tried in the minds of persons who might be jurors, before they came into court: Rex v. Fisher, 2 Camp. 563; Rex v. Lee, 5 Esp. 123. Since that time, till after 1888, only one case is recorded in which the publication of such reports or of extraneous matters connected with them has been brought under the notice of the courts. Modern journalism, with its ceaseless thirst for matter which may interest its readers, is a thing of very recent growth; and when the publication of the preliminary proceedings was unlawful or of doubtful legality, not only was the occasion wanting for the publication of many things which since that Act have given rise to complaint, but the unlawfulness of the publication of the proceedings was a standing warning to editors and publishers which was not likely to be overlooked. The only old authority that has been cited to us (apart from those which have been spoken of as dealing with cases actually pending in court) is Rex v. Burchett, 1 Strange 567, in which it is said that the Court of King's Bench never interferes with contempts of inferior courts. That case is an authority so far as it goes, rather upon the question of the general jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench in its character as the superintending authority over inferior courts, than upon the question we are dealing with; and the circumstances of that case are such that, except for the general proposition stated, it can have little bearing upon any question likely to arise in any other case.

We come, therefore, at once to the somewhat numerous series of cases which have arisen in quite modern times. The earliest is reported in 2 Times L. R. 351, heard in 1886 before Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., and Hawkins, J. Certain persons had been summoned to appear at Bow-street on the 13th of February, 1886, on a charge of inciting to riot. The proceedings were adjourned and pending the adjournment Punch published a woodcut and letterpress headed "Sneaking Sedition"; a rule was applied for to call upon the printer and publisher of Punch to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court. The Court of Queen's Bench refused the rule, Lord Coleridge saying (as reported) that he had never heard it even suggested that this court could imprison a man for "contempt of court committed in another place"—an obviously incorrect expression not at all likely to have been used by Lord Coleridge. The case was within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court and the trial of the persons summoned took place there. The fact that the Central Criminal Court had become by virtue of the Judicature Act of 1873, ss. 16 and 29, a branch of the High Court was not called to the attention of the court.

The next case in order of time was Ex parte Hermann. The applicant had been brought before the police-court at Marlborough-street with a view to her committal to the Central Criminal Court on a charge of murder. The People newspaper on the 1st of April, 1894, contained a statement that she had been tried and acquitted in 1890 on a similar charge and contained a fairly accurate account of what had happened on that occasion when the Common Serjeant had held that there was no evidence against her. An application to commit the editor and publisher of the People was heard before Wright and Collins, JJ. The question of jurisdiction was raised but not insisted upon, and the matter was allowed to drop on the defendants undertaking to pay the costs of the application. The case is reported only in the newspapers of the day under the name of Rex v. Armstrong (see The Times of 9th May, 1894). We have had the papers in the Crown Office looked up and the above statement of facts may be relied upon. Mr. Danckwerts has satisfied us that the Central Criminal Court stands upon precisely the same footing for the present purpose as the assize courts, but that fact does not appear to have been brought to the notice of the court. Wright, J., is reported to have said that although he could find no case in point, he should hesitate long before coming to the conclusion that this court had no jurisdiction in such a case.

The next case was in January, 1895, when a rule was made absolute against one Stead and others. One of the defendants was fined, but as in that instance an indictment had already been removed by certiorari into the King's Bench it has no hearing upon the present discussion: R. v. Stead, [1896] 11 Times L. R. 492.

Equally little relevance has the case of Reg. v. Payne, [1896] 1 Q. B. 577, in March, 1896, when a rule granted against the editor and publisher of the Huntingdonshire Post for comments on a case under committal was discharged on the merits—no question having been raised as to the jurisdiction.

On the 21st of December, 1895, Wills and Wright, JJ., refused a rule in respect of comments in a newspaper on a case of one Crane who had been committed to the Central Criminal Court, on the ground on want of jurisdiction. In this case also it was not called to the attention of the court that the judges at the Central Criminal Court sat under commissions identical with those which constitute the assize courts, and it was assumed that they sat under the Act of 1834 by which the Central Criminal Court was established (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 36) and not under the commissions required by that Act: see Law Journal newspaper, 4th January, 1896.

In May, 1896, a rule was refused on the merits in respect of comments on a case in which two persons named Milsom and Fowler, who had been committed to the Central Criminal Court on a charge of murder. No question as to the jurisdiction was raised.

In January, 1897, Wright and Bruce, JJ., granted a rule in respect of an article in the Brecon and Radnor County Times upon the case of one Williams who stood committed for trial to the assizes. The same judges in the same term allowed the rule to be discharged on the defendants undertaking to pay the costs of the applicant as between solicitor and client. The question of jurisdiction does not seem to have been raised: Reg. v. Felgate, 19th January, 1897.

On the 26th of January, 1897, a rule was refused by Wright and Bruce, JJ., against the same defendants for an article in the same paper. It is not reported, but there can be no doubt that it was refused on the merits and not on any question of jurisdiction.

On the 28th of April, 1899, this court then consisting of Lord Russell, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ., granted a rule for comments on a case of one Mary Ann Ansell, who had been committed to the Hertfordshire Assizes on a charge of murder. The rule, however, was for some reason, which we cannot trace, not drawn up. Probably, as in the late case of Rex v. Newton, it was supposed to be a matter between the parties only and was compromised without the leave of the court.

We are informed that there may have been other cases on the civil side of the court of which there is no record in the Crown Office. If it is so, they would probably be cases in which comments had been made affecting proceedings in matters pending on the civil side, and, if so, would afford no assistance in the present discussion.

It will thus be seen that there have been only two cases in which the question of jurisdiction was effectively raised—in each instance with respect to cases which, if tried at all, would have been tried at the Central Criminal Court. In both cases the court assumed that the Central Criminal Court was a separate and independent court with which this court had nothing to do. We think that view is erroneous, for the reasons given by Mr. Danckwerts, and which we adopt. In neither case was there any serious argument on the subject of jurisdiction, and we think, therefore, that very little assistance can be gathered from the string of cases which have just been mentioned, or from the case in 1 Strange. For what they are worth they tell rather against than for the general jurisdiction of this court to protect inferior courts from attacks of this kind on their independence and usefulness.

On the other hand, very serious and important considerations tend the other way. Many inferior tribunals are not courts of record, and therefore have no means of checking practices of the kind with which we are dealing. Many of them sit only at long intervals, and before they can do anything to interfere with such offences against public justice, all the mischief possible may have been effectually done. This court exercises a vigilant watch over the proceedings of inferior courts, and successfully prevents them from usurping powers which they do not possess or otherwise acting contrary to law. It would seem almost a natural corollary that it should possess correlative powers of guarding them against unlawful attacks and interferences with their independence on the part of others. It is said with respect to them, as has been said with respect to the present case, that there is a remedy by criminal information or indictment. The latter is unsatisfactory on account of the necessary delay; though it has been made use of (see Rex v. Fisher, 2 Camp. 563, anno 1811) where the defendant had published in a paper called the Day a sensational report of the statements made before a magistrate previous to committing a prisoner for trial at the Admiralty Sessions or in the Court of King's Bench, as the parties might think fit. Criminal information is cumbrous and is also liable to great delay. It has no doubt been occasionally resorted to, as in the case of Rex v. Williams, 2 L. J. (O. S.) K. B. 30 (November, 1823), where John Thurtell had been committed to the assizes on a charge of murder, and a theatrical exhibition was held by the court to be calculated to interfere with the fair trial of his case; in Rex v. Lee, 5 Esp. 123 (anno 1804), where the defendants had published a statement of the contents of depositions taken before the magistrate on a charge of murder; and in Rex v. Fleet, 1 B. & Ald. 379 (anno 1818), where the defendant had published the evidence given before a coroner's jury with comments unfavourable to a party accused of murder: see also Reg. v. Gray, 10 Cox 184 (1865), an important Irish case. In England no case of a criminal information for a matter of this kind is to be found in the books since Rex v. Williams, cited above, in 1823. There are, however, serious objections to the proceeding by way of criminal information. Apart from those which had been pointed out before, it is usual in cases of criminal information for the court to be satisfied that the applicant is a person to whom the privilege of filing an information in the name of the Attorney-General may safely and properly be granted, and although this condition has been dispensed with in the cases above mentioned, the court ought to be chary of departing from so wholesome a rule.

On the other hand there are not wanting expressions in the books which point in the other direction. The jurisdiction, as has been shown, has been actually exercised whether per incuriam or rightly in several of the cases cited. The Court of King's Bench is one to which every criminal case which may be the subject of indictment is liable upon proper material to be removed. One frequent ground of removal is that prejudice exists in the natural locality of trial, and it may well be that it has a direct interest and duty in repressing practices whose influence for evil would extend though perhaps in a less measure to itself should it be called upon to try a case removed from another court. But we purposely abstain from pronouncing any opinion upon this general question, and prefer to leave it entirely open when the occasion shall arise, and at the present moment confine ourselves to saying with Wright, J., that we should hestitate long before casting any more doubt than may already exist upon the capacity of this court to deal by proceedings for contempt with cases in which attempts are made to pollute the stream of justice, and to interfere with its proper and unfettered administration by courts which possess no adequate means of protecting themselves in this respect.

In the particular instance before us it appears that Mr. Parke was not himself the author of the articles complained of, nor was he aware that they had been written or were about to be published. His superintendence, however, must have been of a very lax and perfunctory character, as the articles were published in no less than seven issues of his paper extending from the 19th to the 27th of March, both days inclusive; and as the first of the series was one which grossly transcended all possible limits of propriety in such matters, and transcended them in a peculiarly mischievous fashion by stating a number of facts extremely damaging to the prisoner which could never be given in evidence against him on his trial, and upon the publication of which any reasonable sense of justice would have induced the editor to take serious notice of with regard to his subordinate, he cannot be acquitted of great negligence in allowing such violations of the law to be repeated time after time, and we think he ought to pay a substantial fine, which we fix at £50. And our order is that he pay that sum as fine and that he be imprisoned in the custody of the court in Brixton Gaol until the fine be paid. We make no order as to costs, as looking to the matters brought to our notice in the application recently heard against the solicitor who took the present proceedings we can hardly doubt that the real object of the motion was to obtain for Dougal a sum of money by way of compromise—an abuse of the process of this court to which we feel bound to put a stop.

Rule absolute.

Solicitor for complainant, Arthur Newton.

Solicitors for defendant, Lewis & Lewis.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 7, 1903.

SMITH v. SIBRAY, HALL, & CO. (a.)

Factory—Overtime—Part of factory in which overtime employment allowed—"Warehouse not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), s. 49, Schedule II., clause 4.

By Schedule II., clause 4, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, overtime is allowed in "any part of a factory (whether textile or non-textile) or workshop which is a warehouse not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, and in which persons are solely employed in polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up goods."

A part of a factory which is used at any time during ordinary hours for a manufacturing process or handicraft is not a "warehouse" in which overtime is allowed within the meaning of the above clause, and persons may not be employed in overtime therein, even though no manufacturing process or handicraft is being carried on therein during such overtime.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the City of Sheffield.

The complainant, the appellant, was an Inspector of Factories and Workshops.

Two complaints were laid against the defendants, the respondents, as to two women, Wood and Colley.

One of the complaints or informations alleged that on Friday, the 19th of December, 1902, the respondents, Messrs. Sibray, Hall & Co. (Limited), were occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in the City of Sheffield, and that on the said date a woman named Wood was employed after eight o'clock in the evening contrary to the provisions of the said Act.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The other information was in the same terms as to Colley.

The two complaints were heard on the 16th of January, 1903. They were founded on certain provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The respondents were on the date and at the place alleged the occupiers of a factory. The factory was used for the manufacture of silver and silver plate. They were engaged almost entirely in the manufacture of silver work, and manufactured electro-plated goods only upon special orders, and their work upon electro-plated goods was not more 2½ per cent. of their total work.

At the hearing it was proved that on the 19th of December, 1902, two factory inspectors visited the respondents' works or factory at about 9 p.m., and found Wood and Colley at work there along with some other women, as to whom no complaints were made. It was complained that these two women were at work on a vase and lid, one of them on the vase and the other on the lid, and that each of them was burnishing, because each was using a small hand tool, which seemed to be a burnishing tool, and they appeared to the inspectors to be burnishing, and the cup and the lid looked to them as if they had been burnished.

Another small hand tool called a picking tool appeared to have also been in use by them, for the purpose of picking off dirt from the object they were working on.

In this case ordinary time was one of the times mentioned in section 26 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, that is, 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., or 7 a.m. to 7 p.m., or 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., except for Saturdays.

The ordinary time in the respondents' factory was 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. at the time when the complaints arose.

The two women gave evidence, as also the company's secretary, and a manager and two manufacturers who had large works.

The use then being made of the tools appeared to have been partly in picking bits of dirt out and partly in saving cruel work for the fingers in rubbing.

It appeared that by some persons all processes up to the wrapping and packing are called manufacturing processes or handicrafts, so that all cleanings and polishings would be so called by some; though all do not appear to be looked on as such processes or handicrafts in Schedule II. (4) of the Factory Act, 1901.

It also appeared that the room in which the two women were at work was known as the warehouse or warehouse department of the works, and that burnishers usually worked in it, though not after 8 p.m., and not on the evening as to which the complaints were made.

It was contended by the appellant that, inasmuch as women were from time to time employed in that part of the factory up to eight o'clock in the evening in the manufacturing process of burnishing and not solely in polishing, cleaning, wrapping or packing up goods, that part of the factory was not a warehouse within Schedule II., clause 4.

The second schedule to the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, is as follows: "Factories and workshops in which overtime is allowed: (4) Any part of a factory (whether textile or non-textile) or workshop which is a warehouse not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, and in which persons are solely employed in polishing, cleaning, wrapping or packing up goods."

The learned magistrate came to the conclusion that burnishings done in silversmiths' factories and all such like burnishings in non-textile factories in ordinary time were excluded by Schedule II. (4) of the Act from the processes allowed by it in its overtime; but he was of opinion that when the burnishings, though carried on in the warehouse or warehouse department, were carried on there in ordinary time only, and not in Schedule II. (4) overtime, the two times must be looked at separately, and that the carrying them on there in ordinary time did not prevent the warehouse or warehouse department from being within the meaning of Schedule II. (4) a place where overtime might be worked, as being a place "not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft," because the persons then using such warehouse were solely employed in polishing, cleaning, wrapping or packing up goods. He therefore dismissed the summonses.

The question for the opinion of the court was as follows: "If the court is of opinion that the burnishing which was done in the defendants' factory or warehouse in ordinary time was a polishing or cleaning allowable for Schedule II. (4) overtime; or if the court is of opinion that it was not allowable but did not affect the Schedule II. (4) overtime, because it was done in ordinary time only, the two complaints are to stand dismissed on the ground that the offence complained of has not been committed. If the court is of opinion that the burnishing was not allowable for Schedule II. (4) overtime, and that doing it in ordinary time where the Schedule II. (4) overtime was done affected the working done there in Schedule II. (4) overtime, although it had been done in ordinary time only and was not done when the Schedule II. (4) overtime was being done, the dismissal on the ground that no offence was thereby committed is to be held erroneous in point of law, and the offence charged is to be held to have been committed, and the two complaints are to stand dismissed on the ground that the offence charged has been committed, but they have been dismissed on these particular accounts without convictions under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879."

H. Sutton, for the appellant.—The magistrate was wrong. The words "not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft" mean not used at any time at all for any manufacturing process or handicraft; they must not be taken to mean not being used for any manufacturing process or handicraft at the time the overtime work is being done. Burnishing is a manufacturing process, and if it is carried on in the ordinary business hours, that part of the factory where it is so carried on cannot possibly be said to be a "warehouse not used for any manufacturing process" within the meaning of Schedule II. (4), and overtime cannot be allowed in it for any purpose whatever. If persons are employed therein at any time in any other operation than "polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up goods" it is not a warehouse within the clause. The intention of the Legislature was to limit not only the time of the employment, but also the place in which the employment is carried on. To hold otherwise would enable persons engaged in manufacturing processes easily to evade detection by an inspector when carrying on their manufacturing process during overtime.

J. A. Slater, for the respondents.—The decision of the magistrate was right. Assuming "burnishing" to be a "manufacturing process," this room was a place where packing up could be properly carried on in overtime. Clause 4 is somewhat ambiguous, and it was open to the learned magistrate to find as he has done. The Legislature intended to say that if the room is not at the time being used for a manufacturing process or handicraft, then overtime work may be carried on therein. The words "not used" mean not used for the purpose of any manufacturing process or handicraft at the time the "polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up goods" is going on. To hold otherwise would make it impossible for anyone who carried on a manufacturing process in a single room, ever to carry on any overtime employment.

H. Sutton replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — I think that the decision of the learned magistrate was wrong, and that the case must be remitted to him. It is not necessary, I think, to define exactly what overtime means. There are two views. It may mean any employment of a woman between eight o'clock and ten o'clock at night, or it may mean the employment of a woman who has already on the same day worked twelve hours. In this case it is admitted that the only justification for employing these women at the time of the inspector's visit was that they were employed in overtime as contemplated by the Act. Now, overtime is allowed by section 49 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in the non-textile factories and workshops and warehouses specified in the second schedule to the Act. That schedule, after enumerating a number of non-textile factories and workshops in which overtime is allowed, proceeds in clause 4 as follows: "Any part of a factory (whether textile or non-textile) or workshop which is a warehouse not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, and in which persons are solely employed in polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up goods." The contention by Mr. Sutton, on behalf of the factory inspector, is that those words "not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft" are a description of the room or place in which the limited employment mentioned later may be carried on; in other words, that they mean in a part of the factory which is never used for a manufacturing process or handicraft. The contention by Mr. Slater, on the part of the manufacturer, is that "not used" means not so used at the time when overtime was being worked. I do not say the words are not open to either construction. It is possible to construe them as "not used at the time," or it is possible to construe them as "never been used." It is quite plain, however, that something more is intended than the actual work which the people are doing at the time, because you have a limit as to the things people may do in overtime—namely, "polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up goods," and in addition to that overtime must be worked in a part of the factory not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft. Is it more in consonance with factory legislation that that should mean a building which is at no time of the day used for that purpose, or a building that is not used for that purpose during the time overtime is worked? I think the view that has been presented by Mr. Sutton is correct. I think upon the point of view of evasion that it is desirable that the place in which the permitted employments are to be carried on during the overtime hours should be a place where there would not be any difficulty of detection and where there would be no facility of evasion. The inspector is not always there. He only comes at times, and perhaps not at very frequent intervals. There may be cases in which, if the work is being carried on in the place where the manufacturing processes are being carried on, the workmen may glide from one work to another without possibility of detection. Another point has been mentioned. It may be that, for sanitary reasons, it may not be desirable that the particular overtime employment, "polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing," should be carried on in rooms where manufacturing processes have in ordinary time been carried on. Looking at the legislation as a whole, it seems to me that in addition to the employments that are limited for overtime, the Legislature has also limited the places which shall be used; and that the words "not used for any manufacturing process or handicraft," especially when you remember it refers to textile and non-textile warehouses, point to the character of the place. I think that if the Legislature had meant to say that the overtime employment was permissible if the place was not at the time used for any manufacturing process or handicraft, we should find language to that effect. Therefore I come to the conclusion that this was a place in which the working of overtime was not justified, on the ground that it was a place that was used for manufacturing processes or handicraft during the ordinary working hours.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is perfectly clear, when the matter comes to be fairly considered, that the employment of women and young persons is permitted only for specified periods which, subject to an exception which I will mention presently, in each of the cases mentioned consist of twelve hours—6 to 6, 7 to 7, 8 to 8, according to the time at which work begins. Then, after a woman has worked the period of twelve hours, I should think that overtime begins. It is difficult to say that overtime must be from 6 to 8, or from 7 to 9, or from 8 to 10, seeing that it must vary with regard to each set of persons according to the time they come. But it is not necessary to decide that. That is the view that occurs to me as to what is meant by "overtime." Nine o'clock at night, which was the time of the inspector's visit, must from any point of view be overtime. It is an hour after the latest period which is allowed, and, therefore, in any point of view it must be overtime. Then the only question is whether the respondents, the employers, come within the exception in Schedule II., clause 4. It seems to me that the grammatical meaning of the language, though it may be interpreted in either of two ways, as my lord has pointed out, is much more consonant with the view that that part of the building which is called a warehouse is not at any period to be used for other purposes than those of "polishing, cleaning, wrapping, or packing up." Many reasons may be given for that. One thing is perfectly clear—that it is a general section applying to non-textile factories, and that, therefore, the argument derived from the suggestion that in this particular instance it was not more objectionable to do this overtime work in that part of the factory where a manufacturing process had been carried on previously that day, than to do it in a warehouse which is used for nothing else than work of the description allowed to be performed in overtime to my mind goes for nothing, because there may be many other trades in which, if the circumstances were present to one, one could say at once that there was very good reason why the prohibition should exist against the same room being used for the two purposes at different times of the day. It is clear also that evasion may be facilitated—I do not say in this particular case, because in this particular case, after what we have been told by the learned magistrate, I do not see that it would make any difference, but still there must be many cases in which evasion would be facilitated—by allowing a double set of operations to take place in the same room. Therefore, I think Mr. Sutton is right in his argument upon the meaning of the section

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. It seems to me Schedule II. (4) may mean a warehouse not used at a particular time for a particular purpose, and in which persons are solely employed for that particular purpose; or, on the other hand, it may mean a warehouse not habitually used for a manufacturing process, and in which persons are not at other times so employed. As between those two meanings I had a good deal of difficulty at first in understanding why the Legislature in protecting women from being employed after particular times of the day, and for more than a certain number of hours, should have said, although they may be employed after certain hours "in polishing, cleaning, wrapping, and packing up," yet they must not be employed even in that work unless it is in a place solely used for that purpose. With regard to the words "not used," I first thought the proper interpretation would have been to say that they meant not used at that time; but Mr. Sutton has given two reasons in support of the other construction, either of which may be sufficient. One is that many manufacturing processes (and I agree with my brother Wills it does not matter whether this manufacturing process is one of them or not) may be of such a character that it is important that the room in which they are carried on should not be used for more than a certain number of hours. Then in addition there may be this reason, and I think this is the more important reason—that if you allow this place in which this work after eight o'clock at night may be carried on by women to be the same place in which manufacturing processes are carried on, and in which, therefore, the apparatus for the carrying on of those manufacturing processes will be present, it is impossible to prevent evasion, because the moment the inspector looks in, all the people, who a minute ago have been doing the manufacturing process, will be found doing the other process; and, therefore, if the Legislature allowed the two things to be done in the same place, it would be impossible to prevent that evasion. I think what is meant is not only that women must not be employed after eight o'clock at night in other than specified work, but also that the place used for that specified work must not at any time be used for any manufacturing process or handicraft.

Appeal allowed; case remitted.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the respondent, Gibson & Weldon, for S. J. Newson, Sheffield.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Channell, J.) May 28, 1903.

REX v. BEER. (a.)

Corporation—Municipal corporation—Borough councillor — Election of bankrupt — Disqualification — Quo warranto—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 87—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 32—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 9.

Section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that "Where a debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt he shall . . . be disqualified for . . . (d) being elected to or holding or exercising the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor," and by section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, such disqualification shall not exceed five years from the date of discharge.

B., the defendant, was elected a borough councillor, and subsequently to the time prescribed for presenting a petition against his election it was discovered that prior to the date of his election he had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and that he had received his discharge less than five years previous to the election.

Held, that in order to oust the defendant from his office as councillor he must be proceeded against by an information in the nature of a quo warranto, calling upon him to show by what authority he claimed to hold and exercise the office, and not by way of mandamus.

The remedy by way of quo warranto is not taken away by section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, where a disqualified person is de facto "holding" the office.

Rule nisi for an information of quo warranto calling on the defendant, George Beer, to shew by what authority he held the office of a councillor for the Castlebar Ward of the Borough of Ealing.

The following are the facts of the case:

On the 27th of April, 1899, the defendant wss adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 12th of July of the same year an order of the court was made suspending his discharge for two years and six months, the order to take effect as from the 12th of January, 1902.

On the 1st of November, 1902, an ordinary election of councillors for the said borough was held, at which the defendant was proposed and seconded for the office of councillor for the said Castlebar Ward, in the said borough, and he was declared by the returning officer at the said election to have been elected to the said ward. No petition was presented against his election within the time limited by section 88 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882—namely, within twenty-one days of the election.

On the 28th of January, 1903, a rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained calling upon the Mayor of Ealing to show cause why he should not hold an election of a councillor for the aforesaid ward on the ground that the defendant on the 1st of November, 1902, the date of his election, was disqualified for being elected to, or holding, or exercising the office of a councillor by reason of his having been adjudicated a bankrupt; that his disqualification had not ceased or been removed and that therefore no election had been held for the said ward within the time prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

On cause being shown on the 24th of May, 1903, the rule nisi for a mandamus was discharged on the ground that, as the defendant was de facto holding the office, the office could not be said to be vacant, and therefore no election could be legally held, and that consequently a writ could not go directing the Mayor of Ealing to hold an election. The court, however, granted a rule nisi calling upon the defendant to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against him to show by what authority he claimed to hold and exercise the office of a councillor for the said ward.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), provides as follows:

Section 32. "(1) Where a debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be disqualified for . . . (d) being elected to or holding or exercising the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor.

"(2) The disqualifications to which a bankrupt is subject under this section shall be removed and cease if and when (a) the adjudication of bankruptcy against him is annulled; or (b) he obtains from the court his discharge with a certificate to the effect that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), section 9, provides as follows:

"No disqualification arising by virtue of section thirty-two of the principal Act shall exceed a period of five years from the date of any discharge which may have been, or may hereafter be, granted under and by virtue of the principal Act or of this Act. . . ."

The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) provides as follows:

Section 39. "(1) If the mayor or an alderman or councillor (a) is declared bankrupt . . . he shall thereupon immediately become disqualified and shall cease to hold the office." (3) "Before a person becomes so disqualified by being declared a bankrupt . . . as aforesaid, the disqualification as regards subsequent elections shall . . . cease on his obtaining his order of discharge . . ."

Section 73. "Every municipal election not called in question within twelve months after the election, either by election petition or by information in the nature of a quo warranto shall be deemed to have been to all intents a good and valid election."

Section 87. "(1) A municipal election may be questioned by an election petition on the ground . . . (c) that the person whose election is questioned was at the time of the election disqualified; . . ." "(2) A municipal election shall not be questioned on any of those grounds except by an election petition."

Section 225. "An application for an information in the nature of quo warranto against any person claiming to hold a corporate office shall not be made after the expiration of twelve months from the time when he became disqualified after election. . . ."

Danckwerts, K.C. (Loehnis with him), showed cause.—Proceedings by way of quo warranto will not lie in this case. The disqualification arising from bankruptcy existed at the date of the election, and therefore by section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the election cannot be questioned on the ground that the defendant at the time of the election was disqualified except by an election petition: Reg. v. Mayor, &c., of Welshpool, 35 L. T. 594, 25 W. R. Dig. 108; Reg. v. Morton, 40 W. R. 109, [1892] 1 Q. B. 39. In the last-mentioned case A. L. Smith, J., says: "It is, however, clear that proceedings by way of quo warranto are abolished by the 87th section of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, in cases which come within that section, or, in other words, where a petition will lie, quo warranto will not."

Macmorran, K.C. (R. Cunningham Glen with him), in support of the rule.—The remedy by way of quo warranto is not in this case done away with by section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, except where the election itself as distinguished from the holding of the office is questioned. The point here really turns upon the construction of section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. That section is clear in its terms. It says that a debtor who has been adjudged bankrupt shall be disqualified for being elected to or holding or exercising the office of a councillor, and that disqualification is extended by the Act of 1890 to five years from the date of discharge. If such a person be elected the election may be questioned by election petition, but if it is not questioned within twenty-one days he is de facto elected and holds the office, and before another person can be elected to the office the disqualified person must be made to vacate it, and this can only be done by proceeding against him by way of quo warranto.

He cited De Souza v. Cobden, 39 W. R. 454, [1891] 1 Q. B. 687, and Reg. v. Mayor of Chester, 4 W. R. 14, 25 L. J. Q. B. 61.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of interest and difficulty. The case at first was for a mandamus to the mayor of this municipal corporation to hold an election for the office of a borough councillor, on the ground that the defendant was not qualified for the office because at the time of his election he was still disqualified as having been adjudicated a bankrupt. It was then argued that mandamus would not lie because the office was already full, and therefore no election could legally be held, and, further, that by virtue of section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the proceedings to decide the validity of the election ought to be by way of election petition. The court was satisfied that mandamus would not lie. We therefore suggested that a rule nisi for a quo warranto might issue, and we would hear the argument upon that question. Not without doubt, I have on that argument come to the conclusion that the remedy by quo warranto has not been taken away by the course of legislation on this subject.

The first section it is necessary to refer to is section 12 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which provides that "a person shall be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor if and while he (a) is an elective auditor or a revising assessor, or holds any office or place of profit other than that of mayor or sheriff, in the gift or disposal of the council; or (b) is in holy orders, or the regular minister of a dissenting congregation; or (c) has directly or indirectly by himself or by his partner any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council," and then there are certain provisoes as to the latter disqualification. These are disqualifications both at the time of and after the election, and bankruptcy is not named as one of them. Then comes section 39, which says: "If the mayor, or an alderman or councillor (a) is declared bankrupt, or compounds by deed with his creditors, or makes an arrangement or composition with his creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, by deed or otherwise . . . he shall thereupon immediately become disqualified and shall cease to hold office." That section, it is to be observed, deals with the case of bankruptcy after the election, and not before or at the time of the election. Now, section 41 provides that "if a person acts in a corporate office without having made the declaration by this Act required, or without being qualified at the time of making the declaration, or after ceasing to be qualified, or after becoming disqualified, he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding £50, recoverable by action." That deals with the penalties for acting if disqualified either under section 12 or section 39. Then comes section 87, on which the main argument against the rule is based in this case. It provides "A municipal election may be questioned by an election petition on the ground . . . (c) that the person whose election is questioned was at the time of the election disqualified." And further that "a municipal election shall not be questioned on any of those grounds except by an election petition." I think that section makes the point good that for any of the causes mentioned in that section the proper remedy is by way of election petition, and that therefore the remedy by mandamus is taken away. No such petition has been presented in the present case, and the time limited by section 88 for presenting such a petition is past. But is quo warranto also taken away? Now, section 73 provides that "every municipal election not called in question within twelve months after the election, either by election petition or by information in the nature of a quo warranto, shall be deemed to have been to all intents a good and valid election," and section 225 provides "an application for an information in the nature of a quo warranto against any person claiming to hold a corporate office shall not be made after the expiration of twelve months from the time when he became disqualified after election." Both those sections seem to me to recognize that for some purposes quo warranto was contemplated. We have to consider the point whether quo warranto is taken away in cases where a person who is not qualified is holding an office. When I read the case of Reg. v. Chester Corporation, 5 E. & B. 531, where Lord Campbell, C J., says, at p. 538: "Where a man is bonâ fide in office his title is not to be tried by mandamus but by quo warranto," speaking for myself, I think if it was intended by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to take away the remedy by quo warranto in a case like the present, I should have expected to find more distinct words in the statute. I cannot see why disqualifications that arise under section 12 of that Act should not be questioned by quo warranto, nor can I see why the disqualification of bankruptcy should not fall within the category of continuing disqualifications to which quo warranto applies. Section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act provides that where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt he shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be disqualified for (a) "being elected to or holding or exercising the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor." The words of that section point to election to the office, and to holding or exercising the office. Now, in section 12 of the Municipal Corporations Act it was not necessary to deal with the exercise of the office, because section 41 of the Act makes a person liable to penalties if he exercises the office without being qualified. The word "holding" in section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is equivalent to the word "being" in section 12 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and section 32 is a statutory declaration that a bankrupt cannot hold the office whether duly elected or not. In my judgment, that is a question that can be raised by quo warranto though not by mandamus, and the rule therefore for the quo warranto must be made absolute.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question, to my mind, turns on the construction of section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 12 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The other questions are questions of election law, and most of them are well settled. It is a well-settled principle that after an office is full de facto, then, although the holder is disqualified, there cannot be a mandamus, but quo warranto will lie. It is necessary to proceed by quo warranto to get the holder out of the office before proceeding to apply for a mandamus to hold a new election. I think that applies to this case, and shows that it was right to discharge the rule for the mandamus. As to the rule for a quo warranto, it is clear that the defendant was disqualified at the time he was elected, and therefore his election might have been questioned by petition. That being so, there cannot be a quo warranto to question his election, because by section 87 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, it is necessary for the purpose of questioning his election to proceed by petition. But if, in addition to his disqualification from being elected, he is also disqualified from holding the office, then the position is that there is an office being held de facto by an unqualified person, and the proper method of questioning that is by quo warranto, because a petition does not apply to that. The whole question is whether a man who is still disqualified at the time of his election by reason of section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is disqualified from holding office, or whether he is only disqualified from holding it when the bankruptcy takes place after his election. That depends, of course, on section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section imposes several disqualifications on a bankrupt, and as to the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor with which we are here concerned, it disqualifies him from being elected to, holding, or exercising the office. If this section was only intended to apply to bankruptcies occurring subsequent to election, then it was unnecessary, as that is provided for by section 39 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; but if it means that a bankrupt is prohibited both from being elected, and also from holding or exercising the office if elected—if that is the true meaning of the section, as I think it is, then all the rest follows.

The rule, therefore, for the quo warranto must be made absolute.

Rule absolute for quo warranto.

Solicitors for defendant, Gadsden & Treherne.

Solicitors in support of rule, Woosnam & Smith.

Solicitor for Mayor of Ealing, William Ruston.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } April 6, 1903.

"THE PORT CALEDONIA" AND "THE ANNA." (a.)

Ship—Salvage—Exorbitant terms demanded—Agreement quashed by court.

While two large sailing vessels were weather-bound in Holyhead Harbour, one of them dragged her anchors and came in dangerous proximity to the other. The master of the dragging vessel hailed a tug, but the master of the tug demanded £1,000, and would take nothing less before rendering assistance. The master of the sailing vessel offered £100, but rather than foul the other ship agreed to pay £1,000, and he was towed into a position where he held on to his anchors. The owners, master, and crew of the tug brought an action against both vessels, their cargoes and freights, upon the agreement in the one case and for a salvage award in the other.

The Court quashed the agreement, on the ground that it was an exorbitant and an inequitable one, which was improperly forced upon the master of the sailing vessel, and therefore could not be sustained. It ordered a sum of £200 to be paid, and gave costs on the county court scale. The action against the other vessel the court dismissed with costs, it being of opinion that no salvage service had been rendered to her by the tug.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the steam screw tug Sarah Jolliffe, a vessel of 299 tons gross, valued at £12,000. The defendants were the owners of the sailing vessels Port Caledonia and Anna, their cargoes and freights.

The facts, in so far as they do not appear in the judgment, were shortly as follows:

About 9.30 a.m. on the 1st of March, 1903, The Port Caledonia, a steel four-masted barque of 2,426 tons gross, on a voyage from San Francisco to Queenstown, was weather-bound within the Holyhead breakwater. Her value was about £15,000, and that of her cargo of grain £21,715, and freight at risk £4,417, making in all £41,132. The Anna was also a four-masted barque of 2,663 tons gross, bound from

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tacoma to Queenstown with grain, her value being £16,000, her cargo £20,906, and freight at risk £5,000, making in all a total of £41,906. The master of The Port Caledonia, seeing that his vessel was dragging down upon The Anna, signalled to the master of The Sarah Jolliffe, "What will you shift us for?" The master of the tug answered, "One thousand pounds." The master of The Port Caledonia offered in reply £100, but finding that the tug would do nothing unless £1,000 were agreed to, he gave the order to the tug to take hold of the ship.

Aspinall, K.C., and Bateson, for the plaintiffs.

Pickford K.C., and Balloch for the owners of The Port Caledonia, contended that it was not necessary to show in this court the amount of duress that would be required at common law to set aside an agreement on that ground, and that it was the duty of the Admiralty Court to set aside such an inequitable agreement and to award such a sum as would fairly recompense the plaintiffs for the services they had rendered.

Laing, K.C., and Head, for the owners of The Anna.

BUCKNILL, J., in delivering judgment, said The Anna, a large four-masted barque of over 2,000 tons register, and laden with a cargo of wheat, was obliged by the weather to take refuge in Holyhead Harbour, where she had been anchored, and where she was entitled to remain as between herself and any other ship not absolutely driven into the neighbourhood by the exigencies of the gale. In other words, other vessels were bound to see that they did not give her a foul berth. Then The Port Caledonia came in, also weather-bound. Coming there for refuge, she was brought by her pilot to a position which was a perfectly proper one in the circumstances as they then existed. She also was a large four-masted barque apparently about the same size as The Anna, and had a cargo of approximately the same weight of wheat. These two vessels were lying inside the breakwater of Holyhead Harbour when in consequence of the south-westerly gale, The Port Caledonia in the early morning of the day in question began to drag her anchors, and being at first in a position of about three ships' lengths from The Anna—that is, three ships' lengths clear between the stern of the one and the bow of the other—she dragged about two ships' lengths towards The Anna. That is according to the log and according to the case for the defendants. According to the case for the plaintiffs the vessels were heading south-west, which was the direction of the wind, and The Port Caledonia had dragged until she was slightly on the starboard bow of The Anna, with a distance of only twenty to thirty feet between them. In that condition of things—that is to say, the two vessels being in the position that The Port Caledonia had dragged her anchors to the extent of at least two ships' lengths—the master of The Anna very properly gave warning to the master of The Port Caledonia that if he dragged further and got foul of his ship he should hold the owners of The Port Caledonia responsible, and there is no doubt that The Port Caledonia would be giving The Anna a foul berth if she remained there. The master of The Port Caledonia, finding himself in that position, signalled first for a tug and then for a pilot, and the tug and the pilot both arrived. Up to that time I have no fault to find with the tug. The pilot went on board and the tug alongside. I may as well say at once that I find as a fact The Port Caledonia was nothing like as near The Anna as the master of the tug would have me believe. I accept the evidence of the master of The Port Caledonia and of the master of The Anna as to the distance between these two thips, as nearly as they can give it, and of the assistant lighthouse keeper at Holyhead, an intelligent man who gave his evidence very fairly and very well. Now, The Port Caledonia wanted to be shifted. She had dragged and she might drag again, although I find as a fact that at the time the tug came alongside of her she was firm to her anchors and was not dragging; but there was always a possibility that she might drag, and if she had dragged with the wind south-west and remaining in that quarter serious consequences might have ensued. She probably would have got foul of the other ship, and they might, both of them, have got adrift, and if the wind had remained in the south-west they might have got on the rocks; but that is just what did not happen. The wind did not remain in the south-west; it got round to the west-north-west, and at last to the north-west. Shortly after the tug got alongside the wind was W.N.W., and from that direction there would have been no danger to the two ships. Then came the question, What was the tug master to get, and what was the master of The Port Caledonia to offer for the tug's help? The tug master said—I hope there are not many tug masters who would say it—that he wanted £1,000 or no rope. I stopped him before he gave an answer to a question which was put to him by counsel for The Port Caledonia, because if he had given a certain answer I am sure his owners would not have allowed him to remain in their employ, but he did say, "I should not have let them go on the rocks. I should have let them break each other adrift, and when they were adrift have gone to their assistance, but not unless they gave me the £1,000." I shall not attempt to describe what the Elder Brethren and I think of conduct like that. Language could not be too strong. It was most reprehensible conduct, and, I will add, cowardly. But the master of The Port Caledonia, finding himself in a difficulty, promised to give a thousand pounds for the tug's services, which I value at very much less. The tug having without much difficulty put a hawser on board held The Port Caledonia up so that she could get her anchors. The tug did her work very well. I have no fault to find with that. I am advised that it would have taken some time for those on board The Port Caledonia to get in her chain by the manual labour which would have had to have been used, there being no steam power. In all the tug was engaged about one hour and forty-five minutes. What she did do she did well. There was no danger to the tug, as the wind had moderated. The case has been described as one of towage, but the owners of barque have admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to a salvage award. With the £1,000 agreement on one side and that which I think was the value of the services on the other, I have to ask myself whether the bargain that was made was so inequitable, so unjust, and so unreasonable that the court cannot allow it to stand. The first question to consider is, what was the position of the two persons who made the agreement? The position was this. One man was in a position to insist upon his terms, and the other man had to put up with it. He could not help himself. He says in his letter to his owners: "He demanded £1,000 to take me away. I offered him £100 or to leave it to the owners, but he would not agree, so I agreed to give £1,000 rather than foul The Anna." He appreciated the possibility of fouling The Anna if the weather had remained bad and if the wind had remained in the south-west, neither of which things happened. So he found himself obliged to give way to a person who would not move him, and who would have allowed him and The Anna to drift towards the rocks, and who would, I think, have seen them go there without putting a hawser on board unless he got a promise of £1,000.

I have expressed my opinion about this matter. This opinion is shared by the Elder Brethren, and I hold that this agreement cannot be allowed to stand, and I set it aside. I hope that those who perform such grand services in tugs from time to time in worse weather than this, and in peril of their own lives save property around the coast, will note that this court will keep a firm hand over them if they attempt to do what was done in this case. This was an inequitable, extortionate, and unreasonable agreement, and I think that the services rendered will be well rewarded by the sum of £200, and with county court costs.

Now, with regard to the claim against The Anna. The Anna was not, in my judgment, at any time in such a position as that a prudent master would have thought it right and fit or to be his duty to call upon a tug to take The Port Caledonia away from him. His own letter shows that. I have asked the Elder Brethren this question in the language of the decisions which are well known: Would he as a prudent man have found himself called upon in the position in which he then was with regard to himself and The Port Caledonia to engage a tug to take The Port Caledonia from the place where she was? And the answer is "No," because there was no danger, or very little danger, and not that sort of danger which allows towage to be turned into salvage. By easing away his own cables he could have increased, as he said, the distance between the two ships; but there was no reason to believe, as the wind was moderating and getting more westerly, that there would be any necessity to do that. In his letter to his owners he said: "I do not consider The Anna was in danger as regards The Port Caledonia when the gale was blowing. She was 100 yards from our jibboom and we were ready to pay out more cable if required." Then again he says, "The Port Caledonia, which had dragged to within about 100 yards towards us, had to engage a tug to avoid a collision later on; but that cannot concern The Anna." I am reading a translation, and I do not know exactly the idea that was passing through the master's mind; but I think I may say that his idea was that if the wind had got round to a dangerous quarter again and had blown with a force which would have made it impossible for The Port Caledonia to have done what she did before then, if steps were not taken there might have been a collision between the two ships. There, was, therefore, appreciable danger which made it necessary that as far as The Port Coledonia was concerned she should not continue to give The Anna what she had done—namely, a foul berth; but The Anna was in no danger, according to the language of the master in his letter to his owners. The result is that there will be judgment against The Port Caledonia for £200 with county court costs, and there will be judgment for The Anna with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, the owners of The Sarah Jolliffe, Neave & Bretherton, for H. J. Holme, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, the owners of The Port Caledonia, Thos. Cooper & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, the owners of The Anna, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, & Co., Liverpool.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) — Jan. 25.

SNEADE v. WOTHERTON BARYTES AND LEAD MINING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

County court—Practice—Remitted action—Claim in contract exceeding £100—Amendment of writ by claiming a sum not exceeding £100—Jurisdiction to remit—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.

In an action of contract in the High Court the amount endorsed on the writ exceeded £100. Subsequently the plaintiff obtained leave to amend the writ by claiming a sum not exceeding £100.

Held, that the amended writ must be taken as the writ originating an action in which a sum not exceeding £100 was claimed, and that there was therefore jurisdiction to remit the action to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers.

In an action in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ was for £138, the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendants in their statement of defence pleaded (inter alia) the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff subsequently applied for leave to amend the indorsement on the writ by striking out all the items of the claim except the last one for £24, and for an order under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, that the action should be remitted for trial to the county court. The master gave the plaintiff leave to amend the indorsement on the writ as asked for, upon payment of all costs thrown away by the amendment, but refused to remit the action to the county court. On appeal by the plaintiff against the refusal to remit, Bucknill, J., made an order remitting the action to the county court. The defendants appealed from the order to remit.

Disturnal (S. R. C. Bosanquet with him), for the defendants.—The action being an action of contract and claiming a sum exceeding £100, there is no jurisdiction to remit it to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The reduction of the claim by "payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise" to a sum not exceeding £100 means a reduction before action brought: Foster v. Usherwood, 26 W. R. 91, 3 Ex. D. 1; Hodgson v. Bell, 38 W. R. 325; 24 Q. B. D. 525; Dierken v. Philpot, 49 W. R. 703, [1901] 2 K. B. 380. The reduction in this case took place after action brought.

Randolph, for the plaintiff.—The writ in the action having been amended by claiming only £24, it must be taken as if the writ was originally indorsed for a claim for that amount. The action is now to be considered as an action for £24. For instance, leave to amend a writ by adding a new claim is not given if the amendment will defeat a defence of the Statute of Limitations to that claim. That shows that the amended writ is to be considered as the original writ in the action. The action therefore claims a sum not exceeding £100, and there is jurisdiction to remit.

Bosanquet, in reply.—If the order to remit is right, it is a mode of avoiding the effect of the former decisions upon the point, which the court will not allow.

COLLINS, M.R.—The facts in this case are somewhat peculiar, and are not covered by any of the authorities which have been referred to. The action was brought in the High Court to recover a sum exceeding £100. After the proceedings had continued for some time the plaintiff applied for leave to amend the indorsement on the writ by abandoning all the items of claim except £24, and to have the action remitted to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The master allowed the amendment to be made upon the plaintiff paying all the costs thrown away thereby, but refused to order the action to be remitted to the county court. The plaintiff appealed from this last part of the order, and the learned judge ordered the action to be remitted. The defendants appeal to this court, contending that the judge had no jurisdiction to remit the action under section 65. That section provides that "where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed £100, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded £100, is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise to a sum not exceeding £100," it shall be lawful for either party to the action to apply for an order that the action be tried in the county court, and the judge shall, unless there is good cause to the contrary, order the action to be tried accordingly.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It has been held in a series of decisions that when the writ is indorsed with a claim for a sum exceeding £100, a reduction after action brought of the amount claimed by "payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise" to a sum not exceeding £100 does not give the court jurisdiction to remit the action to the county court. It was held in those cases that "payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise" mean a reduction of the claim before action. It is contended that those decisions apply to the present case. Here, however, there has been no reduction of the claim by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, since action brought. There has been by amendment of the writ a substitution of £24 for £138 in the claim indorsed thereon. The writ as amended remains the writ in the action, and must be taken to be the commencement of the action. That is the reason why the question of allowing an amendment should always be carefully considered by the court, and if allowed proper terms ought to be imposed. The amendment here has been allowed on proper terms, and the amended writ must be taken as the original writ in the action and as initiating an action in which a sum of £24 is claimed. It is therefore an action in which a sum not exceeding £100 is claimed, and it can be remitted to the county court under section 65. It is just the sort of action that ought to be remitted. It seems to me that it would be pressing the decisions beyond what is right if we were to hold that they apply to this case. An amendment of the indorsement on the writ so as to reduce the sum claimed is not the same thing as a reduction, after action brought, of the amount claimed by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise. There was therefore jurisdiction to remit the action.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for J. P. Court, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Woosnam & Smith, for G. H. Morgan, Shrewsbury.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 18, 19; Dec. 21.

NICHOLAS v. RIDLEY. (a.)

Mortgage—Tacking—Transfer—Covenant to pay as collateral security—Construction of transfer deed.

Certain lands were mortgaged to secure £1,500. The equity of redemption in the said lands was, with other property, subsequently mortgaged to secure £2,500. The £1,500 mortgage security was transferred to the £2,500 mortgagee. The tenant for life of all the mortgaged property was a party to the deed of transfer, and thereby covenanted to pay the £1,500, subject to a proviso that, as between himself and the owners of the mortgaged property, his covenant was to be only a collateral security, but notwithstanding the mortgagee was to be at liberty to enforce either security.

The representatives of the mortgagee brought an action against the representatives of the tenant for life to recover the amount due upon their securities, and claimed to be entitled to tack the latter mortgage to the earlier one.

Held, by Romer and Stirling, L.JJ. (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), that on the true construction of the deed of transfer the tenant for life was, as between himself and the mortgagee, a principal and not a surety. Consequently there was no restriction on the rights of the mortgagee in dealing with his securities, and the plaintiffs were entitled to tack the later to the earlier mortgage.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

The facts were as follow:

By an indenture dated the 2nd of July, 1821, one Richard Ridley mortgaged certain copyholds to one William Stringer to secure £1,500 and interest. Richard Ridley died not later than 1830.

By another indenture dated the 21st of April, 1842, George Ridley mortgaged the equity of redemption of the copyholds comprised in the mortgage of the 2nd of July, 1821, and certain additional real estate, to one William Nicholas to secure £2,500 and interest,

In March, 1874, Samuel Ridley was tenant for life of all the real estate comprised in the securities of 1821 and 1842, and was paying interest on the said sums of £1,500 and £2,500, on the former to the personal representatives of William Stringer, who was dead, and on the latter to William Nicholas.

On the 21st of March, 1874, the security of 1821 was transferred to William Nicholas on payment by him of the £1,500. The deed of transfer, to which Samuel Ridley was a party, contained the following recital: "And whereas the said Law and Carder [the personal representatives of Stringer] having required payment of the said sum of £1,500, the said William Nicholas at the request of the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, has agreed to pay to the said Law and Carder the said sum of £1,500, upon having such transfer as is hereinafter mentioned of the said principal sum of £1,500 and interest and the securities for the same, and upon having the payment of the said principal sum and interest further and collaterally secured by the covenant of the said Samuel Ridley (party hereto) hereinafter contained."

The deed also contained the following covenant for payment of the £1,500 by Samuel Ridley and proviso: "And he, the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant with the said William Nicholas, his executors and administrators, that he the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or other the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption of the said premises will pay to the said William Nicholas, his executors, administrators, or assigns, on demand by him or them the said sum of £1,500 or so much thereof as shall for the time being remain unpaid and all interest which shall be due thereon. Provided nevertheless that as between the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, his heirs, executors, and administrators, estate and effects on the one part and the said copyhold premises and the owner or owners for the time being of the said copyhold premises on the other part, the said copyhold premises shall be considered as the primary fund for the payment of the said principal sum and interest, and the covenant of the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, shall be only a collateral security to the said William Nicholas, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the payment of the said principal sum and interest, but that notwithstanding the said William Nicholas, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be at liberty to resort to either means for procuring or enforcing the payment of the said principal sum and interest or any part or parts thereof respectively in preference to such other means." The personal representative (if any) of Richard Ridley was not a party to this deed of transfer.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

William Nicholas died in 1882, and Samuel Ridley died in 1896.

The present action was brought by the representatives of William Nicholas against the representatives of Samuel Ridley. They claimed an account of what was due to them for principal and interest on the said mortgage securities; a declaration that they were entitled as against the defendants to tack their said mortgage security for £2,500 to that for £1,500; payment by the defendants of what should be found due on the £1,500 mortgage; and foreclosure or sale.

Byrne, J., found that the plaintiffs were entitled to tack their securities and gave judgment in their favour accordingly.

The defendants appealed.

Rowden, K.C., and Marcy, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to tack their two securities as against Samuel Ridley, who was a surety for only one of them, and we, as his representatives, have the rights of a surety against the plaintiffs—that is to say, upon payment of the £1,500 and interest by us, we are entitled to have assigned to us the securities held by the plaintiffs in respect of the £1,500 mortgage and to stand in the place of the plaintiffs as to them. Byrne, J., held that he was bound by Farebrother v. Wodehouse, 5 W. R. 12, 23 B. 18, but that case was decided on the authority of Williams v. Owen, 13 Sim. 597, which had really been overruled by Bowker v. Bull, 1 Sim. N. S. 29; and Farebrother v. Wodehouse has been doubted on this ground.

We also rely on the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5; Forbes v. Jackson, 30 W. R. 652, 19 Ch. D. 615; In re Kirkwood's Estate, L. R. Ir. 1 Eq. 108; and In re Sass, 44 W. R. 588, [1896] 2 Q. B. 12.

Levett, K.C., and A. T. Murray, for the plaintiffs.—It is true that a surety can stand in the place of his creditor, but it has never been held that he can deprive the creditor of any of his rights. This is really what the defendants are claiming to do here, and we submit that such a claim is inconsistent with the terms of the deed of 1874.

They cited Harburg India Rubber Comb Co. v. Martin, 50 W. R. 449, [1902] 1 K. B. 778; and Fitzgeral v. Dressler, 7 C. B. N. S. 774.

Rowden, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: Byrne, J., held that the plaintiffs were right in their contention and that as mortgagees they could at the same time enforce payment under the covenant and set up a right to tack against the right of the surety to a transfer of securities.

Byrne, J., in thus deciding, considered himself bound so to do by reason of the decision in Farebrother v. Wodehouse.

Now before this question as to the right of the defendants to a transfer of the securities can arise, it is necessary first to decide whether Samuel Ridley did under the deed of 1874 either become a surety or become entitled to a right to have a transfer of securities or payment such as a surety would have.

This would be mainly a question of the construction of the deed of 1874, but one will have also to take into consideration the facts recited in that deed to which I have already referred. The short result of those facts is that at the time of the execution of that deed, which is a deed for the transfer to William Nicholas of the mortgage for £1,500, secured on the Manor of Claverley, Samuel Ridley was as tenant for life entitled to the equity of redemption of that manor, and William Nicholas, the transferee, was at that time second mortgagee of the same premises under a mortgage to secure the payment of a principal sum of £2,500.

It is also recited in the said deed that the persons in whom the first mortgage of £1,500 was vested, "having required payment of the said sum of £1,500, the said William Nicholas at the request of the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, has agreed to pay to the said persons the said sum of £1,500 upon having such transfer as is hereinafter mentioned of the said principal sum of £1,500 and interest and the securities for the same, and upon having payment of the said principal sum and interest further and collaterally secured by the covenant of the said Samuel Ridley, party hereto, hereinafter contained."

It is argued that in this state of things Samuel Ridley, being the tenant for life of the equity of redemption, and therefore deeply interested in preventing a foreclosure, could not claim that he took upon himself merely as surety the obligation to pay the £1,500 mortgage debt. It is said that he incurred this obligation as tenant for life for the purpose of protecting his interest as such, and that the recited fact that Nicholas, at the request of Samuel Ridley, agreed to pay off the persons then entitled to a first mortgage is consistent with the obligation being taken by Samuel Ridley as tenant for life for the protection of the estate and inconsistent with the obligation being taken as surety. Now, for my own part, if there was nothing else in the deed militating against this view, I should be inclined to construe the deed so as to negative the obligation being taken by Samuel Ridley as surety or under conditions which gave him the right to a transfer of securities on payment of the £1,500, notwithstanding the fact that undoubtedly Samuel Ridley did by entering into the covenant take upon himself the personal liability which did not previously rest upon him. I cannot, however, accede to the argument that because the mortgage of 1821 contained no covenant for redemption by the mortgagor it is impossible that under the deed of 1874 the position of Samuel Ridley should be that of a surety.

It is necessary, therefore, to further examine the deed of 1874, and the most material portion is the proviso which runs thus: [His lordship read the covenant and proviso, and continued:]

Primâ facie this proviso should relate to a subject-matter which could be controlled by the contract of the covenantor and the covenantee, and this is true even in relation to that part of the proviso which is governed by the words "as between the said S. Ridley, party hereto, his heirs, executors, and administrators, estate and effects, and the said copyhold premises and the owner or owners for the time being of the said copyhold premises on the other part," for Ridley and Nicholas cannot by their covenant control the relations of Ridley and the owners for the time being of the mortgaged estate otherwise than by an agreement inter se.

Now what is it that the parties to the deed contract shall be the effect of the deed as between Ridley and his estate and effects on the one hand and the copyhold premises (the mortgaged premises) and the owners for the time being on the other hand. It is that as between Ridley and the owners of the copyhold premises for the time being the copyhold premises shall be considered as the primary fund for the payment of the principal sum and interest, and that the covenant of Ridley shall be only a collateral security to Nicholas for the payment of the principal and interest. But it is plain that by their mere covenant Ridley and Nicholas cannot affect the relations of Ridley to persons who are not parties to the deed nor representatives of parties to the deed. Now how can the contracting parties bring this about by anything that they can do, and in what possible state of things that can be contemplated as arising can Ridley and Nicholas have to consider the copyhold premises as the primary fund or the covenant as collateral security to Nicholas for the payment of principal and interest as between Ridley and the copyhold premises and the owners for the time being? It seems to me that this occasion for thus considering the copyhold premises and the covenant can only arise if it is sought at the instance of Ridley to enforce the mortgage security against the copyhold premises as the primary fund in a case where Ridley has paid under his covenant which the parties to the deed agree shall as against the owners for the time being of the mortgaged estate be considered as collateral security.

Now let us see how the proviso continues. It goes on, "But that notwithstanding" Nicholas, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should be at liberty to resort to either means for procuring or enforcing the payment of the principal sum and interest or any part or parts thereof in preference to such other means. What does that mean? "But that notwithstanding what"? I think it means notwithstanding the fact that the parties to deed have agreed that as between Ridley on the one hand and the copyhold premises and the owners for the time being on the other hand the copyhold premises were to be the primary fund and the covenant merely collateral security, yet Nicholas was to be entitled to enforce his remedies in any order he might choose.

This might be quite easily expressed as between Ridley and Nicholas without any mention of the relation of Ridley to the copyhold premises or the owners for the time being. I think that the more reasonable interpretation to put upon this proviso is to say that it means, although Ridley is to have the rights of a surety as against the copyhold premises and the owners for the time being, yet this is not to prejudice the right of Nicholas to enforce his securities, primary and collateral, in any order he may choose. If this is the true meaning, I do not see how it can be carried out—i.e., How Ridley, as between himself and the copyhold premises and the owners for the time being can effectively make the copyhold premises the primary security or treat the covenant as collateral security—unless Nicholas upon payment of of the principal and interest was bound to assign to Ridley the £1,500 mortgage.

It cannot be said that principal and interest in this proviso means the £2,500 as well as the £1,500, nor do I think that it could be said that either the request of Ridley to Nicholas to pay off the £1,500, or the interest of Ridley as tenant for life, makes it wrong to give this construction to the proviso.

This construction, in my judgment, makes it unnecessary to consider the question raised in Farebrother v. Wodehouse and other cases as to how far the rights of a surety may prejudice the right of a mortgagee to tack or consolidate, or how far the rights of the mortgagee to tack or consolidate may prejudice the right of the surety who pays off the mortgage debt to have the benefit of the mortgage securities. The relative rights of the parties in this deed are, in my judgment, defined by the deed of 1874 itself when properly construed. The observations which I have made as to the request of Ridley and his interest as tenant for life apply equally to the objection that until Ridley gave the collateral covenant no one had incurred any personal liability to pay the principal and interest, but the land itself was the only security.

I think that this appeal should be allowed on the grounds which I have mentioned, which were not argued or discussed before Byrne, J.

ROMER, L.J., concurred in the judgment delivered by Stirling, L.J.

STIRLING, L.J.—The question on this appeal is whether (as the learned judge in the court below has held) the plaintiffs have the right as against the defendants to tack a security dated the 21st of April, 1842, to a security which bears date the 2nd of July, 1821, and was by a deed dated the 21st of March, 1874, transferred to William Nicholas, the testator of the plaintiffs. To the last-mentioned deed, one Samuel Ridley, the defendants' testator, was a party, and thereby covenanted for the payment of the principal and interest secured by the deed of the 2nd of July, 1821. The defendants allege that Samuel Ridley joined in the deed as a surety, and that they, as his representatives, having paid the principal and interest in question, are entitled to all the rights of sureties, and in particular to have a transfer to themselves of the securities for the debt so paid in the hands of the plaintiffs.

The deed of the 2nd of July, 1821, was a mortgage by one Richard Ridley to William Stringer of certain copyholds to secure £1,500 and interest.

The deed of the 21st of April, 1842, was a mortgage by one George Ridley to William Nicholas of the equity of redemption of the copyholds comprised in the deed of the 2nd of July, 1821, and of certain additional real estate by way of security for the sum of £2,500 and interest.

In March, 1874, Samuel Ridley, already mentioned, was tenant for life of all the real estate comprised in the securities of 1821 and 1842, and the security of 1821 had become vested in two persons named J. H. Law and J. Carder. The circumstances which led to the execution of the deed of 1874 are thus stated in the last of the recitals contained in that instrument: [His lordship read the recital, and continued:] Nothing further is known with reference to the transaction, which on the face of the deed itself was not one of suretyship on the part of Samuel Ridley in the ordinary sense in which that term is used—viz., as denoting an engagement to answer for the debt of another person. The debt of £1,500, for which the security was originally given, was contracted by Richard Ridley in 1821, and he died not later than the beginning of 1830. It does not appear whether he left any personal estate out of which the persons entitled to his real estate might, according to the law in force, have required payment of his debt. If such personal estate existed in 1830, it is highly improbable that it was available in 1874. Further, it does not appear whether in March, 1874, there existed any legal personal representative of Richard Ridley; if there was such a representative he was no party to the deed of the 21st of March, 1874, or the transaction of which that was the result and embodiment. So far as that transaction is stated in the recital it seems to be one in which Samuel Ridley took on himself the obligations of a principal debtor rather than a surety; but the true nature of his liabilities and rights must be determined upon a consideration of the terms of the whole deed. Now, on this point the most relevant parts of the deed are the covenant for payment and the proviso by which it is followed. The covenant is that of a person taking on himself the obligations of a principal debtor; if any of the rights of a surety were given to Ridley, he obtained them by the first two clauses of the proviso. These clauses are, according to the ordinary grammatical construction of them, governed by the introductory words "as between the said S. Ridley, party hereto, his heirs, executors, and administrators, estates and effects, on the one part, and the said copyhold premises of the other part," and whatever rights he thereby acquired exist only as thereby limited. This appears to be made quite clear by the third clause of the proviso, viz., "but that notwithstanding, the said William Nicholas, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, shall be at liberty to resort to either means for procuring or enforcing payment of the said principal sum and interest or any part or parts thereof respectively in preference to such other means," so that Nicholas thereby reserved to himself and his representatives full right to deal with the security acquired by the deed of the 21st of March, 1874, as he saw fit.

The effect of the whole proviso therefore appears to me to be that Samuel Ridley preserved as against remaindermen whatever rights he might have on paying the principal sum of £1,500 to resort for recoupment to the property of those remaindermen, but as between himself and Nicholas was a principal and not a surety. The legal consequence which flows from this relationship is thus stated by Lord Selborne in Duncan Fox & Co. v. North and South Wales Bank, 29 W. R. 863, 6 App. Cas. 1, p. 11: "If, so far as the creditor is concerned, there is no contract of suretyship, if the person who has (in fact) made himself answerable for another man's debt is, towards the creditor, no surety but a principal, then I think that the creditor would not be subject to those special obligations which were disclosed by Lord Truro in Owen v. Homan, 3 Mac. & G. 370, and would not generally have his power of dealing with his securities circumscribed and restricted in the manner described by Wood, V.C., in Newton v. Chorlton, 1 W. R. 266, 10 Hare 646, and by Lord Romilly and the Lords Justices in Peare v. Deacon, 5 W. R. 702, 793, 24 Beav. 186, 1 De G. & J. 461." The case of Newton v. Chorlton is a leading authority in support of the rights claimed by the plaintiff in the present action.

In my opinion the defendants have not established that their testator was entitled to the rights of a surety as against William Nicholas, the plaintiffs' representative, and consequently this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Solicitors, Chester & Co., for A. H. Thorne-Pudsey, Trowbridge; Sole, Turner, & Knight, for Cooper & Haslewood, Bridgnorth.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Byrne, J. } Jan. 28.

In re FOX.
WODEHOUSE v. FOX. (a.)

Will—Construction—Advancement—Duty to account.

A testator's will gave his widow a power of appointing his residuary estate among his children, and also contained advancement and hotchpot clauses. Four children survived him. During his widow's lifetime, advances, which purported to be made under the advancement clause, were made to one of the children. The widow, by her will, appointed the estate among her children equally.

Held, that the hotchpot clause had no application, and that there was no intention that the advanced sums should be brought into account by the advanced child.

This was an adjourned summons taken out by the trustees of the will of Charles Fox, who died on the 20th of October, 1883, to determine whether, according to the true construction of the will, the sum of £705, advanced to his son Raymond Fox, out of the said Raymond Fox's share, should be brought into hotchpot.

By his said will, testator bequeathed his residuary estate upon trust to pay the income to his widow for life, and, on her death, to his children (naming them) or other issue, as his wife should by will appoint, and, in default, among the children living at his death. There was a proviso for hotchpot and an advancement clause.

Four children survived the testator, of whom Raymond Fox was one.

Two sums, amounting in all to £705, were advanced to Raymond Fox during his mother's lifetime, both of which purported to be advances made under the power of advancement contained in testator's will.

By her will, dated the 22nd of June, 1898, testator's widow recited the power of appointment under testator's will and appointed the estate in equal shares among all her children, settling the shares of the two sons, but leaving those of the two daughters unsettled. Raymond Fox's share was settled on him for life and afterwards on his children. Two codicils were added, neither of which affected the question here raised. The widow died on the 9th of July, 1901. The four children survived her.

Humphreys, for the trustees.

Crossfield, for Raymond Fox.—The amount of these advances was to all intents and purposes withdrawn from the settlement: In re Gosset, 19 Beav. 529, 4 W. R. Dig. 88; Lawrie v. Bankes, 6 W. R. 244, 4 K. & J. 142.

Harman, for the three children.

BYRNE, J.—It is argued that this son Raymond ought to bring into account a sum equivalent to the advances so as to equalize the shares of the children. The hotchpot clause has no reference to the matter, and there is no general equity that a person who has been advanced should repay the sum advanced in such circumstances as these. The question really is whether, looking at the appointment which has been made, there was an intention that such advancement share should be brought into account. In re Gosset, where the will contained a power of appointment and a power of advancement and a hotchpot clause which was not applicable to the latter, makes it clear that such advancement share is taken out of the settlement altogether. And in Lawrie v. Bankes it was held, there having been an advancement made to purchase a commission in the army for an infant, who sold the commission three months afterwards, that the proceeds of the sale, in the absence of fraud, belonged to the infant, although the trustees' object in exercising the power had failed ab initio.

(a.) Reported by PERCY WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Looking at the will of this lady, I can find nothing upon it which would induce me to say that she has made an appointment of what at that time constituted her husband's estate, so as to ensure the bringing of the amount of the advances into account.

There is nothing unreasonable in the decision I have come to, for it is always in the power of the appointor to appoint so as to ensure that an advance shall be brought into account. As I read her will the widow intended to appoint the funds so that Raymond should not be liable to account for the £705.

Solicitors, Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson, for Osborn, Ward, Vassall, & Co., Bristol; C. E. S. Whitford.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 20, 26.

In re KING.
TRAVERS v. KELLY. (a.)

Will—Testamentary expenses—Settlement estate duty—Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19, sub-section 1.

A mere direction in a will that the executors are to pay testamentary expenses out of residue, does not extend to settlement estate duty and is not an express provision that it is not to be borne by the settled property within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 19 of the Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28).

Originating summons.

John King, the testator, who died on the 26th of March, 1899, by his will, gave to each of his sons, J. W. King and H. M. King, a legacy of £12,000 "free of all duties," and to his daughter A. M. C. King (now the defendant A. M. C. Kelly) and two other sons a legacy of £20,000 each, the expression "free of all duties" not being repeated in the case of the last mentioned legacies. The will then directed that the legacy of £20,000 given to the testator's daughter should be retained by the trustees appointed by the will and held upon the same trusts as the daughter's share of residue. The testator further devised his residuary real and personal estate upon trusts for conversion, and directed that out of the proceeds of sale the trustees should pay his funeral and "testamentary" expenses and debts and legacies and the legacy duty thereon, and should stand possessed of the residuary trust funds in trust for his daughter A. M. C. King, and two younger sons, A. H. King and A. P. King. The will then contained a settlement of the daughter's share of residue for the benefit of herself and issue.

The summons was issued by the plaintiffs, the executors and trustees of the will, to determine whether the settlement estate duty, upon the daughter's legacy of £20,000, and upon her share of the residue settled upon her, which had been paid by them, should be chargeable to the residuary estate or should be borne by the settled property.

Stuart J. Bevan, for the plaintiffs.

George Lawrence, for the legatees, A. M. C. Kelly and E. V. A. Kelly.—The settlement estate duty on the legacy and share of residue settled on Mrs. Kelly and Mr. Kelly should be paid out of residue; settlement estate duty is a testamentary expense under the will because it is but a form of estate duty which is a testamentary expense. It is the duty of the executors to pay the settlement estate duty, and since it is their duty it must be an executorship expense which is not distinguishable from a testamentary expense.

He cited In re Leveridge, Spain v. Lejoindre, 50 W. R. 205, [1901] 2 Ch. 830; In re Clemow, Yeo v. Clemow, 48 W. R. 541, [1900] 2 Ch. 182; In re Treasure, Wild v. Stanham, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648; In re Sharman, Wright v. Sharman, 49 W. R. 555, [1901] 2 Ch. 280; Sharp v. Lush, 27 W. R, 528. 10 Ch. D. 468; In re Prince, Godwin v. Prince, 47 W. R. 25, [1898] 2 Ch. 225; In re Dixon, Penfold v. Dixon, 50 W. R. 203, [1902] 1 Ch. 248; In re Maryon Wilson, Wilson v. Maryon Wilson, 48 W. R. 338, [1900] 1 Ch. 565.

J. Rolt, for the residuary legatees.—Settlement estate duty must, under the Finance Act, 1896, s. 19, sub-section 1, be paid out of the settled property unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary. Estate duty on real estate is not a testamentary expense because the executor is not bound to pay it in order to obtain probate; nor is it analogous to probate duty, which the executor formerly had to pay before probate. A testamentary expense is one which the executor is bound to incur as incidental to the proper performance of his duty as executor; he only pays settlement estate duty for the convenience of the revenue authorities, and is made accountable for the payment of it before payment of the property on which it is chargeable. In this respect his duty is similar to his duties with regard to legacy duty, for which he is also accountable. Testamentary expenses cannot include legacy duty. The duty should be borne by the settled property, as the will contains no direction to the contrary.

He cited In re Lewis, Lewis v. Smith, 48 W. R. 426, [1901] 2 Ch. 176; In re Duke of St. Albans, Loder v. Duke of St. Albans, 49 W. R. 74, [1900] 2 Ch. 873; In re Maryon Wilson.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts as above: Mrs. Kelly contends that the executors and trustees ought to pay out of residue the settlement estate duty on the £20,000 legacy and share of residue, settled on her and her issue; the owners of the other two-thirds shares of residue contend that the duty must be borne by the settled property. Having regard to the provisions of section 19, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1896, the settlement estate duty must be paid out of the legacy and share of residue, unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary; the gift "free of all duties" does not apply to the £20,000 legacy. Reliance was, however, placed upon the direction in the will to pay "testamentary" expenses out of residue, and it was urged that the case of In re Leveridge, Spain v. Lejoindre, decided that settlement estate duty was "estate" duty; and that In re Clemow, Yeo v. Clemow, decided that estate duty was included in a direction to pay testamentary expenses, and therefore that settlement estate duty was a "testamentary" expense and ought in the present case to be paid out of residue. It was, however, pointed out by Kekewich, J., in In re Clemow, that estate duty upon personal property takes the place of probate duty, and In re Treasure, Wild v. Stanham, the same judge stated that the previous decision was based solely on the reasoning that, as payment of estate duty was essential to obtaining a grant of probate, that duty must be considered as much a testamentary expense as any other payment necessarily or properly incurred by the executors for that purpose. It is clear that probate duty was a "testamentary" expense. [His lordship cited Davies v. Fowler, L. R. 16 Eq. 308.] On the other hand, it has been held that estate duty on real estate is not a testamentary expense, as executors are not bound to pay it in order to obtain probate (In re Sharman, Wright v. Sharman). Settlement estate duty is not payable in order to obtain probate, sub-section 2 of section 19 of the Finance Act, 1896, allowing in every case six months after death within which it may be paid, and in my opinion it has no analogy to probate duty. Then how can settlement estate duty be considered a "testamentary" expense? In Sharp v. Lush Sir George Jessel said that he could not distinguish between executorship expenses and testamentary expenses, and that executorship expenses were expenses incidental to the proper performance of the duty of executor, in the same way as testamentary expenses were, neither more or less. After burying the deceased the first duty of the executors is to prove the will, and formerly the probate duty was, and now the estate duty on personal property is, a payment which must be paid before probate can be obtained, as it must be paid on delivering the Inland Revenue affidavit or affidavit made for probate; the settlement estate duty is not then payable, although the executor is accountable for it, and he must accordingly see that it is paid before parting with the legacy or share of residue or assenting to the bequest; but in like manner the executor is accountable for and liable to pay legacy duty on retaining or paying legacies, and certainly it cannot be contended that a direction in a will to pay "testamentary" expenses would extend to legacy duty on legacies not otherwise expressed to be given free of legacy duty. In In re Lewis, Lewis v. Smith, it was held that a direction in a will to pay "testamentary expenses including all duties payable by law out of my estate," did not include settlement estate duty; again, in In re Duke of St. Albans, Loder v. Duke of St. Albans, where the will contained a direction to pay funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, legacies, and annuities out of residue, and charged the real estate with any deficiency, it was held by Stirling, J., that the settlement estate duty on certain contingent legacies which were to be treated as settled must be borne by the legatees in accordance with In re Maryon Wilson. In my judgment, a direction to pay testamentary expenses does not extend to settlement estate duty, and therefore the will in question does not contain any express provision within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1896, s. 19, sub-section 1. The duty must be borne by the settled property.

(a.) Reported by H. STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Sole, Turner, & Knight; Arthur H. King.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 15.

HORAN (Appellant) v. HAYHOE (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Tax on "male servant"—Apprentice—Lad apprenticed to be trained as riding groom—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 14), s. 19 (3).

By an indenture of apprenticeship the respondent agreed to teach B. to be a riding groom. The term of the contract was seven years. The respondent undertook to find B. in clothing, food and lodging, and to pay him certain wages, and B. undertook to obey all lawful orders given him by the respondent. B. was engaged for the greater portion of each day in the performance of duties which would, if he were merely engaged otherwise than under the said contract, render a licence necessary for him as a male servant. An information under section 19, sub-section 3, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869, was preferred by the appellant against the respondent for employing B. as a male servant without taking out a licence. The magistrates dismissed the information, being of opinion that the contract was one of apprenticeship, and that B. was an apprentice and not a male servant within the Act.

Held, that the decision of the magistrates was right, and that the words of the Act were not sufficient to bring the case within it.

This was a case stated by justices sitting at Newmarket, in the county of Suffolk.

On the 27th of February, 1903, an information was preferred by the appellant, an Inland Revenue officer, under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, against the respondent, for that he on the 22nd of January, 1903, at Newmarket did employ without a licence a certain male servant for the employing of whom a licence was required by the statute.

At the hearing of the information no witnesses were called, but the case was argued upon the following admissions:

1. That the person described in the information as a male servant was one Thomas Baldwin.

2. That the said Baldwin was bound to the respondent for a period of seven years under a contract dated the 25th of May, 1897, of which a copy was annexed to and formed part of the case.

3. That the said Baldwin was engaged for the greater portion of each day in the performance of duties which would, if he were merely engaged otherwise than under the aforesaid contract, render a licence necessary for him as a male servant.

4. That the terms and covenants of the contract had since the 25th of May, 1897, been faithfully and honestly carried out and fulfilled by the parties thereto respectively.

5. That the respondent was the employer of the person above mentioned.

The contract was an ordinary apprenticeship contract, whereby, in consideration of the covenants and agreements therein contained, Baldwin, the apprentice, bound himself to serve his master, Alfred Hayhoe, a trainer of horses, from the 25th of May, 1897, for the term of seven years, and the master agreed that during such period he would teach and instruct the apprentice in the arts of a training groom and of riding, and would provide him with food and lodging, and pay him certain stated wages during the last five years of the term, and also would pay the apprentice one-half of any moneys which should be received by the master for fees earned by the riding of the apprentice in races or trials, after deducting a proportionate share of the expenses (if any) that might be incurred in collecting the same.

Upon behalf of the appellant it was contended that the contract had for its main and primary, if not for its sole object, the hiring and service of Baldwin and not his teaching, and consequently that Baldwin was a male servant within the meaning of the statute and not an apprentice, and that even if the contract was an indenture of apprenticeship, Baldwin was a male servant within the meaning of the statute.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the contract was an indenture of apprenticeship, and that Baldwin was an apprentice and not a male servant within the meaning of the statute.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The magistrates found as a fact that the contract was one of apprenticeship, and were of opinion that Baldwin was not a servant within the meaning of the statute, but an apprentice, and they accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts the magistrates had come to a correct determination in point of law.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869, by section 18, enacts that an annual tax of fifteen shillings shall be paid for "every male servant."

By section 19 (3) it is provided that "the term 'male servant' means and includes any male servant employed either wholly or partially in any of the following capacities; that is to say . . . groom, postillion, stable-boy, or helper in the stables . . ." The word "apprentice" does not appear in this sub-section.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the appellant.—The question in this case is whether this boy is a servant within the definition in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869, which enacts that an annual tax shall be paid for "every male servant." Section 19 (3) defines the expression "male servant" as including any male servant employed wholly or partially as, inter alia, groom, stable-boy, or helper in stables. This boy, it is admitted, was engaged the greater portion of the day in duties which, if he were engaged otherwise than under this contract, would render a licence necessary. Therefore we have it that he was performing the duties of a stable-boy, and he therefore comes within the definition of "male servant." [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Does this Act refer to apprentices at all?] No, not at all. By the contract it is agreed that the boy shall serve his master faithfully and obey all his lawful commands whenever required, and under the contract he did stable-boy's work and received wages for doing that work. It cannot make any difference if, in addition to acting as a servant to his master, he is apprenticed to him and is doing the work in order to learn his business. He is still a servant. The history of the previous Acts relating to apprentices shows that they were treated as servants, and they were specially mentioned therein. The present Act is the first one in which apprentices are not mentioned. They were mentioned in the prior Acts to avoid their coming under an exemption as regards servants in trades or callings by which the master got his living; when that general exemption was dropped it became unnecessary to mention the word apprentice.

He referred to 17 Geo. 3, c. 39, ss. 2 and 4; 21 Geo. 3, c. 31; 25 Geo. 3, c. 43; 38 Geo. 3, c. 41; 42 Geo. 3, c. 37; and 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, Schedule C, r. 4.

Scott-Fox, K.C. (Hodgson with him), for the respondent.—Looking at the Act of 1869 alone, one asks oneself for what purpose the word "servant" is put in if it is intended to have no meaning beyond that of the word "person." The earlier Acts referred to taxed all sorts of persons, but generally excluded traders. The scope of recent legislation is to tax merely servants who are appendages of an establishment. The tax is a tax merely upon servants, and not a tax upon apprentices. First, the man must be a servant, and, next, he must perform the duties which are enumerated in section 19 (3), or similar duties, by whatever name he may be called; that is to say, if he does the duties of a footman, and if he is also a servant, you will not excuse him by calling him a private secretary. He must first of all, however, be a servant. There is in the statutes a distinction between "person" and "servant," and where a statute means to include "apprentices" it uses the word "person." In the present case the boy is an apprentice and not a servant. The main object of the contract in this case is that the boy shall receive instruction; the definition of an apprenticeship contract is that the main object of it is that one party is to teach and the other to learn. The justices have found as a fact, having regard to the contention before them on behalf of the appellant, that the primary or sole object of the contract was the hiring and service of the boy, that this contract was an apprenticeship contract. The only way a person can be taught a trade is by his doing the work of that trade under the direction of his master. The meaning of the word "servant" in the statute is the ordinary meaning of the word "servant" in the English language. If a man be asked "how many servants" he keeps, that means servants whose business it is to serve him, and not persons towards whom he has a duty of teaching. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.: Has this point never arisen before?] No; certainly not since the Act of 1869.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The facts in this case, I think, are not sufficient to bring the particular employee within the taxing Act. I think it is at any rate a wholesome principle, which has often been recognized, that taxing Acts must be distinct and fairly reasonably clear as to what objects are intended to be taxed. I confess the general impression produced upon me by the earlier statutes was that they did think it necessary to insert provisions to bring apprentices within an enumeration of servants practically identical with this. For instance, one of the earlier Acts says: "The aforesaid duties shall extend to apprentices other than apprentices who were compulsorily forced upon the masters." Therefore, so far as the earlier legislation helps us at all—and I do not think it helps us very much—I think it does not assist the contention of the Solicitor-General, for the Crown. If we look at the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 90, which is practically the same for this purpose as 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, I think there was a reason for using the word "servant," and that under ordinary circumstances the person to be taxed was to have the relation of servant to the master. That is not conclusive, because, as the Solicitor-General has properly pointed out, though he may be called by another name, yet, if he does wholly or partially perform those duties, he may still come within the word "servant." That, I think, leads one to the final point as to what this contract was. A contract such as this, is not necessary for the mere hiring of a groom, and I think, in all probability, although the Solicitor-General said the contract was in the interest of the trainer—so that the lad might not go away if he became a good rider—there is quite as much to be said on the other side that it is in the interest of the lad so that he may be kept a sufficient time to enable him to learn his work properly if he turns out slow to learn or not industrious. I think the way the magistrates have put it is right (although, I understand, they had no evidence before them), that they regard this contract as a contract of apprenticeship, meaning that the real object was a contract that the boy should be taught to be a riding groom, and not merely to be a stable-boy and employed as a stable-boy for seven years. That being so, I think the decision is right, and that the words of the taxing Act are not sufficient to bring the boy employed under this agreement within the charging section simply because in the ordinary course of his training he does what he must do in order to learn his business—namely, perform the duties of a groom for a considerable part of the day. I therefore think the appeal ought to be disallowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. It seems to me on the whole, in construing this taxing Act, the contract of apprenticeship may not improperly be relied upon as supporting the decision of the magistrates.

You have to find a person who is a male who is doing certain classes of work and certainly doing that work as a servant to a master, in order to bring him within the Act. Now, supposing one asks an apprentice whether he is doing so, he would say, "I am not a servant, I am an apprentice." He would not mean that as an apprentice he may not be doing this class of work to a certain extent, but he would mean that his relationship to his employer is one of apprenticeship and not of service, carrying with it special incidents, and as a particular and distinctive incident that of being entitled to education, as well as to board or wages which a master pays his servant. Unless the Act makes it clear that it not merely includes a male person who is employed in these capacities, but also includes a person who is an apprentice as distinguished from a servant in the nature of the contract between them, I think it fails to include persons in the position of this young man in this case.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for respondent, Ruston, Clark, & Ruston' for A. H. & A. A. Ruston, Newmarket.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 17, 1903.

COOPER v. HAWKINS. (a.)

Crown—Prerogative—Highways—Locomotives—Speed of—Locomotives Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 83), s. 4.

The Crown is not bound by an Act of Parliament, unless it is expressly or by necessary implication named therein.

Held, that a driver of a locomotive belonging to the Crown, and acting under the orders of the Crown, was not subject to the Locomotives Act, 1865, and was not liable to a penalty for exceeding the rate of speed fixed by section 4.

Case stated by five justices of the petty sessional division of Odiham, in the county of Southampton.

The appellant appeared before the justices sitting at Aldershot within the said division on the 12th of March, 1903, on an information laid by the respondent charging that he, on the 26th of February, 1903, did unlawfully drive a certain locomotive propelled by steam along a certain public highway there situated—to wit, Wellington-avenue—at a greater speed than two miles an hour—to wit, at a speed of about three miles an hour, contrary to section 4 of the Locomotives Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 83).

The following facts were proved or admitted before the magistrates:

The appellant was a civilian and had for six and a-half years been, and then was, employed and paid by his Majesty's Secretary of State for the War Department on behalf of his Majesty, with the rating of leading engine driver. The respondent was a superintendent of police in the Hampshire constabulary stationed at Aldershot.

On the 26th of February, 1903, at about 5.30, the appellant was driving a locomotive with one truck attached along Wellington-avenue, in the town of Aldershot, at a speed of over three miles an hour.

The locomotive was the property of his Majesty, and appellant was driving the locomotive in the course of his duty as such servant as aforesaid, and in accordance with the instructions of his superior officer, the coal in the truck being required for use that night in the balloon factory. If the appellant and the locomotive were subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Locomotives Act, 1865, then the appellant was guilty of an offence under that section. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the said section did not apply to the appellant as being a servant of the Crown, or to the locomotive as being the property of his Majesty and being driven in manner aforesaid in the service of his Majesty.

The justices were of opinion that the section applied to the appellant and the locomotive, and convicted the appellant.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts stated above the justices ought to have acquitted the appellant.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the appellant.—The magistrates came to a wrong decision. Unless there is express mention of the Crown in the Act of Parliament it is not bound by it.

He cited R. v. Cooper, 3 T. R. 46; Hornsey Urban District Council v. Hennell, 50 W. R. 521, [1902] 2 K. B. 73; *Gorton Local Board v. Prison Commissioners.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

---

* GORTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH (Apps.) v. PRISON COMMISSIONERS (Resps.).

(Before DAY and WILLS, JJ., June 17, 1887.)

CASE stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Manchester, raising the question whether the respondents, who were the Prison Commissioners, were bound to conform to a bye-law which had been made by the local authority of the district of Gorton, which was a suburb of Manchester.

Previously to the year 1877 the corporation of Manchester, as a prison authority, had bought a plot of land and before 1877 a prison was erected on the plot which, however, did not cover the whole plot.

Under and by virtue of section 5 of the Prison Act, 1877, the prison was transferred to and vested in one of the principal Secretaries of State, but the legal estate therein, by virtue of section 48 of the Act, was to be deemed to be vested in the Prison Commissioners and not in the Secretary of State, but to be disposed of by such commissioners in such mode as the Secretary of State with the consent of the Treasury might direct.

By an agreement under seal in April, 1880, the corporation (inter alia) granted and confirmed certain rights and privileges to the Prison Commissioners and defined the limits of the prison.

The plot of land was within the district of the Gorton Local Board, which was duly incorporated pursuant to the Public Health Acts. The bye-laws of the local board were made under the powers conferred by the Local Government Act, 1858, and had been duly certified and approved pursuant to the provisions thereof.

One of the bye-laws (No. 26) provided that "No new houses shall be occupied until the house drainage has been made and completed, nor until such house has been certified by the local board or their officer authorized to give such certificate after examination to be in every respect fit for human habitation in his or their opinion"; and by another bye-law a penalty was imposed for breach of the bye-laws.

The 12th bye-law contained an exception as follows: "The following buildings and works shall be exempt from the operation of these bye-laws: common gaols, prisons, houses of correction, and places of confinement connected therewith and other public buildings belonging to justices of the peace."

In the year 1886 the Prison Commissioners decided to erect two blocks of houses with other buildings and appurtenances on the triangular plot of land capable of being used as twenty separate dwellings. Such houses were intended for and were used as officers' quarters for the use of the prison, and were Russell, K.C. (G. W. Ricketts with him), for the respondent.—Where the Act is for the benefit and protection of the public there is a clear implication the Crown should be bound.

He cited Comyn's Digest, title Parliament, R, 8; Bacon's Abridgment, title Prerogative, E, 5.

No reply was called for.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Upon the general question of when statutes should or should not be held to bind the Crown, I do not think I can add anything to what I said in the Hornsey case, a judgment concurred in by my brothers Darling and Channell, and in which I tried, as far as I could, to see what authorities bore upon the matter that were really of importance. I do not see any reason to express myself differently to the way in which I expressed myself at p. 81 ([1902] 2 K. B.) in that judgment, which was approved of by my brothers Darling and Channell.

If it should be thought necessary to report this case, I think it is very important that those parts of the judgment in the Gorton case (see foot-note) which have been read—I mean the judgments of Day, J., and my brother Wills, J.—should be reported, because I think they are of very great value upon this question. They proceed upon rather different considerations to those which we had before us in the Hornsey case, and I think that they are a very valuable contribution to the law on this matter if it be not considered to be sufficiently plain.

Therefore, upon the general question of what statutes do or do not bind the Crown, I do not wish to add anything. I do not overlook that which I ventured to refer to in that particular case, that there may be general provisions of a public character which may bind the Crown; and the point, if any point of difficulty arises, in this case is that which Mr. Russell has contended for—that section 4 of this Act, being a section prohibiting the use of a locomotive upon a road above two miles an hour, must be held to be enacted for the public safety, and therefore the object of the Act being to protect the public, on those principles to which he has referred, ought to be held to bind the Crown. Without in any way throwing the least doubt upon what I have said or what I have endeavoured to repeat, I cannot myself regard such a section as this as coming within that category. If I compare it with the provision which was the subject of consideration in the Gorton case, this section seems to be far less of that character of section than the one then under consideration—namely, that the building should not be used occupied by prison officers No plans had been submitted to the local board of these officers' quarters before the erection. After their erection the local board applied to the governor of the prison to inspect the officers' quarters for the purpose of ascertaining if they were fit for habitation pursuant to the 26th bye-law. No inspection of these quarters by the local board had been made or permitted to be made by the governor or the Prison Commissioners. Each and all of them had refused to give such permission, and denied the right of the local board to require compliance on their part with its bye-laws. [The position of these quarters in relation to the prison was then described in the case.] Rent was paid by the officers occupying the quarters, but the amount thereof was sometimes fixed with reference to the amount of salary received. The officers for whom quarters were provided in these houses were required by the Prison Commissioners to reside there for the better discharge of their official duties.

---

The local board took proceedings against and summoned the Prison Commissioners for having erected these houses or buildings before obtaining a certificate from the local board, as required by the 26th bye-law.

The magistrate held that the Prison Commissioners were officers under the direct control and acting by the authority of the Secretary of State, who represented the Crown, and that the triangular plot of land, was vested or deemed to be vested in the commissioners for the purposes of the Crown, and that, as the Crown was not named in the Public Heath Acts, the bye-laws of the local board did not apply. He also found that the triangular plot and the buildings erected on it formed part of the prison within the meaning of the Prison Act, 1865, and of the 12th of the bye-laws, and he accordingly dismissed the summons.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether there was evidence that the triangular plot and the buildings thereon formed part of the prison as defined by the Prison Act, 1865, s. 4, and the Prison Act, 1877, s. 60; (2) whether, the land and buildings being vested in the Prison Commissioners for the use of the Secretary of State for public prison purposes, the bye-laws were applicable thereto; and (3) whether, under the circumstances above set forth, penalties for breach of the bye-laws could be enforced against the Prison Commissioners.

Charles, Q.C., and Heywood, for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard E. Webster, Q.C.) and R. S. Wright, for the respondents.

The parts of the judgment dealing with the question whether the plot of land and the buildings thereon formed part of the prison are omitted.

DAY, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the magistrate at Manchester, who held, upon a summons taken out by the Gorton Local Board against the Prison Commissioners, that the Prison Commissioners were not liable to a penalty by reason of their having erected certain buildings for the purposes of habitation without a certificate from the officer of the local authority at Gorton. The question which is raised upon this appeal is, first of all, whether these buildings, these houses, are a prison or part of the prison, and therefore within the exception provided by No. 12 of these local bye-laws. And, secondly, it has been argued before us that, whether these buildings constitute a prison or not, they are not within the jurisdiction, if I might so say, of the local authority, and are not even within the scope of these bye-laws, because they are not within the provisions of the Public Health Act, or within the competence, therefore, of the local board under its bye-laws. The first question which has been argued, and the one which I will deal with first, is whether these houses constitute a prison or a portion of a prison. [His lordship held upon this point that the houses were in no sense part of the prison within the meaning of the bye-laws; and after stating that he was merely considering the word "prison" within the meaning of these bye-laws, said: "I am clearly of opinion that, having regard to the situation of these houses, and the use that is made of these houses, and the object of the houses, they cannot in any sense be said to be a prison, or part of a prison."] So far on that point my decision would be in favour of the local authority, and, if the matter rested there, I should be of opinion that the magistrate had arrived at a wrong decision, and that his decision ought to be reversed. But upon the other point I entertain a different opinion; I entertain the same opinion that was entertained by the magistrate in reference to what was argued before him. I am clear that, having regard to this second point, the decision of the magistrate must be upheld. It is clear to my mind that this is State property It is property belonging to the State, and it is property, therefore, in my judgment, over which the local authority can have no control whatever. It is property provided by the Crown, if I may use that expression, for the purposes of the Crown, and it is occupied by the servants of the Crown, and, in my judgment, that property is to be entirely under the control of the Crown, and is not to be controlled by local authority. There is certainly in the Public Health Act no express mention of the Crown, so as to bind the Crown; and there is certainly no necessary implication that the Crown itself is to be bound. In the absence of express words the Crown is not to be bound, nor is the property of the Crown to be affected except by necessary implication. There are many cases in which such implication does necessarily arise, because otherwise the legislation would be unmeaning; and to give it meaning you are obliged to consider that it is intended to apply to the Crown. That is what I understand by "necessary implication." Here the Crown is not mentioned, and no necessary implication of any sort or kind arises; and it is clear that the Crown, by its officials, is quite competent to provide for the sanitary condition of these houses. It is quite competent to do all that it thinks fit in the matter, and the State is not to be controlled—that is, to my mind, a matter of the greatest public interest—in the disposition of the property entrusted to the State for State management, by any local authority whatever. I am clearly of opinion that on this second ground the decision of the magistrate must be upheld, and the appeal dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that this building is part of the prison. [His lordship dealt with that point, and proceeded:] But then comes a far more important and far more serious question—namely, whether the bye-laws were intended to apply at all to property held unless properly inspected by a sanitary authority. To my mind it is quite obvious when you are dealing with a statute which gives power to a local authority to make bye-laws and regulations, and which limits the speed of these locomotives to two miles an hour, there are many considerations which might make it a proper thing for such a regulation to be passed under ordinary circumstances, besides the paramount importance of public safety. Speaking only for myself, I do not think that that section, looking at its language and its objects and at the power the local authorities had to vary it, can be said to be a general enactment of the character to which Mr. Russell referred.

That being so, what are the facts in this particular case? I had better read paragraph 5 that I may not accidentally misstate them, or state them in other words than the magistrate has found them. "The locomotive so driven by the appellant as aforesaid was the property of his Majesty and the appellant was driving the said locomotive in the course of his duty as such servant"—that was as an authorized driver—"and in accordance with the instructions of his superior officer." Now, I wish myself to emphasize that which has been pointed out by the learned Solicitor-General in his argument, that no question of nuisance arises here, no question of anything being done which was unnecessary, and no question of an individual act by the driver apart from the performance of his duty as a servant of the Crown, using the property of the Crown and under the direction of the Crown. Therefore the personal element of what a man may be charged with, either civilly or criminally, in consequence of his own conduct, in my opinion cannot be justly and properly raised in this case, which I think has been most fairly argued by Mr. Russell. He does contend that, in order to justify the conviction there must be a prohibition against the use of a locomotive by anybody, including the Crown authorities, and a locomotive belonging to the Crown, at a speed above two miles an hour. If that is the proposition, I think that this statute is not one which binds the Crown; and that, in a case which negatives any suggestion of individual conduct constituting the offence, which solely comes before us with reference to the use of a Crown locomotive by a Crown servant in the performance of military duties, as being a breach of the statute, we ought to hold that the section does not prohibit that act and does not bind the Crown in that sense.

I think it is not necessary to say at length, but it for public purposes in the manner and under the circumstances under which this property is held, whether by the Secretary of State or by the Prison Commissioners. I leave that ambiguous purposely, because, notwithstanding Mr. Wright's very definite statement that they are vested in the Prison Commissioners, there seems to me to be room for considerable doubt upon that matter, if it were material. But in my judgment it is not material. One has to look at the substance of the thing; and, whether the legal estate be in the Prison Commissioners or in the Secretary of State, it is clear that this is property of the Crown in the sense in which that expression has always been used when questions of this kind arise as to rateability of property, or as to other incidents and burdens upon property in respect of which the Crown may claim exemption because it is the Crown. And it seems to me clear that it is property which is held by either the Secretary of State or the Prison Commissioners as State property, and in that sense it is Crown property. It is property held and administered by the Crown for the service of the public. In my judgment, however anxious one may naturally be, and ought to be, to confine the application of the prerogative within its legitimate limits, it seems to me that it is clear, from authority and from principles which are established beyond all cavil and dispute, that the Crown is not bound, unless it is expressly or by necessary implication named; and, of course, necessary implication is exactly the same thing as being expressly named, except in the mode of expression. It comes to the same thing and effects the same end as the express mention of the Crown. How can it be said here that there is a necessary implication of the Crown being bound? It is not necessary, as it seems to me, for the very purposes of the public health and public good, which are intended to be served by the Public Health Act, that this jurisdiction should be vested in the local board. In the year 1865 substantially the same legislation with regard to the possibility of the enactment of bye-laws by local boards was in existence, and in the year 1865 was passed this Prison Act, which enacts, amongst other things, by section 26, that the Secretary of State "may approve of the plans submitted to him with or without modification, or may disapprove of the same." And there is no doubt that the subject-matter to which these plans may relate is large enough to cover such buildings as these. There is, therefore, a great, high, and responsible officer of State in whom is vested the discretion of approving or disapproving of such plans, and in whom was vested that discretion at a time when these bye-laws, and many other bye-laws of a similar character, must have been in force under the Local Government Act of 1858. Can anybody suppose that it was intended that the approval of the Secretary of State should not be effectual, and that because the locus in quo was situated within the area of the jurisdiction of a local board, although the Secretary of State approved the plans, the plans which he approved of should not be followed out. It seems to me something like an absurdity to suppose such a thing, and there is certainly as much reason in supposing that the Legislature would give credit to the Secretary of State that he would do his duty and would see that the great interests of the health of the public were regarded, as in supposing that the local board in each district would do its duty. The protection of the public is as complete and as effectual under the approval or disapproval of the Secretary of State as it would be under the approval or disapproval of the local board. That was the state of things down to 1875. In 1875 the present Public Health Act was passed, and that repealed all the prior legislation. It may be true that legislation took, in a certain sense, a fresh departure in point of form from that period; but can anybody, who is familiar with the course of legislation and the history of these Public Health Acts, suppose that, simply because the Act of 1875 is subsequent to the Prison Act of 1865, it was intended that there should be any change wrought in the effect of legislation in this respect? It seems to me to be quite impossible, and it seems to me that the Public Health Act of 1875 leaves untouched this prior legislation applicable to prisons in general; and although this place was not popularly a prison, yet it certainly was, under the Prison Act of 1865, a prison subject to the provisions of that Act; and it seems to me that it is impossible to suppose that it was intended to take away from the Secretary of State that jurisdiction which he had before, finally and authoritatively and effectually, to approve, if he chose, of the plans which were to be submitted to him. It is suggested by Mr. Charles, and one was naturally struck with the argument at first, that we find a particular saving clause with regard to some portion of the rights of the Crown in section 327 of the Public Health Act, and therefore that it may be presumed that all other exceptions of the Crown were intended to be done away and to be given up. I think that when one comes to look at the nature of the Public Health Act generally, and especially when one has regard to the considerations which I have already dealt with with regard to specific matters and the fact of an approval being already vested in the Secretary of State under exactly similar legislation, it is impossible to suppose that the saving clause, although limited as it is, was meant to give up everything else. It is always a question of circumstances, and it is often a question not quite free from difficulty, whether a particular clause is put either in an Act of Parliament or in any other instrument ex majori cautelâ, or whether it is put in for the purpose of limiting the application of its provisions, which otherwise might be supposed to extend beyond its own limits. It is seldom easy to say without a good deal of consideration which class of interpretation ought to be put upon it. It seems to me that, looking at the very great alteration which would be made in the status of Crown property all over the kingdom, if we were to hold that this exception of the rights of the Crown was intended to give up everything else, it cannot be supposed that that really was the intention. I think that that clause was put in simply ex abundanti cautelâ, and not in order to express that that was the sole common law right of the Crown which would be preserved. For these reasons it does not become necessary to express any opinion as to whether the Prison Commissioners or the Secretary of State would be formally the proper persons to bring before the magistrates, if there were anybody to be brought before the magistrates, because I am of opinion that these proceedings cannot in any shape succeed against the Crown, or against the Prison Commissioners, or against anybody concerned in this matter.

is perfectly obvious there must be many occasions when in the performance of military duties it would be absolutely necessary for locomotives to be driven at a greater speed than two miles an hour. I only mention that, not for the purpose of enforcing the argument, but of pointing out why there is no general public principle why such a section, so worded and giving such powers as it does, should be held to bind the Crown.

I am therefore of opinion that this appeal ought to be allowed and the conviction quashed.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking that the fact that the section would, at the will of the local authorities, subject the persons who are engaged in the performance of duties of this kind to liabilities which at the time this Act was passed could not be known or foreseen is a strong argument against the supposition that the Crown consented beforehand to allow itself to be bound by an Act of Parliament, which provided for bye-laws which might be imposed by local authorities afterwards. I do not know that there is any decision on that point. I rather think there is not. I know that in factory cases the question has arisen from time to time. And I happen to know that some years ago the London County Council wanted to apply their bye-laws as to streets to the buildings which had been built on the Chelsea Hospital property, and the Crown objected, and said it was not bound by bye-laws of that kind, and I know that the London County Council gave way. Therefore it is a kind of question which has arisen, and as to which it seems to me that the fact of there being a power for a local authority to make bye-laws is a strong argument, I do not say it is conclusive—there may be other considerations which outweigh it—but it is a strong argument against holding that the Crown is bound by the section which contains such provisions.

Then I agree with my lord that this is not one of those enactments of paramount importance to public safety, which require that a great public department should be responsible if its servants in the performance of their duty, and acting under orders, should exceed the rate of speed which is provided for. I cannot help thinking that many of the considerations which were relied upon in the judgments of my brother Day and myself in the Gorton case (see footnote) are quite correct in principle and are founded upon very sound reasons. I cannot help thinking that they apply here, and apply, it seems to me, with rather more than usual force, because this is an Act of Parliament which, if it binds the Crown, must bind all the great departments of State, no matter what they are, and therefore must bind the military department. Now, the military department is of that character that to have this kind of interference with it might hamper the services of that portion of the army which was then required exceedingly. Occasionally soldiers are required—not as performing in one sense military duties, although under military command—to perform civilian duties and to act as good citizens by helping to put down disturbances and to keep the peace. Under such circumstances there may be a very paramount necessity for great speed being used in the conveyance of materials, and of what is wanted for the performance of the duties which they are ordered to undertake in order simply to preserve the public peace. An army cannot exist, at least it cannot exist for any useful purpose, without there being opportunities for manœuvring and practising, which could not be carried out on any large scale if regulations of this kind were to be enforced and to hamper them at every turn in the performance of their duty.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is not an enactment which ought to be held to bind the Crown.

Of course that does not exhaust the case, because it might perfectly well be that though the Crown is not bound by the enactment, and though the man was driving an engine which belonged to the Crown and to nobody else, yet the act of over-driving might be his own personal act. It might be under such circumstances as my brother Channell suggested—viz., that of the man being drunk or in a condition in which he certainly would not be performing a public duty, and was not acting in accordance with superior orders; but in this case certainly that consideration does not arise. When I heard paragraph 5 of the case read I certainly understood, and I do not see any reason to depart from that understanding now, that it stated that the excess of speed was in conformity with orders. It may be that they were not orders specifically to go more than three miles an hour, but he was told, as I read it, that the coal was to be conveyed before nightfall to a particular place, and as I understand the paragraph to mean, or else there is no meaning in it, it was necessary in order that that should be done that he should go at a pace which exceeded the limits imposed by the local bye-law. If so, this is a case beyond all doubt in which the act of the man is the act of the Crown. If so, there cannot be any question, assuming that we are right in holding that this section does not bind the Crown, that the conviction was wrong.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the respondent, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Baker, Winchester.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wright, Kennedy, Darling, and Phillimore, JJ.) — Nov. 27.

REX v. ROUSE AND BURRELL. (a.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Statement by prisoner that prosecutor is a liar—"Imputations on the character of the prosecutor"—Cross-examination of prisoner as to character—Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), s. 1 (f) (ii.).

At the trial of a prisoner upon an indictment he was called as a witness, and in his cross-examination counsel for the prosecution asked him whether a statement made by the prosecutor was the truth or an invention. In reply, the prisoner said: "No; it is a lie, and he is a liar."

Held, that the answer of the prisoner was not such as to "involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor" within the meaning of section 1 (f) (ii.) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, so as to render the prisoner liable to be asked in cross-examination, and be required to answer, questions as to any previous convictions or as to his bad character.

Case stated for the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

This case was tried before the Hon. John De Grey, sitting as chairman of the Suffolk Quarter Sessions at Ipswich.

The prisoners were indicted for conspiring together with other persons unknown, by means of various false pretences, &c., to induce Thomas John Wright to sell to the prisoner Burrell a certain mare.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the prosecutor's evidence he stated that in April, 1902, the prisoner Rouse offered to buy the mare of him on credit for the sum of £19.

The prisoner Rouse was called, and in his cross-examination was asked by counsel for the prosecution, "Did you ask the prosecutor to sell you the mare in April for £19, or has he invented all that?" The prisoner replied, "No; it is a lie, and he is a liar."

Counsel for the prosecution then proposed to ask the prisoner if he had not been in trouble before.

Counsel for the defence objected that on the mere statement that the prosecutor was a liar, evidence as to the character of the prisoner was inadmissible, there being no other attack made on the prosecutor or his witnesses.

The learned chairman admitted the evidence, and the prisoner Rouse replied that he had been convicted of being quarrelsome, that he had been before the magistrates for drunkenness, and fined fifteen shillings or £1 for breaking a window.

The prisoners were convicted and sentenced, Rouse to one month's imprisonment with hard labour, and Burrell to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The learned chairman made no allusion to Rouse's character in summing up the case, and he did not consider that the answers that he gave as to his character had any effect upon the issue.

If the court should be of opinion that the evidence was improperly admitted, then the conviction was to be quashed; if otherwise it was to be affirmed.

Section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, provides that: "Every person charged with an offence . . . shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings. . . Provided as follows: . . . (f) A person charged and called as a witness in pursuance of this Act shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, or is of bad character, unless—

"(i.) The proof that he has committed or been convicted of such offence is admissible evidence to show that he is guilty of the offence wherewith he is then charged; or

"(ii.) He has personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establish his own good character, or has given evidence of his good character, or the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution; or

"(iii.) He has given evidence against any other person charged with the same offence."

Ernest E. Wild, for the prisoner Rouse.—The evidence was improperly admitted. The fact that, in the opinion of the learned chairman, the prisoner's answers to the questions as to his character had no effect upon the issue is immaterial to the question: Reg. v. Gibson, 35 W. R. 411, 18 Q. B. D. 537; Reg. v. Saunders, [1899] 1 Q. B. 490, 47 W. R. Dig. 46. The question put to the prisoner whether he had been in trouble before is clearly one which cannot be asked unless it comes within section 1 (f) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898. The answer that the prisoner made was nothing in the "nature or conduct of the defence such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor" within this section. The nature or conduct of the defence means the general trend of the defence. This answer was given in answer to a question which provoked such an answer. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I don't see at present why it is anything more than negativing the charge. Suppose he had said, "It is not true, but I would rather not say what the prosecutor is."] Or suppose he had said that that was a question for the jury. In Reg. v. Marshall, 63 J. P. 36, where the charge was one of rape, and the defence was consent, Day, J., admitted evidence of bad character, but such evidence was wrongly admitted. [The Court here stopped the learned counsel.]

A. W. Bagge, for the prisoner Burrell, was not called on.

Walter Stewart, for the prosecution.—The case does not disclose all that transpired. If the answer given by Rouse had been an isolated answer it might only amount to an emphatic way of saying "Not guilty," but that was not the fact. The case does not deal with the whole of the facts as they came out at the trial. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We can only deal with the case as stated. It does not appear that any other attack was made upon the prosecutor or his witnesses.] That being so, I am not able to argue the case further.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Having regard to what Mr. Stewart has said, it is important that it should be made quite plain that we are giving our decision on the statement of the case before us, and not laying down any general rule. We cannot go outside the case. Here all we have to decide is whether such an answer as is put before us in the case is sufficient to allow cross-examination as to character. The facts in the particular case were these: The prisoners were indicted for conspiring to obtain a mare by false pretences. The prosecutor having stated that Rouse had offered to buy the mare on credit for £19, Rouse, when he came up to give his evidence, was asked the question, "Did you ask the prosecutor to sell you the mare in April for £19, or has he invented all that?" to which he replied, "No; it is a lie, and he is a liar." Of course if the words "or has he invented all that" referred to other matters, different questions might arise. All we have to deal with, however, is the answer as stated in the case. I think that the answer was only an emphatic way of saying "Not guilty," and therefore by itself was not sufficient to bring the case within section 1 (f) (ii.) of the Act. The defence in a criminal case necessarily involves the allegation that the charge is not true, and a denial of the charge itself is not sufficient to allow cross-examination of the prisoner as to character. This evidence having been improperly admitted, the conviction of both prisoners must be quashed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. To my mind, merely to deny the facts alleged by the prosecutor is not necessarily an attack on the prosecutor's character. Here, when asked in cross-examination whether the prosecutor had invented all his story, Rouse did no more than he had a right to do—namely, in an emphatic way, deny the truth of the charge. He merely said of one man what the Psalmist in his haste said of all.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree. I think it would be very dangerous to allow a sort of general question to be put in cross-examination, "Is it all invention?" and then, when the prisoner, desiring to make good his defence, allowed himself to say more than was necessary, to follow that up by cross-examination of the prisoner as to past conduct. It would practically be doing away with the Act of Parliament.

Upon the case as stated I am of opinion that these convictions must be quashed.

Both convictions quashed.

Solicitors for the prisoners, Dubois & Williams, for Chamberlin & Taylor, Lowestoft.

Solicitors for the prosecution, White, Borrett, & Co., for Westhorpe, Cobbold, & Ward, Ipswich.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (Ireland). July 3, 1903.

FULLERTON AND ANOTHER v. PROVINCIAL BANK OF IRELAND. (a.)

Mortgage—Equitable mortgage—Deposit of title deeds with letters—Subsequent mortgage—Registration—Priority—Consideration—Irish Registry Act (6 Anne, c. 2).

Equitable charges on land are within the Irish Statute of Anne (6 Anne, c. 2).

S., whose account with the respondent bank was overdrawn, was being pressed by their manager to reduce his overdraft. At that time S. had contracted to purchase an estate, and S. undertook by letter to lodge the deed of conveyance, when executed, with the bank for the purpose of securing his overdraft, and further wrote for forbearance and that he would put his account in order. Later on, in 1895, the estate was conveyed to S., subject to a mortgage (as to which there was no question), and he shortly afterwards deposited the conveyance with the respondent bank without further memorandum, and no registration of letters or any other document was made. The charge of the appellants (trustees of S.'s marriage settlement) was created by a deed of mortgage dated and registered in 1896. The appellants had no notice of the bank's transaction with S.

Held, that forbearance was for a reasonable time extended to S., who expressly or impliedly asked for it, and that the letters amounted to a valid charge in equity which attached to S.'s interest in the estate when the property was conveyed to him, and constituted a transfer of his interest by way of security to the bank; that this was a conveyance within the Registration Act (6 Anne, c. 2), and not having been registered must be postponed to the appellants' registered mortgage.

Alliance Bank v. Broom, 2 Dr. & Sm. 289, approved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, sub. nom. In re Stevenson's Estate, [1902] 1 Ir. Rep. 23, reversed.

Appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (FitzGibbon and Holmes, L.JJ., Walker, L.J., dissenting), reversing that of Meredith, J., sub. nom. In re Stevenson's Estate, [1902] 1 Ir. Rep. 23.

The facts appear in the judgments of their lordships.

J. O. Wylie, K.C., D. Henry, K.C., and R. E. Osborne (all of the Irish bar), for the appellants.

The Solicitor-General for Ireland (J. H. Campbell, K.C.), J. Gordon, K.C., and G. W. Walker (all of the Irish bar), for the respondents.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The point raised by this appeal is a short point, and not, I think, one of any great difficulty. The appellants and the respondents are both equitable incumbrancers on certain property in Westmeath known as the Portlemon estate, and there is a contest for priority between them. The Portlemon estate has now been sold. But at the commencement of the contest the equity of redemption was vested in a Colonel Stevenson, who acquired the property from a Mrs. Treacy; she conveyed it to him in consideration of the sum of £8,000, which was secured on the property by a legal mortgage of even date with the conveyance. The charge of the appellants (who are the trustees of Colonel Stevenson's marriage settlement) was created by a deed of mortgage dated the 29th, and duly registered on the 31st of July, 1896. There is no question as to the validity or the regularity of this mortgage. The charge in favour of the respondents was created or completed by the deposit, on the 15th of July, 1895, of the conveyance to Colonel Stevenson of the Portlemon estate. The charge in favour of the respondents is therefore prior in date to that in favour of the appellants. The respondents' case is that they have not and never had any charge upon the property in question, except the charge created by the mere deposit of Colonel Stevenson's conveyance; that they had therefore nothing to register; that the statute of Anne has no application to their security, and that according to the law laid down in In re Burke, 9 L. R. Ir. 24, they are entitled to the priority which properly belongs to priority of date. The case of the appellants is that the deposit on which the respondents rely was accompanied or preceded by certain letters leading up to the actual deposit, which were sufficient to create and did in fact create a valid equitable charge on Colonel Stevenson's interest in the Portlemon estate; that these letters therefore, or some or one of them, ought to have been registered, and that for want of such registration the claim put forward on behalf of the respondents fails, and their alleged security must be held to be fraudulent and void against holders of a subsequent registered mortgage. The whole question therefore depends on the meaning and effect of these letters. They were written by Colonel Stevenson to the local manager of the Provincial Bank of Londonderry, where Colonel Stevenson's account was kept. The earliest in date is one of the 26th of March, 1895. The others are dated the 18th of May, 1895, the 24th of May, and the 7th of June. When those letters were written the conveyance of the Portlemon estate to Colonel Stevenson was not in existence—the arrangement for the sale of the property to him was in progress. The conveyance was not executed until the 11th of July, 1895. It was registered two days afterwards. I need not trouble your lordships by reading these letters. They were discussed very fully in the judgments of the court below. Throughout these letters, and more particularly in the letter of the 18th of May, Colonel Stevenson is making out a case for indulgence and pleading for forbearance. Apparently the local manager had given him to understand that he himself was likely to get into trouble with the head office over the account, and on the 18th of May Colonel Stevenson writes: "All you require is a little patience and my account will be put upon a satisfactory basis." That was the tone of the letters throughout. In addition it is enough for me to remind your lordships that at the outset of the correspondence, on the 26th of March, 1895, Colonel Stevenson writes: "When I receive the title deeds of the Portlemon property from my solicitors I will have same at once lodged with you." That was a clear and definite statement on which the manager of the bank was apparently intended to rely. From that statement Colonel Stevenson never receded. He never qualified it. On the contrary, he repeated it more than once, and in one letter he refers to it as a thing which he had

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"undertaken." If these letters were serious letters meant to be taken seriously, I cannot doubt that they created a valid charge in equity attaching to Colonel Stevenson's interest in the Portlemon estate the very moment the property was conveyed to him, and carrying over his interest by way of security to the bank. That proposition as a proposition of law was not disputed by the Solicitor-General. But he rested his case on two grounds. In the first place he adopted the view taken by FitzGibbon and Holmes, L.JJ., that these letters had no contractual force, that they were merely friendly letters temporising and intended to put the manager off, that they were of no real importance, and that the transaction which resulted in the deposit must be taken to have commenced on the occasion of the visit of Colonel Stevenson's solicitor to the solicitor of the bank in Dublin on the 11th of July, 1895. I cannot take that view, and I would point out to your lordships that the first three letters are formal business letters beginning "Dear Sir," and addressed to "The Manager, Provincial Bank, Londonderry." The last letter no doubt begins "My dear Mr. Stewart," and contains allusions to private matters. But I am unable to understand how such allusions can detract from the force of a definite assurance on a matter of business, though it be contained in the same letter. The other point on which the Solicitor-General relied was that there was no proof of consideration. The promise, he said, if it was a definite promise, was a nudum pactum. No doubt, he said, Colonel Stevenson had overdrawn his account, but there was no stipulation for forbearance for any definite time. The point does not seem to have been argued in the courts below, though it was suggested and touched upon by FitzGibbon, L.J. This point seems to me to be covered by authority. In such a case as this it is not necessary that there should be an arrangement for forbearance for any definite or particular time. It is quite enough if you can infer from the surrounding circumstances that there was an implied request for forbearance for a time, and that forbearance for a reasonable time was, in fact, extended to the person who expressly or impliedly asked for it. That proposition seems to me to be established by the case of the Alliance Bank v. Broom, 2 Dr. & S. 289, and other cases, among which I may mention Oldershaw v. King, 2 H. & N. 517, with the observations on that case and the case of the Alliance Bank v. Broom by Bowen, L.J., in Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co., 32 Ch. D. 266, and I may add that the proposition seems to be good sense. On the whole, therefore, though I am impressed by the weight which must attach to the deliberate opinion of such eminent judges as FitzGibbon and Holmes, L.JJ., I ask your lordships to adopt the view of Walker, L.J. I therefore move your lordships that the appeal be allowed, and the judgment of Meredith, J., be restored, with costs both here and below.

Lord SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question is one to be determined entirely on the law of equity as settled by the authorities in England and in Ireland, and as bearing on the provisions of the old statute of Queen Anne. It seems to be settled by the authorities that an undertaking in writing to give the title deeds does certainly create a charge in respect of money advanced on the faith of such an undertaking. In this case I think that there is no doubt that by the letters which have been referred to by Lord Macnaghten there was such an undertaking. That being so, the only question which remains is whether in this particular transaction that rule must apply. I am clearly of opinion that it must do so; for I think the effect of the correspondence is to show that there was a large debt due to the bank on the account of Colonel Stevenson which had been overdrawn, and as I gather from the letters there was pressure for the repayment of that debt. In answer to that pressure, those letters were written which led to the forbearance of the bank, and I am of opinion that that is sufficient to meet the argument on the second point.

Lord DAVEY.—It might appear to some people that the policy of the Irish Registration Act was to postpone an unregistered transfer of property to a registered one, whether the non-registration arose from negligence or inadvertence or from the fact of the transfer having been effected without any document being executed which was capable of being registered. I must express my personal regret that it was not so held, but it is too late now for your lordships to interfere with what has become the settled law, and is expressed in In re Burke. I do not think that the learned judges who formed the majority of the Court of Appeal differed from Meredith, J., and Walker, L.J., in the law which they thought applicable to the case; their difference was as to the construction of the letters which passed between Colonel Stevenson and Mr. Stewart, the manager of the bank at Londonderry, in the latter parts of the months of March and May and the beginning of June, 1895. The majority of the court below thought that those letters were only expressed in the language of expectation and hope, and that they did not express any promise or undertaking which might form a contract between Colonel Stevenson and the bank. It appears to me to be important to consider what was the situation at that time. It was this: Mr. Stewart, the manager of the bank at Londonderry, had allowed Colonel Stevenson to overdraw his account to an extent which the directors disapproved, and apparently Mr. Stewart had been instructed by the board at Dublin to press Colonel Stevenson to reduce his overdraft. On the other hand, Colonel Stevenson had at that time contracted to purchase an estate called the Portlemon estate, but it was not conveyed to him. I think Colonel Stevenson clearly undertook by his first letter to lodge the deed of conveyance of the Portlemon estate, when executed, with the bank, for the purpose of securing his overdrawn account, and I think as a matter of law that that was a promise to create an equitable mortgage of the property in favour of the bank. There can be no possible doubt that this promise was accepted by Mr. Stewart on the part of the bank, but it is said that there was no consideration for it. Now, in the letter of the 18th of May (that is, the second letter), Colonel Stevenson writes to this effect, addressing Mr. Stewart: "All you require is a little patience and my account will be put on a satisfactory basis." I think this means: "Exercise patience and some forbearance, and I will give you the required security, and put my account in order." The bank did exercise patience and gave some forbearance by not demanding, as they might have done, immediate payment of the debt, and by giving Colonel Stevenson the required time to effect the security. I think that such forbearance in fact, although there was no agreement by the bank to forbear suing Colonel Stevenson for any definite period, was sufficient consideration to support his promise to give the security, on the principle stated by Kindersley, V.C., in The Alliance Bank v. Broom. The Vice-Chancellor's judgment in that case was quoted with approval by Bowen, L.J., in Miles v. The New Zealand Alford Estate Co., as laying down a sound principle. In the case before Bowen, L.J., the question was whether a guarantee which had been given by the promoter of a company at a general meeting of the shareholders to guarantee a dividend of a certain amount for a certain time on the shares, was given with or without consideration, and in referring to the case before him, Bowen, L.J., said, after quoting the Vice-Chancellor's judgment: "So it will be sufficient here that the directors did forbear, if their forbearance was at the request, expressed or implied, of the guarantor, and in consequence of his guarantee being given, and it seems to me there is no sort of necessity to discover language of any particular form, or writing of any particular character, embodying the resolution of the directors. We must treat the thing in a business way, and draw an inference of fact as to what the real nature of the transaction was as between business men." That seems to me to be directly applicable to the present question. There can be no doubt that the forbearance was given in this case, and I think it is a just inference of fact that it was given at the request of Colonel Stevenson in consequence of his undertaking to secure the account, and place it on what he describes as a satisfactory basis. However, on this question of consideration I should like to add one word of my own. In the course of the argument I threw out the suggestion that an antecedent debt might be sufficient consideration to support a promise to give security. On reflection I think this was wrong, and the Solicitor-General gave the right answer—viz., that the promise implied by law from the debt was to pay it on request, and a new consideration is required in order to support a different contract, as was stated by Parke, P., in the case of Hopkins v. Logan, 5 M. & W. 241. I am therefore of opinion that the letters, reading them together, constituted a contract to create an equitable mortgage on the Portlemon estate as soon as the conveyance to Colonel Stevenson was completed. On that event taking place the contract became absolute and bound the property in his hands. The letters therefore constituted a transfer to the bank of the equitable interest in the property and constituted a conveyance within the meaning of the Registration Act. It ought therefore to have been registered in order to secure the priority of the bank, and not having been registered, I think that the appellants who claim under a subsequent instrument which was registered are entitled to priority over the bank in respect of their advance.

Lord ROBERTSON.—This case has been decided by the Court of Appeal on the construction of the four letters of Colonel Stevenson which have been referred to. Now, I find it impossible to read the letter of the 26th of March, 1895, otherwise than as a distinct undertaking to lodge the title deeds as soon as they should be completed. The subsequent letters, so far from detracting from or throwing doubt on the intention and effect of this first letter, are addressed mainly to explaining the delay which had occurred in the execution, and therefore in the deposit, of the promised title deeds; they all recognized what one of them in terms described as an undertaking; but the importance of those subsequent letters seems to me to lie in the corroboration which they afford of what primâ facie is the natural construction of the letter of the 26th of March, 1895. Accordingly, I do not encounter the difficulty which FitzGibbon, L.J., very justly observes may arise where you have to spell out a contract from several documents. The only remaining question is, Was it in fulfilment of this undertaking that the title deeds were in the end delivered? I at first thought from the account given of the circumstances of the deposit by one of the learned Lords Justices that the respondents had some case to the negative of this question, but the evidence as to delay in lodging the deeds clearly points to an antecedent undertaking in fulfilment of which the title deeds were ultimately delivered and received.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion. First of all comes the legal question whether an equitable charge is within the Irish statute of Anne. English lawyers are quite familiar with the fact that under the English statutes the context of various sections of those Acts show, I think conclusively, that an equitable charge does come within the word "conveyance." I was not myself familiar with the authorities in Ireland, but there is no dispute on the point, and Holmes, L.J., says, I believe perfectly accurately: "It has been long since well settled that the statute of Queen Anne extends to any instrument in writing creating a charge on land." That was more or less doubtful in this country until it was settled by the case of Credland v. Potter, 23 W. R. 36 L. R. 10 Ch. 8; and, looking into the authorities which preceded that, cases may be found both ways. It was settled in that case by a judgment delivered by Lord Cairns, L.C., and James and Mellish, L.JJ., three of the most eminent men who ever sat on the bench in this country; and their decision was arrived at, not by a short cut that the word "conveyance" includes equitable charges, but by studying the subsequent sections of the Act of Anne, which show that the word "conveyance" must be used in a much wider sense than what is commonly called conveyance by deed. Having got that legal question clear, the only other question is, what do these letters really mean? Do they constitute an equitable charge? With the greatest deference to FitzGibbon and Holmes, L.JJ., I cannot doubt that they do. We know the position of the parties, we know that Colonel Stevenson's account at the Provincial Bank was largely overdrawn, and that whether there was pressure or not he was obviously very anxious about it, for that is apparent from the letters. I infer that there was some kind of pressure, and then he writes that letter of the 26th of March, by which he undertakes to deposit the deed when he gets it, as a security for his overdraft. What more you want to constitute an equitable charge I cannot conceive. As regards the difficulty suggested by the Solicitor-General, that it was never so understood or so accepted by the bank manager, the inference which I should draw is that it clearly was. It would in my mind never have been open to the slightest doubt if the deed had been given to him, but unfortunately it was given to Mr. Tweedy, who knew nothing at all about these letters, and so some confusion has arisen about the way in which the deed came to be deposited; but when you look at the letters and consider the circumstances under which the deed was deposited, it seems to me certain that Colonel Stevenson's deposit was a deposit in pursuance of his obligation. As to the charge not having been assented to by the bank, in the first place I take it that it is quite plain that when you offer a person something to his advantage, as, for example, security for a debt, it is to be inferred that he accepts it unless he dissents. I come to the conclusion that this deed being offered to the manager for business purposes, he kept it for business purposes, and it is obvious that you must infer assent. The only other difficulty that was suggested is the want of consideration. That is covered entirely by the case of the Alliance Bank v. Broom. The result is that this appeal must be allowed.

Order of the Court of Appeal reversed; judgment of Meredith, J., restored with costs here and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Wansey, Bowen, & Co., for J. Kelso Reid, Dublin.

Solicitors for the respondents, Farrer & Co., for John Tweedy, Dublin.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) Jan. 25.

BEAUMONT v. KAYE AND WIFE. (a.)

Married woman — Tort committed by wife — Action against husband and wife—Separate and inconsistent defences—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 2.

Section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has not abolished the common law right to sue both husband and wife for a tort committed by the wife during coverture, and in such an action the husband and wife cannot put in separate and inconsistent defences.

A husband and wife were sued in the old common law form of action for a libel written and published by the wife during coverture. One statement of defence was delivered. In paragraph 1 the husband said that so far as he was liable, as the husband of the other defendant, he paid money into court in satisfaction of the claim. In paragraphs 2 to 5 the wife pleaded a denial of liability.

Held, that there could be only one defence to the action —namely, the one which the husband put on the record, and that the inconsistent defence of the wife must be struck out.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers.

The action was brought against husband and wife for libel. The statement of claim alleged that the wife wrote and published of and concerning the plaintiff the alleged libel. There was one statement of defence. In paragraph 1 thereof the husband said that so far as he was liable as the husband of the other defendant he paid into court £5, and said that the same was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim in the action. In paragraphs 2 to 5 the wife admitted that she wrote the words complained of, but denied that she published them. The plaintiff appealed to the district registrar at Leeds to strike out paragraphs 2 to 5 of the defence on the ground that there could be only one defence to the action, and that by ord. 22, r. 1, a defendant in an action of libel could not, with a defence denying liability, pay money into court.

The district registrar held that there were two defendants having two separate defences, and he dismissed the application.

Bucknill, J., on appeal, struck out paragraphs 2 to 5.

The defendants appealed.

T. P. Perks, for the defendants.—A married woman was always personally liable for her torts committed during marriage: Capel v. Powell, 13 W. R. 159, 17 C. B. N. S. 743. The judgment would have gone against her and her husband, and she would have been liable to have been taken under a ca. sa.: Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120, at pp. 124, 127. If she had been sued alone, unless she pleaded coverture, judgment might have gone against her: Weldon v. Winslow, 33 W. R. 219, 13 Q. B. D. 784. There were therefore two liabilities, one in the husband and the other in the wife, and the husband and wife were separate defendants. Section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, allows the wife to sue and be sued alone, and any damages recovered against her are made payable out of her separate property. That left the liability of the husband separate from that of the wife. The wife is entitled to put in a separate defence to protect her separate property. By ord. 9, r. 3, the husband and wife must be served with the writ; and by ord. 12, r. 8, they must both enter an appearance. The rules thus treat them as separate defendants in the action. Seroka v. Kattenburg, 34 W. R. 542, 17 Q. B. D. 177, only decided that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has not abolished the husband's liability to be sued with his wife for her torts committed after marriage. It does not touch the question raised here. The paragraphs ought therefore to remain in.

He also referred to Earle v. Kingscote, 49 W. R. 3, [1900] 2 Ch. 585.

J. A. Compston, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—I see no ground for interfering with the order made by the learned judge. It seems to me that the case becomes perfectly clear when once we come to the conclusion that the old common law action against husband and wife for the tort of the wife committed during coverture still subsists, and if this action is the old common law action everything else follows. It is suggested in a well-known text-book* on the subject that the effect of section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is to do away with the old common law liability of the husband to be sued with his wife for her torts, and that now the action lies only against the wife in respect of her separate property. That very question was raised in Seroka v. Kattenburg, and the Divisional Court decided that the old common law action against husband and wife for the wife's tort still subsists. That case was discussed by this court in Earle v. Kingscote, and it was held that the case was rightly decided. Therefore the old common law action against both husband and wife for the wife's torts committed after marriage has not been abolished. That being so, this statement of claim is carefully framed upon the lines of the old common law action. A tort by the wife is alleged, and the husband is joined simply as a defendant. There is no claim against the wife under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in respect of her separate property. There is only one tort alleged—namely, a tort by the wife, and there can be only one defence pleaded to that claim. There has been pleaded in defence, a payment into court by the husband in satisfaction of the claim, the husband not denying liability. That is an admission by the husband on behalf both of himself and his wife, and it is inconsistent with the other defence which the wife sets up denying publication of the libel. The learned judge was therefore right in striking out those paragraphs of the defence which were inconsistent with the husband's plea of payment into court.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This being a common law action against husband and wife for a tort of the wife committed during coverture, there cannot be separate judgments against the husband and wife. There can be only one judgment against the two. So far as the husband is concerned, he can claim that there shall be no judgment against him and his wife except upon the plea which he puts on the record. If the present statement of defence stands as it was originally delivered, the plaintiff will recover judgment against the husband and wife upon the husband's plea, and there may be an inconsistent judgment upon the wife's separate plea. There can in truth be only one defence, and only one judgment.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*See Lush on Husband and Wife (2nd ed.), pp. 290, 291.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Hamlins, Grammer, & Hamlin, for H. R. Cousins, Leeds.

Solicitors for the defendants. Chester, Broome, & Griffithes, for Craven & Clegg, Leeds.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 14 16; Dec. 21.

CORNBROOK BREWERY CO. (LIMITED) v. LAW DEBENTURE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Brewery business—Debentures—Covering deed before 1900—Specifically mortgaged property—Leasehold acquired after 1900 upon trusts of covering deed —Assignment to company—Sub-demise to trustees of covering deed—Registration of sub-demise—"Charge" —Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 68), s. 14.

Trustees for the debenture-holders of a limited company were empowered by their trust deed, which was executed in 1897, to sell certain property thereby specifically mortgaged and to hold the proceeds upon trust (amongst other things) at the request of the company to purchase or acquire leasehold hereditaments, which were to be held upon the trusts of the specifically mortgaged property. In 1902 a portion of the proceeds of sale of the specifically mortgaged property was, at the request of the company, employed in the purchase of a leasehold public-house. The company took an assignment of the house and then sub-demised the property to the trustees for the whole term except the last day.

Held, that the sub-demise was a specific mortgage or charge upon the property within section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, and must be registered under its provisions.

Decision of Byrne, J. (51 W. R. 508, [1903] 2 Ch. 527), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 51 W. R. 508, [1903] 2 Ch. 527).

The question was whether or not the plaintiff company had, after the commencement of the Companies Act, 1900, created a mortgage or charge for the purpose of securing an issue of debentures within the meaning of section 14 (1) of that Act.

The plaintiff company had issued £140,000 debenture stock, secured by a covering deed in the usual way.

The deed was dated the 17th of February. 1897, and therefore did not require registration under the Companies Act, 1900. It was made between the plaintiff company of the one part and the defendant corporation, as trustees of the debenture stockholders, of the other part.

In the interpretation clause it was provided that "'the specifically mortgaged premises' means the hereditaments and premises specified or referred to in the second schedule hereto, and which are to be assured to or vested in the trustees in accordance with clause 8 hereof, and any other hereditaments, assets, or premises which may become vested in the trustees in pursuance of the provisions hereinafter contained, or which ought to be so vested"; and that "'the mortgaged premises' means and includes the specifically mortgaged premises and the general assets collectively."

Clause 8 provided that "the company shall forthwith assure to and vest in, or cause or procure the freehold and leasehold hereditaments and premises specified or referred to in the said second schedule hereto to be assured to and vested in the trustees upon the trusts hereof free from incumbrances in the manner" therein provided. By sub-section 2 of the same clause leaseholds were "(unless the trustees require the same to be assigned) to be demised to the trustees for the residue of the term for which the same are respectively held except the last three days of each of the same terms."

Clause 9 was: "The company, as beneficial owner, hereby charges in favour of the trustees the specifically mortgaged premises with the payment of the stock and the interest thereon, and all other moneys intended to be hereby secured, to the intent that such charge may be a specific charge, and not a floating charge, for the payment of such moneys."

Clause 10 brought in a certain sum of £30,000 to be invested in the purchase of further properties to be held by the trustees as part of the specifically mortgaged premises.

Clause 11 gave a charge upon all the assets and undertaking of the company for the time being other than the specifically mortgaged premises, but as a floating charge only.

Clause 22 gave powers as regarded the specifically mortgaged premises, and provided that the trustees were to have "full power, at the request of the company, to do or concur in doing all or any of the things following." Then followed a series of powers given to the trustees to deal with the specifically mortgaged premises, including a power of sale and a power of letting on lease, and various other powers.

Clause 23 provided that "the trustees shall hold the proceeds to arise from any sale, letting, exchange, or other dealing with the specifically mortgaged premises under the last preceding clause, which proceeds shall become and be part of the specifically mortgaged premises, upon trust at the request of the company to apply the same if they shall think fit . . . (2) In the purchase or acquiring of any freehold, leasehold, or copyhold hereditaments, or any rights of way, or any easements or rights which may seem suitable for any of the purposes of the company, and which shall be assured to and vested in the trustees."

Clause 26 provided that "all property assured to or vested in the trustees in pursuance of the provisions herein contained shall be held by the trustees upon and subject to the trusts, powers, and provisions hereinbefore declared and contained, and relating to the specifically mortgaged premises, and shall for all purposes be deemed to form part of the specifically mortgaged premises."

The second schedule contained a list of numerous freehold and leasehold public-houses. Part of the specifically mortgaged property was afterwards sold for £2,700, and the company requested the corporation to invest this sum in the purchase from one Margaret Carroll of a leasehold public-house called "The Exile of Erin."

To prevent the corporation from becoming liable to the onerous covenants of the lease the transaction was carried out by an assignment of the term to the company, who granted to the corporation a sub-demise of the remainder of the term less one day.

The assignment was dated the 14th of March, 1902, and was made between Margaret Carroll of the one part and the company of the other part, and by it, in consideration of £2,700 Margaret Carroll assigned "The Exile of Erin" with certain special rights to the company, their successors and assigns, for the term of 1,001½ years, at the rent of £30, and subject to the covenants and conditions therein contained, and on the part of the company to be observed and performed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The sub-demise was dated the 18th of August, 1902, and was made between the company of the one part and the corporation of the other part, and was declared to be supplemental to the trust deed of February, 1897. It recited the indenture of the 14th of March, 1902, and that "The corporation now holds under the trust deed certain moneys, forming part of the specifically mortgaged premises hereunder, upon trust among other things to apply the same, if the corporation should think fit, in the purchase or acquiring of any freehold, leasehold, or copyhold hereditaments which may seem suitable for any of the purposes of the company, and which shall be assured to and vested in the corporation, to be held by the corporation upon and subject to the trusts, powers, and provisions by the trust deed declared and contained relating to the specifically mortgaged premises thereunder." It further recited that this particular public-house was suitable for the purposes of the company and did not form part of the specifically mortgaged premises, and that the corporation had agreed to pay the £2,700 out of the trust funds to the company upon having the premises sub-demised to them in manner hereinafter appearing: And it was witnessed that in consideration of the £2,700 the company, as beneficial owners, demised to the corporation "The Exile of Erin" to be held for the residue of the term of 1,001½ years, except the last day, upon the trusts of the trust deeds as if it had been originally comprised in the trust deed.

The corporation proposed to register the sub-demise as a mortgage or charge under the Companies Act, 1900, s. 14. The company thereupon brought the present action, claiming a declaration that the sub-demise of August, 1902, did not require registration under the Companies Act, 1900, and an injunction to restrain the corporation from registering the deed.

Byrne, J., held that the sub-demise was a specific mortgage or charge within section 14 (1) of the Companies Act, 1900, and must be registered under its provisions. He accordingly dismissed the action.

The company appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal a further affidavit of facts was made under the direction of the court. The effect of this affidavit sufficiently appears from the judgments.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Manning, for the appellants.

Levett, K.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the defendant corporation.

The arguments used were similar to those in the court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

I think that the company has created a mortgage or charge after the commencement of the Act for the purpose of securing an issue of debentures within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Companies Act, 1900.

I agree with Byrne, J., that the result of the evidence is that property which, prior to the execution of the deed in question, did not form part of the specifically mortgaged property as contained in the trust deed thenceforward formed part of the specifically mortgaged property.

This conclusion of Byrne, J., is confirmed by the affidavit of facts made in pursuance of the direction of the Court of Appeal.

Paragraph 8 of that affidavit, showing the grant of the lease on the 14th of March, 1902, and the payment by the company of £2,700, and the payment of the duty as mentioned in paragraph 9, and the date of the underlease as mentioned in paragraph 10, all go to confirm this view, which I think is the right view, although I think with Byrne, J., that probably, if there had been a direct purchase from Margaret Carroll the result might have been different.

ROMER, L.J., concurred in the judgment delivered by Stirling, L.J.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case I am unable to see my way to differ from the judgment of Byrne, J., who has held that the indenture of the 18th of August, 1902, was a mortgage or charge created by the company after the date fixed for the coming into operation of the Companies Act, 1900, and therefore requiring registration in accordance with the provisions of that Act.

It appears from the affidavit which has been filed since the argument on the appeal, that in November, 1901, the company requested the trustees of the covering deed to concur in a purchase at the price of £2,700 of a leasehold public-house for a term of 1,001½ years from the 29th of November, 1901, subject to a ground-rent and onerous covenants, and that the trustees agreed to do so, but about the same time stipulated that the transaction should be so arranged that the property should be sub-demised to them in such a way that they should not be liable under the covenants in the lease. Thereupon the company proceeded to carry out the proposed purchase as between themselves and Margaret Carroll, the lessee; and by an assignment dated the 14th of March, 1902, she, in consideration of £2,700 paid to her by the company, assigned her public-house to the company. This sum of £2,700 was paid by the company out of their own funds. The result of this was that the leasehold became legally vested in the company and constituted part of the assets of the company over which the trustees of the covering deed by virtue of the provisions of that deed (clause 11) acquired a floating, but not a specific, charge. Matters so continued until the 18th of August, 1902, when the company executed and delivered to the trustees of the covering deed, the deed of that date and received in exchange from the trustees the sum of £2,700, part of a sum of money held by them on the terms of the covering deed. In this way the trustees acquired for the first time a specific charge on the property in question—that is to say, a security of a different kind from that which previously existed.

I think with Byrne, J., that the transaction might have been carried out in such a way as to avoid an assurance to the trustees in the nature of a mortgage or charge requiring registration; but that by the events which have actually taken place, the deed of the 18th of August, 1902, does create a mortgage or charge, and ought, therefore, to be registered. Sub-section 4 of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1902, was referred to on behalf of the appellants, but as the requirements of the clause had not been complied with, it does not seem to assist them. The appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Hays, Schmettau, & Dunn; Birchams.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 19.

BENSON v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Accident arising out of and in the course of employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the deceased workman was an engine-driver in the employment of a railway company; that it was his duty to sign on for work at 7.45 every morning at an engine-shed near to which he lived and to which he could get, without crossing the line, by a path running by the side of the line from the road in which he lived; that on the day of the accident he left home at 6 o'clock and went along the line in the contrary direction to a signal-box, which was in the middle of the permanent way about a quarter of a mile distant from the engine-shed, in order to ask the signalman a question about the time of the passing of a train which he was charged with having run late a few days before; and that while he was making his way back along the line from the signal-box to the engine-shed he was accidentally run over by an engine and killed.

Held, that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Blackpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicants for compensation were the dependants of a workman in the employment of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., who met with an accident which resulted in his death.

The deceased was an engine-driver, and it was his duty every morning to go at 7.45 to an engine-shed a little more than a quarter of a mile distant from the Central Station at Blackpool for the purpose of reporting himself and signing on for work. His actual work began at 8.5. He lived not far from the engine-shed, and on the same side of the railway. It appeared that the most convenient way for him to proceed to his work was by going along a road called Rigby-road, which led to a gate giving access to the line at a point near the engine-shed, and between it and the Central Station, and then turning to the left and going along a path which ran by the side of the line and led to the engine-shed. It was not necessary for him, if he went to his work by this way, to cross any rails.

On the 29th of December, 1902, the deceased left home at 6 o'clock in the morning. His daughter stated that this was not earlier than his usual time. He had been called to account with regard to the late running of a particular train on the 16th of December, and had been directed to make a report on the matter, and it seemed that he wished to go to a signal-box which was about a quarter of a mile distant from the engine-shed and quite close to the station, for the purpose of getting information from the signalman as to the time when the train in question passed the box. Accordingly, when he reached the gate, he turned to the right instead of to the left, and made his way to the signal-box, which was situated in the middle of the permanent way, having four lines of rails on the Rigby-road side of it and three lines of rails on the other side. He had some conversation with the signalman, and then, between 6.30 and 6.45, he left the signal-box. At 7.45 he was found lying in the four-foot way about 300 yards from the signal-box having been run over by a pilot-engine and having received very serious injuries from which he shortly afterwards died. The spot where he was found was on the route which he would naturally take on making his way from the signal-box to the engine-shed.

The evidence showed that it was part of the duty of all engine-drivers in the employment of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. to make a daily return, which included a statement of the times when their trains arrived at and departed from every station; and that engine-drivers occasionally asked and received information from the signalmen as to the times of the passing of their trains; but that signalmen were not under any obligation to give such information.

The answer of the railway company to the claim for compensation was that the accident by which the deceased met his death did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

The county court judge found that the deceased left home much earlier than was necessary so far as his duties were concerned in order to make inquiries for his own purposes at the signal-box; that he went out of his way, and put himself in jeopardy by crossing the lines for this purpose; and that, if he had not done so, and had gone direct to his work, no accident would have happened. On the other hand, he found that when the accident happened the deceased was on the premises of the railway company, that he had finished his own business, and that he was on his way to the engine-shed to commence his day's work. He came to the conclusion that the deceased's employment began when he left the signal-box to go to the engine-shed, and that therefore the accident was one arising out of and in the course of his employment. He accordingly made an award of compensation in favour of the applicants.

The railway company appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Acton, for the railway company.—At the time of the accident the deceased was not on his way from his home to his work; neither was he on his way to his work by a route licensed by his employers; neither was he passing over any portion of his employers' premises which he had to pass over in order to get to his work.

They cited Holness v. Mackay & Davies, 47 W. R. 531, [1899] 2 Q. B. 319; Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 47 W. R. 146, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141; and Smith v. Normanton Colliery Co. (Limited), 51 W. R. 209, [1903] 1 K. B. 204.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Adshead Elliott, for the applicants.—There was ample evidence that the deceased was on the company's business when he went to the signal-box. At any rate the finding of the county court judge is conclusive that he was on the company's business when he left the signal-box to go to the engine-shed.

They cited Holmes v. Great Northern Railway Co., 48 W. R. 681, [1900] 2 Q. B. 409; Goodlet v. Caledonian Railway Co., 4 Fras. 986; Tod v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1 Fras. 1047; and Pomfret v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., ante, p. 66, [1903] 2 K. B. 718.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by the dependants of a man in the service of a railway company who met his death by an accident on the line. The question is whether the railway company are liable.

The deceased man was an engine-driver on the line, and he lived a short distance—as I understand, between a quarter and half a mile—from the engine-shed where it was his duty to report himself and begin his work every morning at 7.45. He had recently been in some trouble with the company by reason of having been late in the running of a train on a particular occasion, and he had been called upon to make a report on the matter. On the morning of the day of the accident he left home earlier than was necessary in order to get to the engine-shed at 7.45. His home was in a road called Rigby-road, and his natural way of approaching the engine-shed in order to commence his daily work was to go along Rigby-road until he came to a gate which gives access to the line, and then to follow a path to the left which runs along the side of the line and leads to the engine-shed without involving any necessity for crossing any of the rails. When he arrived at the gate, instead of turning to the left to take the path leading to the engine-shed, he turned to the right and went to a signal-box which is at a point along the line in the contrary direction to the engine-shed, and which is in the middle of the line, having rails on each side of it. He went to the signal-box, as it appears, for the purpose of asking the signalman a question as to the precise time of the passing of the train with regard to which he had been called to account. After having some conversation with the signalman, he went along the line straight in the direction towards the engine-shed. An hour or so later he was found lying on the four-foot way very seriously injured, and he died shortly afterwards. When he met with the accident he had gone more than half the distance from the signal-box to the engine-shed.

Under these circumstances an application for compensation was made on behalf of his dependants, and the county court judge decided in favour of the applicants. The conclusion at which he arrived, and his reasons, are stated in a judgment which is now before the court. He begins by stating his conclusion with regard to the facts. This is as follows: That the deceased left home much earlier than was necessary so far as his duties were concerned, in order to make inquiries for his own purposes at the signal-box; that he went out of his way and put himself in jeopardy by crossing the lines for this purpose; and that, if he had not done so, and had gone direct to his work, no accident would have happened. That is his finding of the facts. But he continues that, on the other hand, when the accident happened the deceased was on the premises of the railway company, that he had finished his own business, and that he was on his way to the engine-shed to commence his day's work. And he concludes that on the whole he thinks that the deceased's employment began when he left the signal-box to go to the engine-shed, and that, therefore, the accident was one arising out of and in the course of his employment.

After having carefully considered the matter, and having regard to the facts found by the learned county court judge, I feel that it is impossible to agree with his conclusion as a matter of law that the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment. The county court judge found that the deceased went to the signal-box for his own purposes, not for any purposes incident to his duty as an engine-driver. He, in fact, went for his own purposes in the opposite direction to that in which he would have gone if he had gone straight to the engine-shed. After leaving the signal-box he had to cross the line, and he thus incurred risk in order to get at the point at which, when he had arrived there, he would enter upon his employment for the day. Until he got to that point he had not entered into his employment. It seems to me that it is true to say of a person who is in an employment to which this Act applies that during the time he is bound to work he carries with him all the privileges conferred by the Act. But when he leaves his work at the end of the time during which he is bound to work, he is in the same position as a person who is not within the Act at all—that is to say, he is not entitled to any protection at the hands of his employers. Whatever he then does he does at his own risk, and he does not carry with him any right to be insured by his employers against accidents. It is on the facts clear that the place where the deceased had to enter on his work was the engine-shed. It was necessary for him to get there every morning in order to resume his ordinary daily occupation. If he chose to go there by a dangerous route, instead of taking the path by the railway, he did so at his own risk. The county court judge has found that that was what he did. The finding in effect is that the deceased went out of his way and put himself in jeopardy for his own purposes by crossing the line instead of going by the safe way. One would have thought that that would have concluded the matter in favour of the employers. But the learned judge goes on to give reasons for coming to a conclusion contrary to what one would have expected from his finding of facts. In my opinion, the fallacy in the learned judge's judgment is where he says that he thinks that the deceased's employment began when he left the signal-box. Clearly this is not a finding of fact. There is no ground for suggesting, and the learned judge negatives the suggestion, that the deceased was under any duty to go to the signal-box at all. It cannot, therefore, be said that his employment began so as to put him at the risk of his employers when he left the signal-box. It cannot be said that he had entered his employment merely because he was on the premises of the company. A workman in the service of a railway company cannot enter into his employment so as to make the time of his employment begin at whatever point he chooses to enter upon the line. It is not necessary to examine precisely the area or limits of the place of the deceased's employment, but it certainly cannot be said to extend so as to include the signal-box or the place where he was found lying injured. On the admitted facts I am of opinion that the conclusion at which the county court judge has arrived is wrong in point of law. His mistake is that he has treated the deceased's employment as beginning at the signal-box, whereas there is nothing to show that it began till he reached the place where he had to report himself—viz., the engine-shed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is to my mind clear that, in the circumstances of this case, the employment of the deceased man began at or about the engine-shed. The conclusion arrived at by the county court judge would lead to this, that at any point at which the deceased man chose to enter upon the railway line he would have been in the employment of the railway company. It was suggested that he went to the signal-box because he had been called upon to make a report as to the late running of a train, and that, therefore, he was on the line in the course of his employment when he met with the accident. But the finding of the county court judge is conclusive that the deceased man went to the signal-box to get information for himself and not in pursuance of any order from the company. It is therefore, in my opinion, impossible to treat the transit from the signal-box to the engine-shed as any part of the employment.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the company, C. Moorhouse, Manchester.

Solicitors for the applicants, Indermaur & Brown, for C. W. Callis, Blackpool.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) July 13, 14, 15; Aug. 11, 1903.

KRELL v. HENRY. (a.)

Contract—Impossibility of performance—Implied term—Substance of contract—Surrounding circumstances.

By a contract in writing the defendant agreed to hire from the plaintiff a flat in Pall Mall for the 26th and 27th of June, 1902, on which days it had been announced that the Coronation processions would pass along Pall Mall. The defendant paid a deposit at the time of the contract. The contract contained no reference to the processions or to any particular purpose for which the flat was hired. The processions not having taken place, the defendant declined to pay the balance of the agreed rent.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover the balance of the rent, inasmuch as the taking place of the processions must in the circumstances be held to have been the foundation of the contract, and the parties had not at all in their contemplation the risk that the processions might not take place on the dates fixed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Darling, J.

The facts, which were not disputed, were as follow: The plaintiff, Paul Krell, on leaving the country in March, 1902, instructed his solicitor to let his suite of chambers at 56A, Pall Mall, on such term and for such period not exceeding six months as he thought proper.

On the 17th of June, 1902, the defendant saw an announcement in the windows of the plaintiff's flat to the effect that windows to view the coronation processions were to be let. The defendant interviewed the housekeeper on the subject. It was represented to him that a good view of the processions could be obtained from the premises, and he eventually agreed with the housekeeper to take the suite for the two days in question for £75.

On the 20th of June the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor: "I am in receipt of yours of the 18th inst., including form of agreement for the suite of chambers on the third floor at 56A, Pall Mall, which I have agreed to take for the two days, the 26th and 27th inst., for the sum of £75. For reasons given you I cannot enter into the agreement, but as arranged over the telephone I inclose herewith cheque for £25 as deposit, and will thank you to confirm to me that I shall have the entire use of these rooms during the days (not the nights) of the 26th and 27th inst. You may rely that every care will be taken of the premises and their contents. On the 24th inst. I will pay the balance—viz., £50, to complete the £75 agreed upon." On the same day the defendant received the following reply from the plaintiff's solicitor: "I am in receipt of your letter of to-day's date inclosing cheque for £25 deposit on your agreeing to take Mr. Krell's chambers on the third floor at 56A, Pall Mall for the two days, the 26th and 27th of June, and I confirm the agreement that you are to have the entire use of these rooms during the days (but not the nights), the balance £50 to be paid to me on Thursday next, the 24th inst."

The processions not having taken place on the 26th and 27th of June, the defendant declined to pay the balance of £50.

The plaintiff then brought the present action to recover the balance.

The defendant denied liability and counterclaimed for return of the deposit.

Darling, J., gave judgment for the defendant on the claim and counterclaim.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

On the appeal the defendant abandoned his counterclaim for £25, so that the sole question was as to his liability for the £50.

Spencer Bower, K.C., and Holman Gregory, for the plaintiff.—Darling, J., has held that this case was governed by Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826, and that there was an implied term in the contract that the procession should take place. But here there has been no physical extinction of the subject-matter, and the performance of the contract was quite possible. The right possessed by the plaintiff on the 20th of June was the right of looking out of the window of the room. That right he transferred to the defendant, who took the risk of there being no procession.

They also cited Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 15 W. R. Common Law Dig. 127; Boast v. Firth, 17 W. R. 29, L. R. 4 C. P. 1; Bailey v. De Crespigny, 17 W. R. 494, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180; Howell v. Coupland, 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q. B. D. 258; Nickoll v. Ashton, 49 W. R. 513, [1901] 2 K. B. 126; Paradine v. Jane, Ab. 26; Barker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 267; Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487; Hills v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 253; Brown v. Royal Insurance Co., 7 W. R. 479, 1 E. & E. 853; Kennedy v. Panama, &c., Mail Co., 15 W. R. 1039, L. R. 2 Q. B. 580; In re Arthur, Arthur v. Wynne, 28 W. R. 972, 14 Ch. D. 603; The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 31, 14 P. D. 64; London Founders' Association (Limited) v. Clarke, 36 W. R. 489, 20 Q. B. D. 576; Turner v. Goldsmith, 39 W. R. 547, [1891] 1 Q. B. 544; Hamlyn v. Wood, 40 W. R. 24, [1891] 2 Q. B. 488; Ashmore v. Cox, [1899] 1 Q. B. 436, 47 W. R. Dig. 41; Blakeley v. Muller, [1903] 2 K. B. 760 note, 51 W. R. Dig. 40; and Kerrison v. Smith, [1897] 2 Q. B. 445, 46 W. R. Dig. 36.

Duke, K.C., and Ricardo, for the defendant.—The real question is what was the bargain? We submit that it was a bargain to take rooms to see the procession, and was entered into on the assumption that the procession would pass. Taylor v. Caldwell governs the present case.

Holman Gregory replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The real question in this case is the extent of the application in English law of the principle of the Roman law which has been adopted and acted on in many English decisions, and notably in the case of Taylor v. Caldwell. That case at least makes it clear that "where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continued existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be considered a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." Thus far it is clear that the principle of the Roman law has been introduced into the English law. The doubt in the present case arises as to how far this principle extends. The Roman law dealt with obligationes de certo corpore. Whatever may have been the limits of the Roman law, the case of Nickoll v. Ashton makes it plain that the English law applies the principle not only to cases where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, but also to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things, going to the root of the contract, and essential to its performance. It is said, on the one side, that the specified thing, state of things, or condition the continued existence of which is necessary for the fulfilment of the contract, so that the parties entering into the contract must have contemplated the continued existence of that thing, condition, or state of things as the foundation of what was to be done under the contract, is limited to things which are either the subject-matter of the contract or a condition or state of things, present or anticipated, which is expressly mentioned in the contract. But, on the other side, it is said that the condition or state of things need not be expressly specified, but that it is sufficient if that condition or state of things clearly appears by extrinsic evidence to have been assumed by the parties to be the foundation or basis of the contract, and the event which causes the impossibility is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made. In such a case the contracting parties will not be held bound by the general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to a possibility of a particular event rendering performance of the contract impossible. I do not think that the principle of the civil law as introduced in the English law is limited to cases in which the event causing the impossibility of performance is the destruction or non-existence of some thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, or of some condition or state of things expressly specified as a condition of it. I think that you first have to ascertain, not necessarily from the terms of the contract, but, if required, from necessary inferences drawn from surrounding circumstances recognized by both contracting parties, what is the substance of the contract, and then to ask the question whether that substantial contract needs for its foundation the assumption of the existence of a particular state of things. If it does, this will limit the operation of the general words, and in such case, if the contract becomes impossible of performance by reason of the non-existence of the state of things assumed by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract, there will be no breach of the contract thus limited.

Now what are the facts of the present case? The contract is contained in two letters of the 20th of June which passed between the defendant and the plaintiff's agent, Mr. Cecil Bisgood. These letters do not mention the coronation, but speak merely of the taking of Mr. Krell's chambers, or, rather, of the use of them, in the daytime of the 26th and 27th of June, for the sum of £75, £25 then paid, balance £50 to be paid on the 24th. But the affidavits, which by agreement between the parties are to be taken as stating the facts of the case, show that the plaintiff exhibited on his premises, third floor, 56A, Pall Mall, an announcement to the effect that windows to view the Royal Coronation procession were to be let, and that the defendant was induced by that announcement to apply to the housekeeper on the premises, who said that the owner was willing to let the suite of rooms for the purpose of seeing the royal procession for both days, but not nights, of the 26th and 27th of June. In my judgment the use of the rooms was let and taken for the purpose of seeing the royal procession. It was not a demise of the rooms, or even an agreement to let and take the rooms. It is a license to use rooms for a particular purpose and none other. And in my judgment the taking place of those processions on the days proclaimed along the proclaimed route, which passed 56A, Pall Mall, was regarded by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract; and I think that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties, when the contract was made, that the coronation would not be held on the proclaimed days, or the processions not take place on those days along the proclaimed route; and I think that the words imposing on the defendant the obligation to accept and pay for the use of the rooms for the named days, although general and unconditional, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards occurred. It was suggested in the course of the argument that if the occurrence, on the proclaimed days, of the coronation and the procession in this case were the foundation of the contract, and if the general words are thereby limited or qualified, so that in the event of the non-occurrence of the coronation and procession along the proclaimed route they would discharge both parties from further performance of the contract, it would follow that if a cabman was engaged to take someone to Epsom on Derby Day at a suitable enhanced price for such a journey, say £10, both parties to the contract would be discharged in the contingency of the race at Epsom for some reason becoming impossible; but I do not think this follows, for I do not think that in the cab case the happening of the race would be the foundation of the contract. No doubt the purpose of the engager would be to go to see the Derby, and the price would be proportionally high; but the cab had no special qualifications for the purpose which led to the selection of the cab for this particular occasion. Any other cab would have done as well. Moreover, I think that, under the cab contract, the hirer, even if the race went off, could have said, "Drive me to Epsom; I will pay you the agreed sum; you have nothing to do with purpose for which I hired the cab," and that if the cabman refused he would have been guilty of a breach of contract, there being nothing to qualify his promise to drive the hirer to Epsom on a particular day. Whereas in the case of the coronation, there is not merely the purpose of the hirer to see the coronation procession, but it is the coronation procession and the relative position of the rooms which is the basis of the contract as much for the lessor as the hirer; and I think that if the King, before the coronation day and after the contract, had died, the hirer could not have insisted on having the rooms on the days named. It could not in the cab case be reasonably said that seeing the Derby race was the foundation of the contract, as it was of the license in this case. Whereas in the present case, where the rooms were offered and taken by reason of their peculiar suitability from the position of the rooms for a view of the coronation possession, surely the view of the coronation procession was the foundation of the contract, which is a very different thing from the purpose of the man who engaged the cab—namely, to see the race—being held to be the foundation of the contract. Each case must be judged by its own circumstances. In each case one must ask oneself, first, what, having regard to all the circumstances, was the foundation of the contract? Secondly, was the performance of the contract prevented? Thirdly, was the event which prevented the performance of the contract of such a character that it cannot reasonably be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract? If all these questions are answered in the affirmative (as I think they should be in this case) I think both parties are discharged from further performance of the contract. I think that the coronation procession was the foundation of this contract, and that the non-happening of it prevented the performance of the contract; and, secondly, I think that the non-happening of the procession, to use the words of Sir James Hannen in Bailey v. De Crespigny, was an event "of a such character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, and that they are not to be held bound by general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happened." The test seems to be whether the event which causes the impossibility was or might have been anticipated and guarded against. It seems difficult to say, in a case where both parties anticipate the happening of an event, which anticipation is the foundation of the contract, that either party must be taken to have anticipated, and ought to have guarded against, the event which prevented the performance of the contract. In both Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 169, L. R. 10, C. P. 125, and Nickoll v. Ashton, the parties might have anticipated as a possibility that perils of the sea might delay the ship and frustrate the commercial venture; in the former case the carriage of the goods to effect which the charter-party was entered into; in the latter case the sale of the goods which were to be shipped on the steamship which was delayed. But the court held in the former case that the basis of the contract was that the ship would arrive in time to carry out the contemplated commercial venture, and in the latter that the steamship would arrive in time for the loading of the goods the subject of the sale. I wish to observe that cases of this sort are very different from cases where a contract or warranty or representation is implied, such as was implied in The Moorcock, and refused to be implied in Hamlyn v. Wood. But The Moorcock is of importance in the present case as showing that whatever is the suggested implication—be it condition, as in this case, or warranty, or representation—one must, in judging whether the implication ought to be made, look not only at the words of the contract, but also at the surrounding facts and the knowledge of the parties of those facts. There seems to me to be ample authority for this proposition. Thus in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., in the Common Pleas, the question whether the object of the voyage had been frustrated by the delay of the ship was left as a question of fact to the jury, although there was nothing in the charter-party defining the time within which the charterers were to supply the cargo of iron rails for San Francisco, and nothing on the face of the charter-party to indicate the importance of time in the venture; and that was a case in which, as Bramwell, B., points out in his judgment, at p. 148, Taylor v. Caldwell was a strong authority to support the conclusion arrived at in the judgment—that the ship not arriving in time for the voyage contemplated, but at such time as to frustrate the commercial venture, was not only a breach of contract, but discharged the charterer, though he had such an excuse that no action would lie. And, again, in Harris v. Dreesman the vessel had to be loaded, as no particular time was mentioned, within a reasonable time; and, in judging of a reasonable time, the court approved of evidence being given that the defendants, the charterers, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, had no control over the colliery from which both parties knew that the coal was to come; and that, although all that was said in the charter-party was that the vessel should proceed to Spital Tongue's Spout (the spout of the Spital Tongue's Colliery), and there take on board from the freighters a full and complete cargo of coals, and five tons of coke, and although there was no evidence to prove any custom in the port as to loading vessels in turn. Again, it was held in Mumford v. Gething, 8 W. R. 187, 7 C. B. N. S. 305, that, in construing a written contract of service under which A. was to enter the employ of B., oral evidence is admissible to show in what capacity A. was to serve B.: see also Price v. Mouat, 11 C. B. N. S. 508. The rule seems to be that which is laid down in Taylor on Evidence, vol. 2, s. 1082: "It may be laid down as a broad and distinct rule of law that extrinsic evidence of every material fact which will enable the court to ascertain the nature and qualities of the subject-matter of the instrument, or, in other words, to identify the persons and things to which the instrument refers, must of necessity be received." And Lord Campbell, in his judgment, says: "I am of opinion that, where there is a contract for the sale of a specific subject-matter, oral evidence may be received, for the purpose of showing what that subject-matter was, of every fact within the knowledge of the parties before and at the time of the contract": see per Campbell, C.J., Macdonald v. Longbottom, 7 W. R. 507, 1 E. & E. 977. It seems to me that the language of Willes, J., in Lloyd v. Guibert, 35 L. J. Q. B. 74, points in the same direction. I myself am clearly of opinion that in this case, where we have to ask ourselves whether the object of the contract was frustrated by the non-happening of the coronation and its procession on the days proclaimed, oral evidence is admissible to show that the subject of the contract was rooms to view the coronation procession, and was so to the knowledge of both parties. When once this is established, I see no difficulty whatever in the case. It is not essential to the application of the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell that the direct subject of the contract should perish or fail to be in existence at the date of performance of the contract. It is sufficient if a state of things or condition expressed in the contract and essential to its performance perishes or fails to be in existence at that time. In the present case the condition which fails and prevents the achievement of that which was, in the contemplation of both parties, the foundation of the contract is not expressly mentioned either as a condition of the contract or the purpose of it; but I think for the reasons which I have given that the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell ought to be applied. This disposes of the plaintiff's claim for £50, the unpaid balance of the price agreed to be paid for the use of the rooms. The defendant at one time set up a cross-claim for the return of the £25 he paid at the date of the contract. As that claim is now withdrawn it is unnecessary to say anything about it. I have only to add that the facts of this case do not bring it within the principle laid down in Stubbs v. Holywell Railway Co., 15 W. R. 869, L. R. 2 Ex. 311, that in the case of contracts falling directly within the rule of Taylor v. Caldwell the subsequent impossibility does not affect rights already acquired because the defendant had the whole of the 24th of June to pay the balance, and the public announcement that the coronation and procession would not take place on the proclaimed days was made early on the morning of the 24th, and no cause of action could accrue till the end of that date. I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—With some doubt I have also come to the conclusion that this case is governed by the principle on which Taylor v. Caldwell was decided, and accordingly that the appeal must be dismissed. The doubt I have felt was whether the parties to the contract now before us could be said under the circumstances not to have had at all in their contemplation the risk that for some reason or other the the coronation procession might not take place on the days fixed, or if the procession took place might not pass so as to be capable of being viewed from the rooms mentioned in the contract; and whether under this contract that risk was not undertaken by the defendant. But on the question of fact as to what was in the contemplation of the parties at the time I do not think it right to differ from the conclusion arrived at by Vaughan Williams, L.J., and (as I gather) also arrived at by my brother Stirling. This being so, I concur in the conclusion arrived at by Vaughan Williams, L.J., in his judgment, and I do not desire to add anything to what he has said so fully and completely.

STIRLING, L.J., said he had had an opportunity of reading the judgment delivered by Vaughan Williams, L.J., with which he entirely agreed. Though the case was one of very great difficulty, he thought it came within the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Cecil Bisgood; M. Grunebaum.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Nov. 25, 26.

In re THE BODEGA CO. (LIMITED) AND In re THE COMPANIES ACTS, 1862 TO 1890. (a.)

Company — Shares — Transfer — Refusal to register transfer—Lien on shares—Director concerned in contract—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), Table A (57)—Vacation of office ipso facto—Re-election—Director's share of total remuneration—Extra sum voted—Ultrà vires—Money had and received—Mistake or failure of consideration—Right to recover.

A company refused to register a transfer of shares executed by W., late a director, alleging they had a lien on the shares for money owing by him. W., when a director, had become concerned in a contract with the company not disclosed to and authorized by the board, in contravention of an article of association, which was a modified copy of clause 57 in Table A of the Companies Act, 1862. The fact remained unknown for over two years from the date of contract, during which time, according to the custom of the board, W. had twice retired, being on each occasion re-elected for twelve months. The board's remuneration was fixed at a lump sum, divisible among its members at the will of the majority, and the share received by W. was £39 a month. On discovering the facts the company claimed repayment of the said monthly sums received by W. since the date of the contract, and also a sum of £400 voted to W. by the board "for his special and constant services during the past year."

Held, (1) (distinguishing Turnbull v. West Riding Athletic Club, 70 L. T. Rep. 92) that W. vacated his office ipso facto on becoming concerned in the contract, and without any act being necessary to remove him; (2) that he was not necessarily disqualified from re-election, and that the re-elections were in fact good, since before their date the contract was complete and required no exercise of discretion by W. as director; (3) that, consequently, the only fees repayable were those for the period between the date of the contract and the first re-election; (4) that either the company or the board could recover those fees as money had and received, and as paid in mistake or for a consideration which had failed; (5) following In re Geo. Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674, that the payment of £400 to W. was ultrà vires, and that sum with interest must be refunded; (6) that on repayment of the moneys so found due, and not before, the company must register the transfer.

This was a motion by a shareholder of the company asking for an order that the register should be rectified by the insertion therein of the name of a person to whom the applicant had transferred his shares. The company had refused to register the transfer, alleging that they had a lien on the shares in respect of £1,380 11s. 4d. said to be owing to them by the applicant.

The motion originally came on for hearing by Farwell, J., who directed that it should be placed in the non-witness list. It was on that occasion agreed between counsel that the judge should have power at the present hearing to decide questions as to the liability of the applicant to pay certain sums of money making up the above total.

Mr. Wolseley, the applicant, had for several years been a director of the company and chairman of the board. The articles provided for the annual retirement of three directors by rotation, and they were eligible for re-election, but it had become the custom for all to retire annually. Mr. Wolseley accordingly retired and was re-elected on the 8th of July, 1901, and again on the 8th of July, 1902.

The remuneration of the board was fixed by article 75 at £1,400 a year, which was divisible among the directors in such manner as the majority of them might direct. Mr. Wolseley's share had been fixed at a board meeting in 1897 at £500 a year, which had ever since been paid, less income tax, by monthly instalments of about £39 each, amounting, for the period between the 30th of January and the 26th of June, 1901, to £236 9s. 1d., and for that between the 31st of July, 1901, and the 1st of February, 1903, to £744 2s. 3d., making in all £980 11s. 4d.

It was further provided by article 74*a* that the directors might employ any member of their body to perform any special services for the company for such period and upon such terms as to remuneration or otherwise as they might think fit. Though not authorized by this article, the board had, on the 17th of July, 1901, voted to Mr. Wolseley, as chairman, a sum of £400 "for his special and constant services during the past year," and that sum was paid to him a fortnight later.

All the above-mentioned sums the company now claimed to have refunded to them as money had and received to their use, alleging that the payments had been made under a mistake of facts or for a consideration which had failed, since, under the circumstances mentioned below, Mr. Wolseley was not at the dates of payment a director of the company, having vacated his office under article 70 of the articles of association, which was as follows: "The office of any director shall be vacated if he be concerned in, or participate in the profits of, any contract with the company, not disclosed to, and authorized by, the board."

In the year 1900, X., a solicitor, was instructed by the directors to treat for the purchase of a freehold public-house at Nottingham called "The Durham Ox," and on the 19th of December, 1900, he attended a board meeting and reported that he had completed the negotiation at the price of £12,000. The board directed him to enter into a formal contract at that price, and he reported on the 27th of December that the property had been secured accordingly. He was afterwards given bills of exchange for £1,200, accepted by the directors on behalf of the company, for the purpose of paying a deposit of 10 per cent.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The only contract, however, which X. signed in the matter was one with E. M. Kidd, who was the vendor, dated the 24th of December, 1900, and in this X. was named as the purchaser for £8,000. X. afterwards prepared a conveyance, dated the 24th of June, 1901, to which Kidd, X., and the company were expressed to be parties, and in which it was recited that Kidd had "lately contracted" with X. for the sale to him of the premises for £8,000, and that X. had agreed with the company to transfer to them the benefit of the contract on the terms that the company should pay him £4,000. This deed was executed by Kidd and X., the former granting and the latter purporting to grant and confirm the premises to the company in consideration of £8,000 paid to Kidd (the receipt of which he acknowledged), and £4,000 paid to X., the receipt of which latter sum X. acknowledged. This deed X. kept from the knowledge of the company, informing them that there had been a conveyance from Kidd for £12,000, and they only learnt the terms of the deed in June, 1902, whereupon inquiry was instituted, resulting in full particulars of X.'s proceedings being discovered on the 15th of July, 1902. In December following X. signed an agreement with the company in which it was recited that £8,000 had been paid to Kidd, but that the £4,000 had not been and was not to be paid to X., and by supplemental agreement he renounced all claim thereto on the 25th of March, 1903.

Meantime—i e., on the 10th of February, 1903 — Mr. Wolseley's co-directors learnt that there had been a secret agreement between him and X., by which the former was to share in the £4,000. This Mr. Wolseley orally admitted was true, and on the 25th of February, 1903, he gave a formal admission in writing that he had "in the circumstances which have occurred and by the operation of article 70" vacated his office as a director.

In order to facilitate their claim in the present and other proceedings, the company obtained from the other directors a renunciation or assignment of any rights they might have in the £980 11s. 4d. as being part of the £1,400 a year paid to the board as a whole.

Upjohn, K.C (Galbraith with him) for the applicant, Wolseley.—The first question is as to the construction to be placed on article 70. Does it ipso facto vacate the office of a director concerned in a contract undisclosed, or does something remain to be done to remove him? The latter was the view taken in Turnbull v. The West Riding Athletic Club (70 L. T. 92). The next point is: Can the company recover these sums, as money had and received, on the ground of mistake or failure of consideration? Mr. Wolseley was doing the work all the while, so there was no failure of consideration. Failure means total failure. It has never been held that money can be recovered back where there has been some consideration. The company paid their directors £1,400 a year, which was to be distributed. Mr. Wolseley's co-directors are not entitled to his share, for he relieved them of part of the work. If not entitled to fees, he was entitled on a quantum meruit; the company knew he was acting as a director, and that is equivalent to a request; the re-election, too, was a request. Money paid voluntarily cannot be recovered back. This money was handed to the board for distribution, and there was no obligation to pay Mr. Wolseley's share.

He cited Lamert v. Heath, 15 M. & W. 486; Aiken v. Short, 4 W. R. 645, 1 H. & N. 210; Nicholson v. Ricketts, 8 W. R. 211, 29 L. J. Q. B. 55, 65; Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337; Bullen and Leake's Precedents (5th ed.), pp. 297 et seq.; Ibid. (3rd ed.), p. 48; Leake on Contracts (4th ed.), p. 62. [FARWELL, J., referred to Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005.]

Jenkins, K.C. (Neilson with him), was here invited to state the case for the company.—We say that Mr. Wolseley vacated his office ipso facto on being concerned in the contract. The words of article 70 are express. The decision in Turnbull's case was perhaps influenced by the fact that the directors had passed a resolution removing their colleague. [He cited Hunnings v. Williamson, 32 W. R. 267, 11 Q. B. D. 533, 534, and British Asbestos Co. (Limited) v. Boyd, 51 W. R. 667, [1903] 2 Ch. 439.] As to the period before re-election, it is said the company cannot recover back the fees, because there was no total failure of consideration; but we say there was. A director contracts with his company, not for specific acts, but to give his honest services: Salomons v. Pender, 13 W. R. 637, 3 H. & C. 639, 641; Andrew v. Ramsay, 19 T. L. R. 620. That is the contract this company would have had but for the mistake. The services must be taken as a whole; if they could be split up I admit there might not be a total failure of consideration. Wolseley could have sued the company for his share of the directors' fees, for he was an assign of that part of the £1,400. Therefore the company can sue him for repayment. [He cited Aiken v. Short.] [FARWELL, J., referred to Caridad Copper Mining Co. v. Swallow, 50 W. R. 565, [1902] 2 K. B. 44, and Albion Steel and Wire Co. v. Martin, 24 W. R. 134, 1 Ch. D. 580, cited in Palmer's Prec. (8th ed.), pp. 497, 617.] As to quantum meruit, the value would have to be assessed by a jury or some such tribunal. The payment of £400 was ultra vires and can be recovered back. [FARWELL, J., referred to In re Geo. Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674.] Then as to the period after re-election, Mr. Wolseley's position was even worse than before. The re-election was a new proof of the company's confidence, yet he went on acting as director without disclosing the contract in which he was concerned. The words in article 70 are "be concerned," and not "become concerned," which latter might mean "become concerned for the first time," and would help Mr. Wolseley's case. X.'s contract was a continuing one; the £4,000 was not paid and the company entered into possession and could have been sued for the money at any time before December, 1902, when the contract was definitely avoided. Mr. Wolseley was concerned in it, for he was to share in the £4,000. I do not rely on the contract of the 24th of December, 1900, but on some contract implied by reason of the purchaser being in possession, for the company, if not in physical possession, were owners in equity by virtue of the conveyance, and were bound to pay the full price. It is a case of vendor's lien which arises by implied contract. [FARWELL, J., referred to Robbins on Mortgages, tit. "Liens."] Then X. was estopped, by the recitals in the conveyance, from saying there was no contract, and his partner in the transaction is bound by that estoppel.

Upjohn, K.C.—There was no lien and no contract. The company may rely on the true facts or on assumed facts acting by estoppel, but they cannot rely on both: Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345, 350, per Lord Selborne. If they rely on the true facts we say there never was a contract between X. and the company. If, on the other hand, they say we are estopped from saying there was no contract, then I say, look at the whole deed. Taking it as it stands, and assuming that Mr. Wolseley was bound by every word of it, if it shows a contract it shows that the contract was executed and done with before the re-election; it cannot therefore affect Mr. Wolseley's position after the 8th of July, 1901. [He cited Chapman v. Tanner, 1 Vern. 267; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 328, 336; Kettlewell v. Watson, 32 W. R. 865, 26 Ch. D. 501, 507; Nairne v. Prowse, 6 Ves. 751, 759; Waring v. Ward, 7 Ves. 332; Dawson v. African Land and Trading Co., 46 W. R. 132, [1898] 1 Ch. 6; Fry on Specific Performance (4th ed.), pp. 506, et seq.; Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (6th ed.), p. 825.] Hunnings v. Williamson (as to vacation of office) was a case depending on context. [FARWELL, J., referred to Cowell v. Simpson, 16 Ves. 275.]

Jenkins, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J.—This case, under the guise of an innocent application to rectify the register, has raised a number of points of very considerable difficulty. The first difficulty I find is in ascertaining the facts, because the parties appear to have come here, with a laudable desire to save expense, without having clearly formulated any agreement of facts on which I can proceed. However, I do not desire to put the parties to further expense if I can help it, and I propose to deal with the case on the facts which I understand to have been the basis of the arrangement, between the parties, on which it is now brought on.

The case is one of considerable demerit on the part of a director. In December, 1900, the applicant, Mr. Wolseley, was chairman of the board of directors, and on the admitted facts, as I understand them, he and the solicitor entered into a conspiracy by which they proposed to defraud the company of a sum of £4,000. The modus operandi was this. The company were minded to buy a public-house called "The Durham Ox," and they authorized this solicitor to negotiate for its purchase. The solicitor bought it for himself for £8,000, and reported to the company that he had bought it for £12,000. He was authorized to enter into a contract for £12,000, and was given bills to pay a ten per cent. deposit on that footing. That was on the 24th of December, 1900.

The contract, having been so entered into, was carried out by a conveyance on the 24th of June, 1901. The conveyance recites—and this is certainly the most extraordinary part of the fraud, because I never saw anything more innocent than the mode in which it was carried out—it recites that the vendor Kidd, the owner of the property, had lately contracted with the solicitor for the sale for £8,000, and that the solicitor had agreed with the company to transfer to them the benefit of the contract for £4,000, and then it is a conveyance in consideration of both these sums, which are acknowledged to have been paid by the company to these two people. I should mention that the £4,000 never was paid. The facts were not discovered by the company until July, 1902, and thereupon, I need hardly say, there were angry protests, and finally the solicitor, by a deed dated the 25th of March, 1903, released all claims he might have against the company for that £4,000 which never had been paid; so that fortunately the intended fraud on the company failed to take effect.

The company's articles contain, amongst others, this: "The office of any director shall be vacated if he become bankrupt or insolvent or compound with his creditors; if he be declared lunatic or become of unsound mind; if he be concerned in or participate in the profits of any contract with the company not disclosed to and authorized by the board." It is admitted this contract was not disclosed to or authorized by the board. The contract in question is the contract alleged to have been entered into by the solicitor for the sale to the company at this profit. It is quite clear that the contract, mixed up as it was with the contract by Kidd with the solicitor, which was represented to the company as a contract by Kidd with the company, is one which the company never would have authorized if they had known the circumstances. On the facts, as I understand them, Wolseley and the solicitor were co-conspirators from the beginning, and this was the machinery by which they proceeded to carry out their scheme. Wolseley therefore was concerned in the contract from the beginning. "The office of director is vacated if he be concerned in any contract, . . ." and he was undoubtedly so concerned.

Now, the first point is this: Does the director, who is himself concerned in a contract not disclosed, thereupon (as it is put in the last edition of Mr. Palmer's book) ipso facto or "automatically" vacate his office, or does anything further remain to be done? In my opinion it is quite plain on the words of the article that he automatically or ipso facto vacates on the act being done. If he becomes bankrupt, on the adjudication nothing more is to be done; if he becomes lunatic, in the same way; nor indeed is there any locus penitentiæ for him, or any means by which the directors can condone the offence, if it be an offence, or condone the act which causes the vacation. The office is vacated; he has to be re-elected in the ordinary way, or the casual vacancy has to be filled up under the article to that effect. The directors have nothing whatever to do with the vacation of the office by an event over which they have no control, and with which they have nothing to do, except to satisfy themselves that the fact has happened, if the facts be put in issue. In this case there is no dispute of fact, because there is no dispute that the man was concerned in the contract. The difficulty about this is a decision, to which I have been referred, of Kekewich, J., Turnbull v. The West Riding Athletic Club, 70 L. T. 92, but, as I read that case, the learned judge there was really addressing his mind to a different state of circumstances. The article was not absolutely identical. It was practically: "If he contract with the company, or be concerned in, or participate in the profits of, any contract with, or work done for, the company, without declaring his interest at the meeting of directors." The directors took on themselves to call a meeting, and to declare his office vacant, and the learned judge said: "As you chose to call that meeting for the purpose of declaring this man no longer a director, you ought in common fairness to have given him notice of it." I do not think anybody would find any fault with this view. If you are proposing to adjudicate on a man's conduct and position, you ought at least to give him notice of it, and give him the opportunity of being heard. But if the learned judge meant to go on and say—as it is possible he might have meant—I am not sure whether it is necessary to his judgment—that something more must be done than the fact, and that the director might possibly have been so plausible that he might have won over the other directors, I respectfully disagree, for I cannot see what useful purpose it would serve if he had won over every director; the fact would have remained, and the fact was absolutely impossible to get over. The result, therefore, is that in my opinion on Wolseley being concerned in the contract he vacated his office.

What further happened was this: the directors were elected each year for a year, and he went out of office with the other directors in July, 1901, and was re-elected on the 8th of that month. He held office that year, and after this was re-elected on the 8th of July, 1902. Now the vacation of his office by the contract of the 24th of December, 1900, which I will assume for the moment to be the date—I will come back to it in a minute—was a vacation of the then office of director, and did not, in my opinion, disqualify the man who had been a director, and who thereby vacated his office, from thereafter being qualified as a director. I do not understand the article to mean that if a man be concerned in a contract not disclosed, and he thereby vacate his office, that he cannot be elected in a subsequent year, or even (I will not say in the then current year) to fill a casual vacancy, but at any rate in the subsequent year when the next election comes on. To my mind it is not a continuing disqualification, unless the work to be done under the contract—that is, the mischief aimed at by the article—is a continuing work. If the work to be done under the contract is practically to be reviewed by the director under the contract, and the discretion to which the company are entitled from the director is still to be exercised after the next election, then, and then only, the election would be voided by the continuing contract. But when, as here, it is a contract made once for all for a particular purchase, then I think it only applies to the particular holding of the directorship for the current year; so that I am of opinion that he vacated his office on the entering into the contract, and that the vacation lasted until the 8th of July, 1901, when he was re-elected.

Now as to the date of the contract. In my opinion the only date I can take on the evidence I have before me, which is extremely meagre and unsatisfactory, is the 24th of December, 1900. I think the true view is really what I have stated—I do not wish to hold Mr. Upjohn to his opening, but I think he understood it as I now do, and after hearing it fully I think I do really understand it—I think the meaning was, there was this contract of the 24th of December, 1900, entered into by the two conspirators with the company for this purpose; and that being so, from that date, in my opinion, he vacated his directorship.

Then there comes the conveyance of the 24th of June, which recites the contract, and which then proceeds to convey to the company, and thereupon I think the transaction, as affecting the present question, came to an end. Although the money was not paid, there really was no further exercise of any discretion which would render the service of the director necessary. The mischief was then done, and could only be set aside by being discovered by the directors, and not by any exercise of the director's discretion as such, as distinguished from the conspirators or discovery by some outside agency. That being so, it appears to me that the only period to which this claim for the refunding of the fees, to which I am now coming, relates, is from the 24th of December, 1900, to the 8th of July, 1901.

I may mention, to get rid of it, the sum of £400 which was paid to him as an extraordinary allowance, not under article 74*a* and not as part of the £1,400 to which the directors are entitled, to be divided amongst themselves, under article 75, but as an extra sum given by the directors. It is quite clear on the authorities, In re Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674, and other cases, that that was utterly unjustifiable; and that sum of money must be refunded. Therefore, to the extent of £400, I may dismiss that from further consideration by saying that until that is paid there can certainly be no rectification of the company's register.

But the other question, with reference to fees, is a more difficult one. Under article 75 the remuneration of the directors was, as and from the 31st of March, 1887, to be £1,400 a year, to be distributed amongst them in such proportion as the majority might direct. What happened was that in 1897, as I was told, there was a resolution of the directors, which has been in fact acted on ever since, and under which the directors got a certain proportion. The particular director, Mr. Wolseley, got, I think, £40 a month. Now the £40 a month has been paid to Mr. Wolseley in respect of his services as a director, and what the company now claim is to have it refunded either to themselves in their own right as the company, or to themselves as the assigns, as they are, of the other directors—treating it as being paid by the other directors as Mr. Wolseley's share of the £1,400—as money paid either under a mistake of fact, or on a total failure of consideration. This is a point which now has become very small in point of money, but which seems to me to raise questions of some little interest. The action for money had and received has been dealt with by Lord Mansfield in Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, 1012, in a passage which has been quoted so often I am almost ashamed to quote it again: "It lies for money paid by mistake; or upon a consideration which happens to fail." The mistake on which you can recover must be a mistake which, as was said by Bramwell, B., in Aiken v. Short, 4 W. R. 645, 1 H. & N. 210, 215, "must be as to a fact which, if true, would make the person liable to pay the money; not where, if true, it would merely make it desirable that he should pay the money." That I apprehend means this; if you are claiming to have money repaid on the ground of mistake you must show the mistake was one which led you to suppose you were legally liable to pay. Now I am not sure that the same proposition is not involved in the second head—total failure of consideration. I will deal with the company first in its own right. If the company was liable to pay, it was because they had impliedly contracted with the director to pay him for his services, by accepting the benefit of those services although he was not a director. Of course the company's contract with him as director was an express contract, and there is no question the director would not be entitled under express contract, because the contract was to pay to the director, and he was not one. But it is put on the ground of a quantum meruit, or—to travesty the language of Bramwell, B.—there was some legal liability, although not to the full extent; it was not a mere sum which it was desirable should have been paid, but a sum which, as to some part of it at any rate, must be paid. That, I think, brings the question down to this: When you speak of total failure of consideration, do you by consideration mean merely something of value, or do you mean such a legal consideration as would support some form of action by the claimant? In my opinion it is the latter. I think, to analyze the position, it is this; money is recoverable by a man for work done when the person on whose property the work has been done has accepted it; the liability arises on the request, which is implied from his acceptance of the work, to the man who has done the work, to do it. That can only operate, I think, when both parties know the true state of circumstances. Now in the present case it is clear that the company never would have requested Wolseley to do the work if they had known the facts, and had known he was not a director. In fact, without putting it on any question of fraud, Wolseley, by his silence and concealment of this particular act of his, misled the company into making a request which they otherwise certainly would not have made. The mere fact that the work has been done without the request is no consideration at law. The request is only implied from the acceptance of the work, and, in my opinion, only from the acceptance with a knowledge of the circumstances. If there be a circumstance which is so material that the court could not properly imply request which, after all, has to be a matter of implication by the court—if there be the mere fact that the company had taken the benefit of the work, then I think the court cannot imply the request and there is no consideration. From that point of view, whether I apply the test of Bramwell B, or take the total failure of consideration, in my opinion the company can recover back the money paid for the director's fees. Whether it be the company in their own capacity or the other directors, I do not think is very material; but, in my view, the company, apart from a question which might be raised by reason of the fact that the company can only act through its directors, and that all the other gentlemen are its directors, the company would appear to be in this position, that they have paid to the wrong person. They are bound to pay £1,400 to their directors; they have in point of fact paid a proportion of that to someone who was not a director. If it were not that the people who act for the company are themselves these other directors, that would appear to me to be the answer; but that is not very material to consider, because if I do not take the view that the company have suffered by having to pay over again, then the directors have suffered because they have, on the footing that this man was a director, given him a share of the £1,400, which was to be divided amongst the directors, for his services as a director. If I am to apply the same test to them as I do to the company, I certainly could not imply that they, knowing the circumstances, would ever have requested the director to do the work which he did, if they had known that he was not a director; he was to be remunerated as a director, and the other directors never would have requested, either impliedly or expressly, a man who they knew had ceased to be a director by means of such conduct as this to do any act as a director.

The result is that in my opinion the fees paid from the 24th of December, 1900, to the 8th of July, 1901, must be refunded. With regard to the rest, the man has been re-elected, and I am not holding that there has been any vacating of the office because the director had been guilty of conduct which, if known, would have induced the company not to elect him. He was a director and has done the work, and so far as that is concerned I think the claim for refunding fails. Under the circumstances, and having regard to the nature of the case, all that I can do now is to refuse the motion with costs, because it asks to rectify the register on the ground that the company have no claim on the shares. I am asked, however, to settle all matters in dispute between the parties, and therefore the order will provide that on repayment by Wolseley of the £400 with interest at four per cent. per annum from the date of its receipt by him, and of £235 without interest for the fees which I have held to be repayable, the company is to register the transfer; the costs of the motion and the costs of the action in the Scotch court when taxed there to be paid by Wolseley.

Solicitors, Parker & Richardson; Gadsden & Treherne.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Nov. 11.

In re N. DEFRIES & CO. (LIMITED).
BOWEN v. N. DEFRIES & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debentures—Registration—Prior agreement—Date of creation of security—Limit of time for registration—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

The fact of an agreement having been entered into by a limited company to issue debentures and to give them to one who advances money to the company as security for his advance, does not prevent debentures subsequently issued for the purpose being duly registered under section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, more than twenty-one days after the date of the agreement, so long as they are registered within twenty-one days after the time of their being sealed and issued.

A limited company on the 1*st of March,* 1903, resolved to issue certain debentures, and in order to obtain an advance from the plaintiff, the company at the same time agreed to give him debentures of £1,000 as a security for the advance. These debentures were sealed but not registered, and were, on the 6*th of April, cancelled and fresh ones were, on the* 7*th of April, sealed, and to the amount of* £1,000 issued to the plaintiff. These latter debentures were registered on the 11*th of April.*

Held, that these debentures were duly registered within the twenty-one days limited by section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900.

In this case the plaintiff, F. G. Bowen, a holder of forty £25 debentures of the above company, sued the company on behalf of himself and all other the holders of the first mortgage debentures of the company, claiming a declaration that the mortgage debentures constituted a first charge upon the property, and foreclosure or sale, and other relief.

The facts were as follows:

On the 1st of March, 1903, the company resolved to issue certain debentures for £5,000, and a letter was sent on their behalf to the plaintiff informing him of the fact, and the plaintiff thereupon advanced to the company £499 14s. chiefly in cash paid at the time, but partly in value for services already rendered to the company. Under the above resolution debentures were sealed, some on the 13th of March, some on the 16th of March, but they were not registered.

On the 6th of April, 1903, it having been reported to the directors of the company that debentures, part of a series of £5,000, had been sealed, but had not been issued, it was resolved that these debentures should be cancelled, and that others should be issued, as to part in exchange for debentures constituting the prior issue, and as to the balance, £1,000 part thereof should be issued to the plaintiff. In pursuance of this resolution the above forty debentures were sealed on the 7th of April and issued to the plaintiff. These debentures were registered on the 11th of April, 1903, and endorsed with the certificate of the registrar to that effect. The writ in the action was issued on the 20th of April, 1903.

On the 26th of May, 1903, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the company, and the action was by leave continued against the liquidator.

The defence set up was that the debentures given to the plaintiff were not filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies within twenty-one days after the mortgage or charge which they purported to secure or confer was created.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Levett, K.C., and A. H. Jessel, for the plaintiff.—The security was created at the time of the debentures being issued, not at the date of the resolution of the 1st of March or of the letter of the 2nd of March: In re S. Abrahams & Sons, 50 W. R. 284, [1902] 1 Ch. 694, 698.

Eustace Smith, for the defendant company.—The debentures were not duly registered within twenty-one days of the date of the creation of the security as required by section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900. The creation of the mortgage or charge was either the resolution of the company of the 1st of March or the letter sent to the plaintiff at the same time which constituted an agreement between the parties. These debentures were not registered until the 11th of April, and are consequently void. To allow debentures to be sealed and then after the twenty-one days have elapsed to be cancelled and fresh ones to be issued and registered would be to allow the Act of 1900 to be evaded. The elaborate provisions of section 15 for an extension of time for registration are designed to meet a case of this kind.

BUCKLEY, J.—It has been proved that there was an agreement by the company with the plaintiff made by the letter sent to him on the 1st of March, 1903, to give him these debentures as a security for his advance. In a certain sense that agreement created a security. The only point argued before me has been whether the debentures issued to the plaintiff were registered in time. If there was (as I think there was) an agreement on the 1st of March, 1903, to give debentures to the amount of £1,000 to the plaintiff, the question is whether it was sufficient to register on the 11th of April, 1903, debentures which had in fact been issued upon the 7th of April. In my opinion it was sufficient. The debentures sealed in pursuance of the resolution of the 1st of March were not registered; but the plaintiff was not relying upon them. He considered that they were not a valid security; but in satisfaction of his bargain of the 1st of March he got the debentures of the 7th of April. These were the security upon which he relied. The fact that the plaintiff did not get the security on the 1st of March does not show that the agreement of that date was void, although it was not performed until the debentures were perfected by registration. The plaintiff remained in possession of that agreement, and was entitled under it to take the debentures sealed on the 7th of April, and registered on the 11th of April. I think that the debentures given to the plaintiff were duly registered within section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, and that he is entitled to them as a security for his debt. Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors, Henry Moore; S. J. Woodham Smith.

K. B. Div. (Walton, J.) — Dec. 8, 18.

DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) v. MAISON TALBOT, EARL OF SHREWSBURY AND TALBOT, AND D. M. WEIGEL.

CLIPPER PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. v. SAME. (a.)

Slander of title to goods—Injunction—Damage direct result and imminent—Damage not accrued—Letters patent.

An injunction will lie at the instance of legal or equitable owners of letters patent to restrain the publication of a libel or slander of title, if the defamation is in fact a libel or slander of title, where no damage has actually accrued, provided that damage is imminent and is the natural and direct result likely to follow.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing a libel or slander of title of the plaintiffs' property.

The plaintiff company were the owners of certain letters patent granted to W. E. Bartlett for an invention of pneumatic tyres, and could license others to manufacture and deal in such tyres. The letters patent were of great value.

The Michelin tyre was a pneumatic tyre for use on motor-cars. The said tyre was manufactured in France, and had a considerable reputation. The said tyre could be purchased in the open market on the Continent of Europe. The said Michelin tyre was constructed in accordance with the invention of W. E. Bartlett and was an infringement of the said letters patent and could not be imported into this realm without the licence of the plaintiffs.

A licence to import into this realm the said Michelin tyre had been granted by the plaintiffs to the Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited), who were licensees of the plaintiffs under the said letters patent or alternatively the owners in equity of a licence granted by the plaintiffs and others to one T. C. Phelps, under which licence the Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co. had been authorized by the plaintiffs to import into this realm the said tyres, and under which licence the plaintiffs had received royalties from the said Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) in respect of the Michelin tyres so imported by them into this realm.

The defendant the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot was the proprietor of the business of the defendants, the Maison Talbot. The defendant D. M. Weigel was the manager of the said business.

On the 18th of February, 1903, as the plaintiffs alleged, the defendants, by Weigel, falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiffs and of them in relation to their said business, and of them as owners of the said letters patent, the words following to one C. C. Selbach, who was a customer of the plaintiffs' licensees:

"Maison Talbot, Feb. 18, 1903.

"C. C. Selbach, Esq., 66, Great Russell-street.

"Dear Sir,—In reply to your esteemed favour of the 17th inst., we beg to inform you that Mr. Carter is the representative of the North British Rubber Co., and is travelling at the present moment on our behalf, who are the London representatives of the North British Rubber Co. for Clincher Michelin tyres.

"As regards the remark in your letters as to being able to obtain Michelin tyres from the Clipper Co., we beg to inform you that under an arrangement now come to this is quite impossible, as they (Michelin) will not supply the Clipper Co., and we ask you to be good enough to accept it from us that there are other legal reasons preventing either the Dunlop, the Clipper, or any other company from importing Michelin tyres into this country, by which they would be infringing certain rights held by the North British Rubber Co."

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant thereby meant and intended it to be believed, and in fact it was understood to mean, that the plaintiff company were not entitled to import or to license others to import into this realm the said Michelin tyres, and that Michelin tyres could not be purchased in this realm from the plaintiffs or from their said licensees. That the defendants by themselves, their servants, agents, and travellers, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiffs and of them in relation to their said property words similar to those set out in the letter. By reason of the publication aforesaid the plaintiffs' title to the said letters patent and their business aforesaid was injured, and that unless the defendants were restrained from the repetition of such statements, irreparable injury would be caused to the plaintiffs, and they would be deprived of profits to be derived from the sale of the said Michelin tyres in this realm.

The defendants admitted that they wrote the letter, but denied that it was a libel or slander of title. They alleged that the letter was privileged; that the words complained of in the letter were not false and that it was written without malice in the bonâ fide assertion of the defendants' rights, which the defendants believed they possessed. The words "Michelin will not supply the Clipper Co." were true in substance and in fact, and that the words "under an arrangement now come to" referred to the arrangement between the North British Rubber Co. and Messrs. Michelin. The defendants had been informed, and honestly believed, that no British company except the North British Rubber Co. could lawfully import Michelin tyres into this country. The defendants contended that there was no evidence of malice, and that there was no damage. The Clipper Co., being merely beneficial owners, and there having been no legal licence to them, they could not sue. Further, privilege was a good answer to a claim for an injunction.

Bray, K.C., A. J. Walter, and G. Hume, for the plaintiffs.

Blake Odgers, K.C., and Stephen Lynch, for the defendants.

WALTON, J.—If the letter of the 18th of February contained statements as to the plaintiffs' rights which were false and were injurious to the plaintiffs in respect of such rights, and were made by the defendants for the purpose of injuring the plaintiffs, and not bonâ fide for the purpose of protecting or advancing the interests of the defendants, there is no doubt that an action would lie to recover damages in respect of any loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of such statements. The statements were injurious to the plaintiffs in respect of their rights in the Bartlett patent. I am satisfied not only that they were false, but that there was no ground whatever for asserting that the plaintiffs could not import Michelin tyres into this country without infringing the rights of the North British Rubber Co. As between the plaintiffs and that company there was no restraint upon the plaintiffs in respect of the patent except as contained in clause 8 of the licence. The defendant Weigel has had a large experience in dealing with the Bartlett tyres and in litigation with regard to the rights of the plaintiffs in the Bartlett patent. He was quite familiar with the terms of the licence to the Rubber Co. It may be that questions of some difficulty arise upon the construction of the licence with regard to other matters, but I am satisfied that the defendant Weigel must have known that there was nothing in the licence which could prevent the Dunlop Co., the owners of the patent, from importing into this country Bartlett tyres manufactured by Michelin. I think that Mr. Weigel must have known that there was nothing to prevent the Clipper Co., as between the Clipper Co. and the Rubber Co., from importing Bartlett tyres made by Michelin. The Clipper Co. have a licence to manufacture and sell, and if they could not under this licence import and sell, there was nothing to prevent the Dunlop Co., as against the Rubber Co., from giving to the Clipper Co. a licence to import and sell. They were by the terms of the licence to the Rubber Co. restrained only from giving further licences to manufacture and sell. This is so clear that I have no doubt that Mr. Weigel must have known it. He cannot have supposed that the statement made in the latter part of the letter of the 18th of February, 1903, was a fair and correct statement of the facts as between the Dunlop Co. and the Clipper Co. on the one side and the Rubber Co. on the other. If he had said only "We beg . . ." down to "suffered the Clipper Co.," it would have been an exaggerated statement of the monopoly obtained by the Rubber Co. by their agreement with Michelin. It is plain that the Dunlop Co. and the Clipper Co. could obtain Michelin Bartlett tyres, though not direct from Messrs. Michelin. But I do not think that any action would lie for such a statement as that. But Mr. Weigel did not stop at this; he went on to say that there were other reasons which prevented the Dunlop Co. and the Clipper Co. from importing Michelin tyres. In my judgment this was not a bonâ fide statement honestly made to protect or advance the interests of the defendants. There is evidence of litigation before the 18th of February, 1903, between the plaintiffs and companies of which Mr. Weigel was manager or in the management of which he took an active part, such litigation relating to the rights of the Dunlop Co. in the Bartlett patent. Without making too much of this evidence, it is at least clear that there was in February, 1903, what I may describe as a state of active hostility existing between Mr. Weigel and the Dunlop Co. I think that Mr. Weigel knew when he wrote the letter that it was not a correct or fair statement of the facts, and that he wrote it in order to injure the Dunlop Co. and the Clipper Co. by preventing them from obtaining orders for Michelin tyres. The defendants were asked to withdraw the letter and to undertake to write no more such letters, but they refused to do so. It seems to me that such a letter was calculated directly and immediately to injure the plaintiffs by depriving them of orders. It was intended to have this effect. If actual damage had been proved, I have no doubt that the defendants might have been made liable for damages in an action at law. It had been contended for the defendants that, as no actual damage had been proved, no injunction could be granted, and White v. Mellin, 43 W. R., 353, [1895] App. Cas. 154, was relied upon for that proposition. No doubt there were expressions in the judgments in that case which afford some plausible ground for that contention. But the language used by the lords in that case must be considered in connection with the view they took of the facts. I think that they came to the conclusion that there was no evidence that the libel was false, or that it had caused or was calculated to cause damage, or that it was false to the knowledge of the defendant, or that the defendant had been malicious. Further, it was extremely doubtful whether there was any libel at all. It was, therefore, perfectly clear that no action would lie for damages or for an injunction. But I am of opinion that where, as in the present case, damage would be the natural and direct result likely to follow, and so highly probable that it might be properly described as imminent, an injunction will lie. As to the second action, it was said that the Clipper Co. were only the equitable and not the legal owners, and that therefore they could not bring the action. If they could not, no one could. The equitable owners were alone injured. I do not think it matters whether the title is legal or equitable. If the libel was injurious the plaintiffs could bring this action. Therefore I grant an injunction as prayed for. As regards the Earl of Shrewsbury, on whose part no want of good faith appeared, on the further argument, I am of opinion that the attention of this defendant was called to the letter after it was written, and that he refused to withdraw it. Without deciding whether in fact the Earl of Shrewsbury made himself a party to the malice, and without discussing the cases, I am of opinion that the case of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 15 W. R. 877, L. R. 2 Ex. 259, is in point, and therefore there must also be judgment against the earl.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, J. B. & F. Purchase.

Solicitors for defendants, J. Hands.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Nov. 30.

In re PARRY.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE v. WALTERS AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Settlement—Avoidance of voluntary settlement—Purchase for valuable consideration—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

A bankrupt, within two years of his bankruptcy, in consideration of the trustees of a former settlement consenting to the partial revocation of the same, executed a new settlement with the same trustees, settling further property, and giving the trustees power to pay or withhold the income of the settled funds at their discretion.

Held, that the trustees of the settlement were not purchasers or incumbrancers for valuable consideration, and that the new settlement must be declared void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy to avoid a settlement made by the debtor after marriage, and within two years of the commencement of the bankruptcy to such extent as might be necessary in order to pay the debts and costs of the bankruptcy in full.

The debtor, upon coming into certain property in 1899, made a settlement of such property upon trustees, dated the 4th of October, 1899. Under this settlement, which was not impeached in the present proceedings, the trustees were obliged to pay the settlor the income arising from the settled funds. The trustees further had power to revoke the settlement, either wholly or in part, at the request of the settlor; but it was left entirely in their discretion to grant or withhold their consent to any revocation.

In 1902 the debtor was employed as purser on an Atlantic liner, and got into trouble over his accounts, with the result that in December, 1902, he was arrested in London on a charge of embezzlement from the steamship company and taken to Liverpool, where he was lodged in gaol. He appealed to the trustees of the settlement to find bail for him, but they refused to assist him unless he consented to execute the settlement which the trustee in bankruptcy now sought to set aside. On condition of his executing that settlement they consented to a partial revocation of the former settlement to an extent sufficient to enable them to raise out of the settled funds sufficient money to pay his then existing debts and the money he was alleged to have embezzled. Upon the payment of that money the charge against the debtor was withdrawn.

The new settlement, which was executed on the 29th December, 1902, differed considerably from the earlier one, inasmuch as it left it entirely in the power of the trustees to pay the settlor the income of the funds settled under both settlements, or to withhold such income and accumulate it for the benefit of those entitled in remainder. It also included a valuable reversion to which the debtor had become entitled since the date of the earlier settlement.

A receiving order was made against the debtor in March, 1903; he was adjudged bankrupt and a trustee was appointed, who, after inquiring into the circumstances connected with the execution of the settlement of December, 1902, now moved to set it aside.

Reed, K.C., and Frank Mellor, for the trustee.—The second settlement is bad under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The trustees only paid the debtor out of property of his own of which they were trustees. That is no consideration whatever. They cannot be said to be "purchasers or incumbrancers for valuable consideration," for it has been laid down in the cases of Ex parte Hillman, In re Pumfrey, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622, and Hance v. Harding, 36 W. R. 629, 20 Q. B. D. 732, that "purchaser" must be construed in a commercial sense.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Hansell, for the respondents.—The bankrupt was not the only beneficiary under the first settlement, and it is therefore not correct to say that the trustees paid him out of his own property to execute the second settlement. They, on behalf of those interested in the first settlement, surrendered certain rights in consideration of the new settlement being made, and that was sufficient consideration to uphold the recent settlement: Ex parte Berry, 19 Ves. 218.

Reed, K.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—The view I take of this case depends entirely upon the fact that the first settlement was revocable. I therefore hold that the settlement now in question is not a settlement in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration within section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, following the definition of a purchaser as laid down in Ex parte Hillman, In re Pumfrey, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622; Hance v. Harding, 36 W. R. 629, 20 Q. B. D. 732. Here the settlor, being anxious to get the present use of a portion of the assets comprised in the first settlement, was willing to bring other assets into settlement on the terms that the trustees should exercise the discretion given them to consent to the partial revocation of the first settlement. I do not think that was really a transaction of purchase at all; the trustees did not purchase at any price at all; they merely exercised their fiduciary power on terms which satisfied them that the trusts would not suffer. In one sense it may be said that the consideration which was given really came from the bankrupt himself; but the ground for the view which I take is that it was not a bargain of purchase at all, but merely a partial substitution of one trust asset for another, in the discretion of the trustees.

I hold, therefore, that the trustee is entitled to avoid the settlement so far as regards whatever would have been available for creditors under the first settlement, and as regards whatever fresh matter was brought into the later settlement.

Application allowed.

Solicitor for the applicant, E. M. Lazarus.

Solicitors for the respondents, Walters & Co.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 13.

BARRETT v. KEMP BROTHERS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — "Factory" — Wharf — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Every wharf is a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co., 47 W. R. 486, [1899] 2 Q. B. 136, is overruled by Raine v. Jobson & Co., 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Sittingbourne County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a labourer in the employment of Messrs. Kemp Brothers, who were builders and contractors. The employers were the lessees of a wharf on the River Medway, which they used for the purpose of loading and unloading materials used by them in their business. There was no machinery or plant on the wharf. Any one was allowed to use the wharf on payment of wharfage. The employers were also the lessees and occupiers of a private road, 250 yards long and 10ft. to 12ft. wide, which led from the public highway to the wharf, and to no other place. A gate 7ft. high separated this road from the public highway, the gate being kept continuously locked, except when the road was being used by the employers or their servants, and the key being kept by the employers. The employers' name was on the gate, and the road was bounded on both sides by a hedge, and the wharf was similarly bounded, except on the side fronting the river and at the junction where it connected with the road. The applicant was employed on the private road, breaking stones for the purpose of repairing the road, and when at work on the road at a place about 30 or 40 yards from the gate, a piece of stone struck one of his eyes and he lost the sight of it. The applicant had never been employed on the wharf itself. The employers gave notice of the accident to the inspector of factories and entered it in the book kept by them for the purpose.

In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was admitted that if the wharf was a "factory" the employers were the "undertakers" in respect thereof. The county court judge held that the employment on the road leading to the wharf was employment on or about the wharf, and that the wharf was a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. He accordingly made an award of compensation. The employers appealed.

G. A. Scott, for the employers.—This wharf is not a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. There is no machinery or plant on the wharf. To make the wharf a factory it must be a wharf to which some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, is applied: Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co., 47 W. R. 486, [1899] 2 Q. B. 136. Section 104 of that Act applies five sets of provisions, as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse were included in the word "factory." Two of those provisions only were capable of being applied to this wharf. Those two provisions were, however, for the reasons pointed out in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co., not in fact applicable to this wharf. The wharf was not used in such a way as to constitute it a factory within section 7 of the Act of 1897. That section does not make every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse a factory, but only those to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, now the Act of 1901. The House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson & Co., 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404, did not say that every dock or wharf is a factory within the Act. Counsel for the respondents there made an admission that every dock is a factory within the Act of 1897. The law lords did not adopt that admission; they only adopted it as an admission that the particular dock in that case was a factory. The decision in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. is not affected by the case in the House of Lords. The applicant must give some evidence that some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, has become applicable to this wharf. There is no such evidence. Even, however, if it can be said that Raine v. Jobson & Co. decided that every dock is a factory, it does not follow that every wharf is a factory. Every dock must have machinery or plant used for loading and discharging vessels, and therefore must necessarily be a factory. That is not always the case with a wharf. Therefore, the wharf in the present case was not a factory within the Act of 1897. Secondly, if it is a factory, the accident did not happen "on or about" the factory. It occurred more than 200 yards away from the wharf.

He referred upon this point to Powell v. Brown, 47 W. R. 145, [1899] 1 Q. B. 157, and Fenn v. Miller, 48 W. R. 369, [1900] 1 Q. B. 788.

Cecil Walsh, for the applicant, was not called upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 13.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judge of the Sittingbourne County Court, who held that the applicant was entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant sustained injury by an accident while employed upon a private road within the curtilage of the wharf in question, and the county court judge held that the employment on the road leading to the wharf was employment on or about the wharf, and that the wharf was a factory. We reserved our decision in the matter in order that we might consider what was the true bearing of the decision of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson & Co., and what was its effect upon the earlier decision of this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. Having carefully considered those cases, it seems to me to be quite clear that the decision in the House of Lords has overruled the decision in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. It is true that the case of Raine v. Jobson & Co. was not argued upon the question which arose for discussion in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co., and the decision of the House of Lords was based upon an admission by Mr. Ruegg in argument that, by the combined effect of the Compensation Act, 1897, and the Factory Act, 1895, every dock is a factory within the Act of 1897. That was an admission that every dock—and the admission necessarily applies equally to a wharf—is a factory, without any qualification whatever, and entirely without regard to the question whether any provision of the Factory Acts has in fact become applicable thereto. No doubt it is impossible for any admission of counsel to alter the law. The decision is the decision of the court, and the responsibility for the decision must rest with the court. But that admission of counsel was adopted by the House of Lords as the basis of their decision, and they decided the case without any evidence as to whether any provision of the Factory Acts, though capable of being applied to the dock, had in fact been so applied.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They seem to me to have decided that every dock, quite irrespective of whether any of the provisions of the Factory Acts in fact applied to it, was a factory. That is decisive of the question before us. It would not be paying proper respect to the decision of the House of Lords if we were to hold otherwise, though it is true that the ground of the decision in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. was not expressly dealt with by the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson & Co. I am aware that the decision in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, & Co. was not approved by the Court of Session in Scotland, and that in that country it cannot now be considered as law. Still I have not yet seen an answer to Mr. Bray's argument in that case. That argument comes to this, that the Legislature in defining a factory in section 7 of the Act of 1897 does not say that every dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse is a factory. On the contrary, the Legislature says that only those docks, wharves, quays, and warehouses to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied are factories, assuming that there are docks, wharves, quays, and warehouses which are not factories. The effect of the decision in Scotland—and the text writers seem to adopt the same view as is taken in that decision—is to ignore and treat as not in the Act the primâ facie limitation placed by the Act upon the definition of factory so far as it applies to docks, wharves, quays, and warehouses. It is not necessary to pursue this matter further, because the House of Lords has adopted the view that the Act must be construed as though the limitations placed upon the definition did not exist. The county court judge was therefore right.

There only remains the second question, whether the place where the accident happened was on or about the factory. The place was on a road within the curtilage of the factory. The question is one of fact, and there is abundant evidence upon which the county court judge could find as he has done. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, F. J. Berryman, for W. A. Watson, Chatham.

Solicitors for the employers, Smiles & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 19.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MURRAY. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property deemed to pass on death—Interest provided by deceased—Policy of life insurance—Marriage settlement—Policy on life of deceased settled by father of deceased—Insurable interest—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2, sub-section 1 (d),

On the marriage of C. P. a settlement was made of his fortune. By the deed of settlement it was witnessed (inter alia) that the father of C. P., who had some years previously effected a policy of insurance in his own name on the life of C. P., assigned the policy to the trustees of the settlement with the approbation of C. P. On the death of C. P. the insurance company paid the policy-money to the trustees. The Crown claimed estate duty on the policy-money under section 2, sub-section 1 (d), of the Finance Act, 1894, as on an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person."

Held, that estate duty was not payable, for the policy was not provided by the deceased within the meaning of sub-section 1 (d).

Held, also, that the want of insurable interest on the part of the father would not have prevented estate duty being payable.

Policies of insurance are within sub-section 1 (d) of section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, as well as within sub-section 1 (c).

Judgment of Ridley, J., 51 W. R. 572, [1903] 2 K. B. 64, reversed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., on an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894 (reported 51 W. R. 572, [1903] 2 K. B. 64).

On the 25th of July, 1866, Sir Henry William Peek effected a policy for £10,000 in his own name on the life of his son Cuthbert Edgar Peek (who was born in 1855), to commence at the age of twenty-one years, with the Commercial Union Assurance Co. (Limited). Ten premiums only of £357 18s. 4d. each were to be paid, the first on the 25th of July, 1866, and the last on the 25th of July, 1875, all of which Sir Henry Peek duly paid. By the terms of the policy, which was under the company's seal, it was declared that the capital stock and funds of the company were liable to pay to the assured £10,000 on proof of the death of Cuthbert Edgar Peek after attaining the age of twenty-one years, and the policy entitled the holder to participate in profits.

In 1884 Cuthbert Peek was married to Augusta Louisa Brodrick, a daughter of Viscount Middleton, and on the occasion of the marriage he brought into settlement certain property (including the moneys secured by the policy) as his property, and separate settlements of the husband's fortune and the wife's fortune were executed. By the settlement of the husband's fortune it was witnessed (inter alia) that Sir Henry Peek as settlor assigned the policy to the trustees "with the approbation of the said Cuthbert Edgar Peek and Augusta Louisa Brodrick." The trustees were the defendants, Alexander Henry Hallam Murray and William St. John Fremantle Brodrick. Cuthbert Peek (who succeeded to his father's title on the 26th of August, 1898) died on the 6th of July, 1901, his widow surviving him. On his death the Commercial Union Assurance Co. paid to the trustees a sum of £14,196 17s. in respect of the policy and the bonuses thereon.

The Crown claimed that estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, ss. 1 and 2 (1) (d), both or either of them, became payable by the defendants on the above sum of £14,196 17s. as "property passing or deemed to pass on the death" of Sir Cuthbert Edgar Peek.

Section 1 of the Finance Act is as follows: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of the Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called 'estate duty,' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned."

Section 2, sub-section 1, provides as follows: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say: (d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accru-ing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased."

Ridley, J., gave judgment in favour of the Crown.

The defendants appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—First, the policy in this case was not an annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person. It was the property of Sir Henry Peek and was provided by him, perhaps in concert with his son. But the sub-section does not include property provided by some other person in concert with the deceased. Secondly, Sir Henry Peek never had any insurable interest in the life of his son, and therefore the purported assurance was at all times null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever under the Life Assurance Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48). Thirdly, sub-section 1 (d) of section 2 of the Finance Act does not apply at all to policies of insurance, which are dealt with by sub-section 1 (c).

They referred to Attorney-General v. Dobree, 48 W. R. 413, [1900] 1 Q. B. 442; Lord Advocate v. Robertson, 45 W. R. 674, [1897] A. C. 145.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—First, as to the defendant's second point, the payment of the money by the insurance company to the defendants was not a gift or a voluntary payment. Worthington v. Curtis, 24 W. R. 228, 1 Ch. D. 419, is an authority to show that, if it was in fact paid, it must be treated as paid in respect of the policy. Next, as to the defendant's third point, policies of insurance do not fall only within sub-section 1 (c), they fall within the general scope of section 2, and the terms of sub-section 1 (d) are quite applicable to them: Attorney-General v. Robinson, Ir. L. R. [1901] 2 K. B. 67. Lastly, as to the defendant's first point, the correspondence shows that the policy was in fact provided by the son in concert with his father.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: This is an appeal from a judgment of Ridley, J., who has held that estate duty is payable under section 2, sub-section 1 (d), of the Finance Act, 1894, on the death of Sir Cuthbert Peek in respect of a policy for £10,000 on his life settled by his marriage settlement. The material words of the statute are these: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say: Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased."

Three points were raised in support of the appeal. First, it is contended that no property passed on the death, because the policy was taken out by and in the name of Sir Henry Peek, the father of Sir Cuthbert, who had, as the office was informed at the time, no insurable interest in his son's life. The policy was therefore illegal and void under the statute 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, and any money paid by the office after Sir Cuthbert's death was a mere gratuity. In our opinion, this contention cannot prevail. The statute made the contract of insurance void as between the office and Sir Henry, but no further. If the office, though not bound so to do, in fact paid the money, the payment must be treated as made in respect of the policy, and all the same consequences must follow as if the statute had not been passed. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in Worthington v. Curtis really concludes this point. The words of Mellish, L.J., are clear and direct: "The statute is a defence for the insurance company only, if they choose to avail themselves of it. If they do not, the question who is entitled to the money must be determined as if the statute did not exist. The contract is only made void as between the company and the insurer." The court could not have arrived at the decision in that case on any other view of the law.

Secondly, it is contended that a policy of insurance is not an interest within sub-section 1 (d). We have not been able to appreciate this argument. A policy is plainly property within the scope of section 2, and we can see no ground for excluding it from sub-section 1 (d). We are content to adopt the reasoning of Palles, L.C.B., in Attorney-General v. Robinson, and we do not think any good object would be attained by attempting to further elaborate it.

Thirdly, assuming that this particular policy is capable of being brought within sub-section 1 (d), it is contended that it was not "purchased or provided by the deceased either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person." Now it is clear that, apart from the statute of Geo. 3, the policy was the property of Sir Henry alone, and that Sir Cuthbert had no right to or interest in it. The marriage settlement is framed on this footing. Sir Henry "as settlor" assigns the policy to the trustees upon the usual trusts. He also brings into settlement stocks and securities of large amount as well as real estate. We can draw no distinction between the policy and this other property. Who "provided" this property? The answer must be the father and not the son. The son "provided" some other property of his own, including a policy on his own life in another office, which we only mention to show that it has not been overlooked, but he did not "provide" this property. We are not prepared to hold that on a marriage settlement everything brought into settlement on the husband's side by his father or other relatives can properly be said to be provided by the husband in concert or by arrangement with his father or other relatives. The Finance Act must, of course, be construed fairly, but it is for the Crown to establish that a particular case falls within the language used, and we think the attempt fails in the present case. It is perhaps worth noting that if Sir Henry, instead of being father of Sir Cuthbert, had been his uncle or had stood in loco parentis, it is clear that succession duty would be payable under the settlement, as on a succession from him, it being a disposition by him as predecessor. That the policies should be "provided" by the son, so as to be liable to estate duty, and at the same time "disposed of" by the legal owner of the policy, so as to be liable to succession duty at a rate based on the relationship of the predecessor, would be a strange result. In our opinion estate duty is not payable in respect of this policy money, but succession duty at 1 per cent. will be payable on the death of Lady Peek, who is now entitled for life to the income arising from the investment of the policy money. In the view which we take it is not necessary to consider the precise meaning of the words "in concert or by arrangement with any other person." Section 15, sub-section 3, indicates one class of cases to which the words might apply, and we conceive they might apply to a case where a husband settles a policy on his own life, and provision is made in the settlement for paying future premiums by the trustees out of the income of the trust property. This is by no means an unusual provision, and other examples might be given. An attempt was made to bring the case within sub-section 1 (d) by referring to a letter written by Sir Henry to the office with the proposal, in which he said: "I effect the assurance in my own name, but with a view to giving him a paid-up policy for marriage settlement or otherwise if after he shall have attained his majority his conduct is quite satisfactory to me." But this expression of intention was of no moment. The intention was never carried into effect. It gave the son no right or interest in the policy. It cannot alter or enlarge the rights of the Crown, which must depend upon the terms of the marriage settlement alone. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitor for the defendants, Johnsons, Long, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Nov. 20.

OLDE v. OLDE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Vendor's motion to rescind contract—Form of order—Costs.

Form of order on motion for rescission of contract with costs of the motion and stay of all further proceedings, except such as might be necessary for recovery of the costs in an action for specific performance.

A vendor had brought an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land and obtained judgment for specific performance of the contract, with costs of the action to be taxed, &c. The master had certified that a good title had been made and the amount due to the plaintiff for the balance of the purchase-money.

The defendant had not paid the balance of the purchase-money nor the plaintiff's taxed costs in the action.

The plaintiff now moved for the rescission of the contract with costs of the motion, and that all further proceedings might be stayed except such as might be necessary for the recovery of the costs of the action already ordered to be paid and the costs of the motion.

Welby King, for the motion, contended that if Jeffery v. Stewart, 80 L. T. 17, decided by North, J., were followed, the plaintiff would lose the costs given when judgment was pronounced, as all proceedings would be stayed.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: I do not quite follow the decision of North, J., but I think the difference is more a question of words than anything else. I will, however, adopt the form of order made by Byrne, J., in Westerman v. Pantlin, Seaton on Judgments (6th ed.), vol. 3, p. 2289.

Solicitor for plaintiff, C. G. Algar.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. } Buckley, J. } Dec. 14, 16.

STAINER v. HODGKINSON. (a.)

Will—Construction—Tenant for life and remainderman—Specific gift—Property of a wasting nature or involving onerous obligations—Gift of business—Profits arising from business pending sale—Enjoyment in specie.

A specific bequest to a tenant for life of property of a wasting nature or involving onerous obligations entitles the tenant for life to enjoy the property in specie; it is immaterial whether the bequest be that of a leasehold or of a business. To enable executors in such a case to carry on a business, it is not necessary to find in the will a distinct authority for that purpose; the authority may be inferred from the general terms of the will.

A testator gave to his wife, during her widowhood, all his real and personal estate, and at her death all to be divided amongst his children, also his shares in certain businesses. There was no express trust for conversion or power to carry on the businesses. The shares were not converted during the tenancy of the widow. The question arising whether the whole of the profits earned during the tenancy belonged to the widow or only such proportion as represented £4 per cent. per annum on the capital value of the shares,

Held, that the gift of the shares to the widow during her tenancy was specific, that she was entitled to enjoy them in specie, and, consequently, that the whole of the profits belonged to her.

Kirkman v. Booth, 11 Beav. 273, distinguished.

In re Chancellor, 32 W. R. 465, 26 Ch. D. 42, followed.

This was the hearing of an adjourned summons asking for the determination of questions arising on the construction of the will of John Smith (deceased), the answer to one of which depended on whether or not a tenant for life was entitled to the enjoyment in specie of the profits of a share in a business.

The testator, at the time of, and for some time prior to his death, carried on business as a colliery proprietor and brick and tile manufacturer in co-partnership with three other persons under the respective styles or firms of "The New Hem Heath Mining Co." and "The New Rose Vale Brick and Tile Co."

By his will, dated the 17th of March, 1896, the testator, after directing payment of his debts and funeral expenses, continued as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my wife, Mary Jane Smith, all my real and personal estate for her use as long as she remains a widow, and at her death all to be divided amongst my four children [naming them], also my shares and interest in" the above-mentioned businesses.

The testator died on the 30th of March, 1896, leaving him surviving his widow, and four children all of whom are still under the age of twenty-one years.

The executors did not at once convert into money the shares of the testator in the two businesses, which were carried on by the surviving partners, large sums, representing the income arising from these shares, being from time to time paid direct to the widow.

At various dates in 1898 the widow, out of the moneys so paid to her, paid £850 into a deposit account at a bank to the credit of the executors. In 1899 and 1900 they repaid to her out of this account £310. There was thus a balance remaining to their credit of £540.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The executors sold the shares of the testator in the partnerships on the 26th of March, 1900.

The widow re-married on the 4th of August, 1902.

The question for determination was as to who was entitled to the above-mentioned balance of £540.

Earle, for the executors.

Whinney, for the widow.—The widow is entitled to the whole amount. The rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, does not apply to a case like the present, where, on the construction of the will, there is a direction that the tenant for life shall enjoy the property in specie. There was, therefore, no obligation imposed on the executors to sell the shares in the businesses, and since they did not do so, the widow is entitled to the whole of the profits attributable to the testator's shares during the period in which they remained unsold. A direction to divide property after the death of a person who is to enjoy it for life is an indication of an intention that the tenant for life shall enjoy it in specie. Collins v. Collins, 2 My. & K. 703; Pickering v. Pickering, 4 My. & Cr. 289; Holgate v. Jennings, 24 Beav. 623; and In re Crowther, 43 W. R. 571, [1895] 2 Ch. 56, are also in my favour.

Buckmaster, K.C., and W. E. Hughes, for the persons entitled in remainder. — There is a distinction between a gift of leaseholds and a gift of a business. In the case of a business, unless there is a strong direction in the will itself to the executors to carry it on, the executors ought to sell it: per Lord Langdale, M.R., in Kirkman v. Booth, 11 Beav. 273, at p. 280. Since it was the duty of the executors to have sold this admittedly wasting security, the widow is entitled only to £4 per cent. on the capital value of the shares. In re Chancellor, 32 W. R. 465, 26 Ch. D. 42, and In re Crowther, where a power to carry on the testator's business was implied, are distinguishable, because in both there was a power to postpone conversion, with a direction as to the intermediate income. It is a question, on the construction of this will, whether the direction that the widow was to have the "use" of the property amounted to a specific gift.

Fearns v. Young, 9 Ves. 549, was also referred to.

Whinney, in reply.—The principle of Kirkman v. Booth was overruled in In re Chancellor, where it was held that a power to carry on a testator's business can be implied from other provisions in the will.

He also referred to In re Norrington, 28 W. R. 711, 13 Ch. D. 654; In re Cameron, 32 W. R. 834, 26 Ch. D. 19; and In re Bland, [1899] 2 Ch. 336.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: I will first state some general principles. The first is that the mere fact that there is no direction to convert does not in itself entitle the widow to enjoy the property in specie. You have still to see that the dispositions are such that the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth is excluded. What it is necessary to find in the will in order to exclude the rule is the question to be decided. The second principle is that you must bear in mind that there may be two sorts of property as to which it is relevant to consider whether they are of a wasting nature, or whether they are not only wasting, but are also burdened by onerous obligations. There are many cases in the books concerning leaseholds. Leaseholds fall within both categories; for the rent reserved by and the covenants contained in a lease may be trivial or they may be onerous. In the case of an ordinary lease of a house for twenty-one years the obligations may not be heavy. But there are many leases—for example, those of collieries—where the onus on the estate is very heavy. If the case be not that of a leasehold, but that of a business or the share of a business involving risk in trade, I fail to see that there can be any difference, except in degree; there is no difference in principle. There have been two cases, Collins v. Collins and Pickering v. Pickering, in which the question now before me has arisen. In both the property was a leasehold, but, as I said before, there is no difference in principle between a leasehold and a business. In Collins v. Collins the gift was of all the testator's property to his wife for her life, and at her death "to be divided." The decision was that the tenant for life was specifically entitled during her life. In Pickering v. Pickering, a case before Lord Cottenham, the decision was that if the will contains indications—I say emphatically indications—of an intention that the tenant for life is to enjoy the property in its existing state, then the tenant for life is to enjoy the property in specie. The principle is stated in 4 My. & Cr., at p. 299, where, after referring to the rule in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, Lord Cottenham says: "But that is merely an inference from the mode in which the property is to be enjoyed, if no direction is given as to how the property is to be managed. It is equally clear that if a person gives certain property specifically to one person for life, with remainder over afterwards, then, although there is a danger that one object of his bounty will be defeated by the tenancy for life lasting as long as the property endures, yet there is a manifestation of intention which the court cannot overlook." In other words, the point of the decision is that from the fact of property having been given specifically to a tenant for life, you can infer an indication of an intention in the testator that the property is not to be converted, but is to be enjoyed in specie.

There are two other authorities later than those I have mentioned, where the point was not quite the same, owing to the existence of a trust for conversion and a power to postpone. It was held that, owing to the power which was given to postpone conversion, you might infer in the subsequent direction to pay income a direction to pay the whole income during such time as the conversion might be postponed. These two cases are In re Chancellor and In re Crowther. In re Chancellor is important first because it is a decision that in order to enable the trustees to carry on the business of a testator, it is not necessary to find in the will an express direction or power for them to do so, but that it is sufficient if it be implied. You have to read the will and see whether the testator has indicated an intention that they should do so. Mr. Buckmaster says that to enable them to carry on the business that intention must be a "necessary" implication from the terms of the will. I do not understand what that expression means. The intention is either implied, or it is not; if it is implied, it is necessary, otherwise it is not necessary. The case of Kirkman v. Booth, to which I shall refer hereafter, was cited in In re Chancellor, where it was said, 26 Ch. D., at p. 46, "Without impugning any of the authorities that have been referred to, there is in this will an implied authority to carry on the business, and the testator has said how the profits of the business pending a sale are to be paid and applied." The general rule is stated by Cotton, L.J., at p. 45, to be "that where property is invested on a security of a wasting character, that must be realized, or if not realized immediately, then the tenant for life is only entitled to interest on the realized value. But a testator can say what he likes, and if he chooses to say that the investment may be continued, or the sale of it may be postponed, and that the profits arising from such security in the meantime shall be paid to the tenant for life, he can do so." In re Crowther, decided by Chitty, J., is to the same effect, and is another decision that authority to trustees to carry on the business of a testator may be implied. Holgate v. Jennings is another case of this class, and it is not necessary to refer to it in detail.

In all those five cases the tenant for life was successful. I pass to two cases where the decision was not in favour of the tenant for life. The first of those cases is Fearns v. Young. The point of that case, so far as it is material for the present purpose, is that there was no specific gift of the property in question. The other case is Kirkman v. Booth, a decision of Lord Langdale. The gift was that of a busines, and therefore the case is important. At p. 280 (11 Beav.) Lord Langdale is reported as saying, "I think it is, and it has been admitted to be, a rule without exception, that, to authorize executors to carry on a trade, or to permit it to be carried on with the property of a testator held by them in trust, there ought to be the most distinct and positive authority and direction given by the will itself for that purpose." Guiding myself by the subsequent decisions, and particularly by the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Chancellor, I am of opinion that that statement is too wide. In the first place, it requires qualification, because it is clear that the executors, after the death of a testator, may carry on the business for a reasonable time, with a view to its more profitable realization. No authority is wanted for that proposition, and Lord Langdale was not addressing himself to it. In the second place, in the light of the decision in In re Chancellor, it is too wide a statement to make, that there must be a distinct and positive direction to enable the excutors to carry on the business; it is sufficient if an implication of an intention that the executors should do so can be gathered from the will. And it must be borne in mind that Kirkman v. Booth was not a case of rights as between tenant for life and remainderman. It was a case where the trustees had carried on a business for thirteen years without any obligation to do so, and during that period of time had incurred a loss. The question was whether they were liable for that loss. With a view to a decision on that point, the court declared that the property ought to have been converted within one year from the testator's death. It is no authority for the proposition that a distinction exists between a leasehold involving liabilities and a business involving liabilities. As I have said before, I do not see that there is any distinction between them. The only other case bearing on the point is that of In re Bland, a decision of Stirling J. There, referring to Collins v. Collins and Pickering v. Pickering, the learned judge says ([1899] 2 Ch., at p. 338), "Even in a case where the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth is strictly applicable, an inference of an intention to the contrary has been drawn from the terms of the gift over," and then after citing a passage from the judgment of Lord Cottenham, L.C., in Pickering v. Pickering, he follows these two cases.

So much for the authorities. I now go to the terms of this particular will, which was evidently drawn by the testator himself. [His lordship read the will, and continued:] Reading that will, what ought the court to infer from it as to what he meant. After the gift of all his real and personal estate, he gives something else. Of course that is surplusage. But for the purpose of arriving at his intention it is material. He specifically says, I give her these shares. That was a specific gift to her of his interest in these businesses. There is no trust for conversion or power to carry on the businesses. But the inference I draw is that the testator intended that the widow should enjoy the property in specie during such time as the businesses should be carried on. After that he uses the language which was found in Collins v. Collins, "and at her death all to be divided." Without laying too much stress upon those words, I can infer that he meant that during her life nothing was to be converted, and at her death there was to be a division. From this will, therefore, I infer that there was a specific gift of his interest in these businesses to the widow, and also that it was to be unconverted during her widowhood, because there was to be a division at her death.

I think, therefore, that the profits earned in the businesses down to 1900 belonged to the widow.

Solicitors, Pitman & Sons, for Joseph Griffiths, Newcastle, Staffordshire; Doyle, Devonshire, & Woodhouse.

Chan. Div. }
Joyce, J. } May 19, 20; June 27, 1903.

HARVEY v. TRURO DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway—Road of varying width—Roadside strip—Public right—Disuse no deprivation of right.

Although a highway varies in width as measured between the fences, nevertheless the public right of passage or way, primâ facie, unless there be evidence to the contrary, extends to the whole space between the fences, and is not limited to that portion which may be metalled or kept in order for the more convenient use of carriages and foot passengers.

Action.

In this action the plaintiff claimed a declaration that no portion of a particular plot of land formed part of the highway, and that the defendants were not entitled to deposit upon this portion of the said land any road material without the permission of the plaintiff, and an injunction restraining the defendants' servants, &c., from trespassing on the said land or from demolishing the buildings thereon.

The facts, as deposed to by witnesses in the action, were as follows:

The highway in question was a main road vested in the County Council of Cornwall, but repairable by the defendant council under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Local Government Act, 1888. It adjoined the plaintiff's estate called Trenowth, in the parish of Probus, in the county of Cornwall, and led from Grampound-road to Probus. There was on the eastern side of the highway, between the metalled road and the plaintiff's fence, a strip of roadside waste to which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled, and a part of which he proposed to inclose.

In 1885 the then owner of Trenowth, Mr. Hendy, had pegged out this strip, which had hitherto been uninclosed and open to the public, but the pegs had been removed by the surveyor to the highway authority.

In 1887 a local policeman inclosed a portion of the strip, and for two years cultivated it as a garden, and later on Mr. Hendy's gamekeeper put wire along the fence, but one McCoskrie, in October, 1889, in assertion of a public right, destroyed the fence, and was summoned by Mr. Hendy, was convicted, and fined.

After 1889 the fence was not maintained or repaired.

For many years the road authority had used a portion of the strip as a place to deposit material for road-mending, and for this the road surveyor without authority had agreed to pay, and had paid, a nominal rent. This payment was disallowed by the road authority.

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1886 a wooden building had been erected partly on this strip and partly on what had been the metalled road. For this the plaintiff had received rent and had recovered rent in the High Court for possession against the occupant.

In September, 1903, the plaintiff built a wall separating this strip from the highway. The defendants, the highway authority, caused a portion of this wall to be thrown down.

The defendants justified their action on the grounds of the duties imposed on them by section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and also as representative of the Cornwall County Council under sub-section 4 of section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

Foote, K.C., Hughes, K.C., R. C. Glen, and A. Bethune, for the plaintiff.—There are two kinds of roadside wastes, those parts of highway and those not parts of highway, and which of the two any particular roadside waste is, is always a question of fact. Was the piece dedicated? A distinction between strips that run with the road and strips that lie off the road is not sufficient to show dedication, there must be also acceptation: Easton v. Richmond Highway Board, 20 W. R. 203, L. R. 7 Q. B. 69. Although there is a presumption that the road between the fences is a highway, yet this presumption may be upset on showing that the sides are unfit for a highway: Evans v. Oakley, 1 C. & K. 125.

Tindal Atkinson, A. Whitaker, and Crosfield, for the defendants.—This piece of land was open to the highway till 1885, and then fenced in. From that time efforts made to inclose it, so that before then it was a part of the highway. Where a highway runs between fences there is a presumption that the public have a right of passage over the space lying between the fences: Reg. v. Electric Telegraph Co., 2 B. & S. 647; Steel v. Prickett, 2 Starkie 463, 469; Glen on Highways, p. 55. Nothing that has occurred since has displaced this presumption. There might be something in the physical state of the piece of waste that would preclude the presumption that the waste was to be used as part of the road: Neeld v. Hendon Urban Council, 81 L. T. 405, 48 W. R. Dig. 67; Belmore v. Kent Council Council, 49 W. R. 459, [1901] 1 Ch. 873. In this last case there had been from time immemorial interference by the adjoining landowner in the waste. Two matters are proved beyond all doubt as to dedication: (a) Existence of many similar strips, one a stone's throw away; and (b) that the stable now stands on what was a metalled portion of the highway.

Foote, K.C., in reply.—Where the hedges are irregular and the distances between them varying, then the tendency is to rebut the presumption that the entire piece between the hedges is a portion of the highway: Attorney-General v. Biphosphated Guano Co., 27 W. R. 621, 11 Ch. D. 327. Directly evidence is shown to disturb the presumption, then the defendant must show that the land is used as highway: Belmont v. Kent County Council; Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council. Acquiescence by the road authority since 1887 throws the onus on the defendants to prove it was part of the highway.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27, 1903.—JOYCE, J.—I do not consider that the title of the plaintiff to the soil of the strip was by any means proved. Indeed there is a question as to whether his estate of Trenowth, which lies on the east of the road, does, as he contends, or does not, extend beyond his fence so as to comprise the strip; but both parties desire that I should determine the principal question—namely, the right (if any) of the public over the roadside waste.

In the first place, as the admitted plan shows, the old fences on either side of the road are as regular and continuous as one ever sees them, though the distance between them is not perfectly uniform. Indeed, this is seldom, if ever, found to be the case, except where the land has been first inclosed in recent years; or the road has been set out of uniform width by the award of commissioners, or otherwise under some Inclosure Act or other statute. The extreme width between the ancient fences, which include therein both the hard road and the strip, appears to vary from thirty to forty-three feet at the most—by no means an extraordinary width for a public highway. There is evidence to show that the hard road at one time ran much nearer to the fence on the eastern side than it does now. It is also the fact that not long before 1870 the metalled portion of the road was widened at the expense of the strip as then existing without any objection from the then owner of Trenowth.

Prior to the year 1885 no part of the strip was inclosed, nor was the use thereof by the public obstructed in any manner. In my judgment the ancient and present fence bounding the enclosed land on the eastern side of the road was put up or constructed in reference to the highway, and not as a boundary between the inclosed land and any piece of uninclosed waste, and the strip generally appears to have been actually used in the same manner and to as great an extent as roadside wastes belonging to the highway, but not metalled or kept in repair, are commonly used. In the case of an ordinary highway running between fences, although it may be of a varying and unequal width, the right of passage or way primâ facie, and unless there be evidence to the contrary, extends to the whole space between the fences, and the public are entitled to the whole of it as a highway, and are not confined to the part which may be metalled or kept in order for the more convenient use of carriages or foot passengers. All the ground between the fences is presumably dedicated as highway unless the nature of the ground or other circumstances rebut that presumption: see Leake on Uses and Profits of Land, p. 493. Upon this otherwise settled rule it was suggested that some doubt had been thrown by the recent decision in Neeld v. Hendon Urban Council, but there it was found as a fact that the ground in question was formerly part of the waste of the manor and had been so dealt with all along until the occurrences which gave rise to the action. That alone, in the opinion of A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., rendered the general doctrine of the cases inapplicable, and the latter judge expressly says: "The presumption is that primâ facie, if there be nothing to the contrary, the public right of way extends over the whole space of ground between the fences on either side of the road; that is to say, that the fences may primâ facie be taken to have been originally put up for the purpose of separating land dedicated as a highway from land not so dedicated." The case of the Countess of Belmore v. Kent County Council was a decision on the particular facts.

The supposed explanation of the fact that the land apparently dedicated for a highway is often wider than that now kept in repair is to be found in the judgment of Abbott, C.J., in Steel v. Prickett. Macadam's system of road-making with broken stone was not introduced at the earliest until just before the end of the eighteenth century, and as observed by Lord Tenterden in Rex v. Wright, 3 B. & Ald. 681, "The space at the sides," that is, of the hard road, "is also necessary to afford the benefit of air and sun. If trees and hedges might be brought close up to the part actually used as road, it could not be kept sound."

If this dispute had arisen and the action had come on to be tried in 1885, there would not, in my opinion, have been any evidence whatever to rebut the presumption that all the ground between the fences of the road at the place in question had been dedicated as highway. It is an established maxim that once a highway always a highway. The public cannot release their rights. Mere disuse of a highway cannot deprive the public of their rights. Where there has once been a highway no length of time during which it may not have been used will preclude the public from resuming the exercise of the right to use it if and when they think proper. The authorities for this are to be found in any of the usual text-books on the Law of Highways, and there is a well-known case where some of the encroachments on the roadside waste had existed for more than forty years, but it was held that no period of modern enjoyment was of any avail to deprive the public of the right they had once enjoyed. Suppose, then, that in the year 1885 the plaintiff's predecessor in title, as owner of the Trenowth estate, had succeeded in inclosing the strip of land now in question in the absence of effective opposition from the then highway authority, it appears to me that even uninterrupted possession for the seventeen years before the present dispute began would not and could not have legalized the encroachment. [His lordship then referred to the facts that had taken place subsequent to 1885, and continued:] Even if the highway authority had actually consented to any obstruction or encroachment on the strip as being part of the highway, such consent could not legalize that which was otherwise illegal. The highway authority had consented to the obstruction complained of in the case of Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Co., 31 L. J. M. C. 166, as also in the well-known case of Reg. v. Train, 31 L. J. M. C. 169, but such consent was held to be wholly ineffectual.

As I understand it, all that the defendants have done is to cause to be broken down a portion of the new fence in process of erection by the plaintiff. This, I think, they were entitled to do if such fence was an illegal encroachment, as I hold it to be, there being no sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption that the whole of the land between the fences of the road, where the plaintiff proposed to inclose, formed part of the highway, and there being nothing in the dimensions, shape, or character of the ground to make the presumption inapplicable. If necessary, I hold, as a matter of fact, that the fences of the road were put up for the purposes of separating land dedicated as a highway from land not so dedicated.

The statement of claim also asks for a declaration that no portion of the site of a certain building adjoining the strip formed part of the highway. This building is a small wooden erection with a corrugated iron roof erected in 1886 or 1887. I find as a fact that the western half of this site stands upon ground which formerly was actually part of the metalled road. There is, in my opinion, still less evidence to rebut the legal presumption, which I have mentioned, in reference to this site than in reference to the portion of the strip now proposed to be inclosed. The possession of a squatter on the highway since 1886 cannot bar the public right. The plaintiff's case fails with respect to this as well as with respect to the attempted inclosure, and therefore fails altogether, and the action must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton, for Chilcot & Sons, Truro.

Solicitors for the defendants, J. A. Bartrum, for R. Dobell, Truro.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 6.

REX v. NEPEAN.
Ex parte JENKINS. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliament—Lodger claim—Objection as to value of lodgings—Evidence—Disallowance of claim—Refusal to state case—Order nisi for mandamus*—Statement of revising barrister in answer to order* nisi*—Statement to be made on affidavit—Registration Act*, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18), ss. 42, 65*—Parliamentary Registration Act*, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), ss. 22, 23; s. 28, sub-sections 10, 11; ss. 36, 37.

J. claimed to vote as an old lodger; it appeared in the body of his claim that he occupied as lodgings two unfurnished rooms on the top floor of a house, for which rooms he paid 5s. 6d. weekly, and in the declaration annexed to the claim the claimant declared that his lodgings were of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards. The claim was duly objected to on the ground that the lodgings were not of sufficient value. It was proved that the whole house was only rated at £14, and there were also other circumstances in evidence before the revising barrister which raised a strong doubt in his mind as to whether the lodgings were of sufficient value. The revising barrister adjourned the hearing to an evening sitting of the court, and meanwhile sent a written notice to the claimant that his claim would, or might be, disallowed unless he produced, or caused to be produced, at the evening sitting his rent-book or other sufficient evidence that his lodgings were of the requisite value. The claimant having altogether ignored this notice, the revising barrister disallowed the claim, on the ground that he was not satisfied that the claimant's lodgings were of the requisite value, and refused to state a case. An order nisi for a mandamus having been obtained ex parte,

Held, that the case raised a question as to the true construction of section 28, sub-sections 10, 11, of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878, and that the order nisi should be made absolute.

Held, also, that as a general rule a statement made by a revising barrister in answer to an order nisi should be on affidavit.

The observations of the Court on this point in In re Bane, W. N., 1879, p. 200, discussed and distinguished.

Order nisi for a mandamus calling upon the revising barrister for the Parliamentary Borough of Hackney, and one H. J. Edis, to show cause why an appeal should not be entertained and a case stated in the matter of the objection taken at the revision court by the said Edis to the name of the applicant William Jenkins being retained on the old lodgers' list of electors for the South Hackney Division of the said Parliamentary Borough.

The revising barrister had allowed the objection, and had expunged Jenkins' name from the old lodgers' list.

The order nisi was obtained on the ex parte application of Jenkins and the registration agent who had appeared on his behalf, who made affidavits in which they stated that Jenkins did in fact pay 5s. 6d. a week for his lodgings, and had duly claimed as an old lodger; that his claim had been objected to by the said Edis on the ground that the lodgings occupied by Jenkins were not of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards; that no evidence was adduced in support of the objection other than the fact (which was admitted) that the whole house, in which Jenkins occupied two rooms as his lodgings, was only rated at £14 per annum; and that the revising barrister had thereupon allowed the objection, and refused to state a case.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon being served with the order nisi, the revising barrister, in answer thereto, submitted to the court a written report (not on affidavit), of which the following is a summary, and from which it appeared that the material facts of the case were really as follows:

(1) Previously to the year 1903 the party registration agents in South Hackney, under an agreement between themselves, had refrained from taking any objection on the ground of value to any lodger claims; this had been brought to the revising barrister's attention in 1902, and he had then expressed his disapproval of such practice and intimated that it ought not be continued:

(2) In 1903 the town clerk, at the request of the revising barrister, prepared a statement in regard to the lodger claims made in 1903, showing the rateable value of the houses in which the lodger claimants lodged, from which it appeared that 317 lodger claims were made in respect of houses of a rateable value of £14 and under, and that in the case of 53 houses whose rateable value ranged from £9 to £20, claims for two lodgers in each house had been made:

(3) On the 14th of September, 1903, the revising barrister made a personal inspection of the larger part of South Hackney, accompanied by the borough registration officer, who had known the constituency for twenty years, and the barrister then satisfied himself that the character of the constituency was very poor and the houses very small, many streets consisting entirely of houses which were little better than hovels, and that consequently the question whether or not any particular lodgings were worth £10 a year unfurnished was extremely doubtful:

(4) Ada-street, in which the claimant Jenkins' lodgings were situate, was not one of the streets visited by the barrister, but on hearing of Jenkins' claim the borough registration officer, in answer to a question of the revising barrister, stated that Ada-street was as poor a street as any which the revising barrister had inspected:

(5) It was proved to the satisfaction of the revising barrister that the rateable value of the whole house 8, Ada-street, in which the claimant Jenkins occupied two rooms as his lodgings, was only £14 per annum, which was 6s. less than the amount of the annual rent which Jenkins in his claim stated he paid for his lodgings:

(6) Jenkins' claim, together with numerous other lodger claims to which objections on the ground of insufficient value had been taken, were adjourned by the revising barrister from the 15th of September to an evening sitting to be held on the 18th of September, the revising barrister then stating in court that if the claimants respectively satisfied him that they paid rent amounting to £10 per annum, or that their respective lodgings were of the prescribed value, he would allow the claims, but that otherwise he would not allow them:

(7) On the 15th of September the revising barrister also sent to each claimant, including Jenkins, the following written notice: "Take notice that your claim to vote as a lodger has been objected to on the ground that your lodgings are not of the clear yearly value of £10 if let unfurnished; your claim will or may be disallowed unless you produce, or cause to be produced, to me at the evening sitting at my court commencing at 6.30 p.m. on Friday, the 18th of September, 1903, your rent-book or other sufficient evidence that your said lodgings are of the clear yearly value of £10 or upwards if let unfurnished":

(8) At the evening sitting of the court on the 18th of September some sixty lodger claimants attended, and, by production of their rent-books or other evidence, satisfied the barrister that they actually paid the rent stated in their claims amounting to £10 per annum or upwards; a few other claimants who were unable to attend wrote letters to the same effect, which the barrister accepted as evidence, and allowed the claims in all such cases. Jenkins, however, and some hundreds of other lodger claimants neither attended nor wrote, nor was any explanation given of their absence. The revising barrister thereupon disallowed the claim of Jenkins and the claims of these others on the ground that they had respectively failed to satisfy him that they occupied lodgings of the necessary value:

(9) The registration agent who appeared on Jenkins' behalf thereupon gave the revising barrister notice in writing requesting him to state a case by way of appeal in Jenkins' case:

(10) The revising barrister, however, considered that, having regard to the provisions of section 42 and 65 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843, and to the remarks of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in the case of Hambridge v. Campbell, Lawson's Registration Cases, 1893, at p. 348, he ought not to state a case.

In paragraph 14 of his report to the court, the revising barrister stated what his course of practice was in the case of disputed lodger claims; this paragraph was as follows:

"14. I treat the declaration annexed to the claim (but not the claim itself) as primâ facie evidence, and unless there is evidence in support of the objection, I allow the claim. If, however, the objector is able to raise a reasonable doubt, I hold that the primâ facie evidence in favour of the qualification is displaced, and that the claimant must attend and prove his claim. I have the less difficulty in treating the primâ facie evidence as rebutted in South Hackney than elsewhere, because it is apparent on the face of the claims, and was expressly admitted by both political agents during the revision, that in the case of old and new lodgers alike the agents fill in all particulars, including the amount of rent, in the form of claim and declaration before it is sent to the claimant for signature. The result is, that the evidence afforded by the declaration is, in my opinion, highly unsatisfactory in the majority of cases."

In paragraph 21 of his report the revising barrister stated a further reason (in addition to those stated above) why he refused to state a case. The paragraph is as follows:

"21. Moreover I was of opinion that by stating a case I should be throwing doubt upon the existence of the power of the revising barrister to require the personal attendance of the claimant in a case where the primâ facie evidence of the claim is displaced, and where there is in addition reason to suspect, as I suspected, the prevalence of a wholesale manufacture of unqualified votes. The overseers do not exercise the same supervision in the case of lodger claimants as they exercise in the case of other claimants, and indeed have been advised by counsel that they have no power to incur any expenses in investigating lodger claims. Practically the only check upon such a manufacture as I have indicated, is the power already referred to of the revising barrister, and I was unwilling to disparage it. I therefore declined to state a case unless directed to do so by the court."

The following was the form of Jenkins' claim; it was in accordance with statutory form prescribed by the Registration Order, 1895, "Form No. 2."

"To the Town Clerk of the Metropolitan Borough of Hackney.

"I claim to have my name inserted as a lodger among the Parliamentary electors for the South Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Hackney in respect of the qualification named below:

Name of claimant in full, surname being first.	Description of rooms occupied and whether furnished or not.	Street and No. (if any) of house in which lodgings situate.	Amount of rent paid.	Name and address of landlord to whom rent is paid.
Jenkins, William	Two rooms top floor unfurnished.	8, Adastreet	5s. 6d. per week	James John Fergusson (same address)

"I hereby declare that I have, during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the 15th day of July in this year, occupied as sole tenant and resided in the above-mentioned lodgings, and that those lodgings are of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards, and I hereby declare that I am on the register of Parliamentary electors for the said Parliamentary borough in respect of the same lodgings as above mentioned, and I desire to have my name inserted in the old lodgers' list.

"Dated the 20th day of July, 1903.

"(Signed) WILLIAM JENKINS."

"I, the undersigned, hereby declare that I have witnessed the above signature of the above-named William Jenkins, at the date stated above, and that I believe the above claim to be correct.

"Dated the 20th day of July, 1903."

The name, residence, and calling of the person who witnessed the claimant's signature was then set out.

Jenkins' claim had been duly objected to on the ground that his lodgings were not of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards; and the notice of objection had been duly served on the 20th of August upon Jenkins. The other material facts are sufficiently stated in the above-mentioned written report submitted by the revising barrister to the court.

The procedure as to an appeal from a revising barrister is governed by sections 42 and 65 of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18). Section 42 enacts that "It shall be lawful for any person who shall have made any claim to have his name inserted in any list . . . or whose name shall have been expunged from any list, and who in any such case shall be aggrieved by or dissatisfied with any decision of any revising barrister on any point of law material to the result of such case, either by himself or by some person on his behalf to give to the revising barrister in court before the rising of the said court on the same day on which such decisions shall have been pronounced, a notice in writing that he is desirous to appeal . . . and the said barrister, thereupon, if he thinks it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be entertained, shall state in writing the facts which according to his judgment shall have been established by the evidence in the case, and which shall be material to the matter in question . . . and his decision upon the point of law in question appealed against, and such statement shall be made as nearly as conveniently may be in like manner as is now usual in stating any special case for the opinion of the court upon any decision of any court of quarter sessions. . . . "

Section 65 enacts as follows: "No appeal or notice of appeal . . . shall be received or allowed against any decision of any revising barrister upon any question of fact only, or upon the admissibility or effect of any evidence or admission adduced or made in any case to establish any matter of fact only. . . . "

Section 37 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), provides that "If any person feels aggrieved by a revising barrister neglecting or refusing to state any case, he may within one month after such neglect or refusal apply to the High Court of Justice upon affidavit of the facts, for a rule calling on the revising barrister . . . to show cause why a rule should not be made directing the appeal to be entertained and the case to be stated, and thereupon the High Court or any judge thereof . . . may make such rule to show cause and make the same absolute, or discharge it . . . as seems just; and the revising barrister on being served with any such rule absolute shall state the case accordingly. . . . "

The following are the other material Acts and sections bearing on the present case:

As to the lodger franchise, section 4 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102) provides: "Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter who is qualified as follows (that is to say), (2) As a lodger has occupied in the same borough separately and as sole tenant for the twelve months preceding the 15th day of July in any year the same lodgings, such lodgings being . . . of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards."

Section 22 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), provides that "where a person is entered in respect of lodgings on the register of voters for the time being in force, and desires to be entered in the next register in respect of the same lodgings, he may claim to be so registered by sending notice of his claim to the overseers on or before the 25th of July"; and the overseers are by that section directed to publish lists of all persons so claiming; and such lists "shall for the purposes of the Registration Acts be deemed to be lists of voters, and the provisions of the Registration Acts as to objections shall apply to such lists."

Section 23 of the same Act enacts as follows: "In the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall, for the purposes of revision, be primâ facie evidence of his qualification."

Section 28 of the same Act enacts as follows: "A revising barrister shall with respect to the lists of voters perform the duties and have the powers following: . . . (9) Subject as herein and otherwise by law provided, the revising barrister shall retain the name of every person not objected to, and also of every person objected to, unless the objector appears by himself, or by some person on his behalf, in support of his objection. (10) If the objector so appears, the revising barrister shall require him . . . to prove that he gave the notice of objection required by law to be given by him, and to give primâ facie proof of the ground of objection, and for that purpose may himself examine, and allow the objector to examine, the overseers or any other person on oath touching the alleged ground of objection, and unless such proof is given to his satisfaction shall, subject as herein and otherwise by law provided, retain the name of the person objected to. The primâ facie proof shall be deemed to be given by the objector if it is shown to the satisfaction of the revising barrister by evidence, repute, or otherwise that there is reasonable ground for believing that the objection is well founded, and that, by reason of the person objected to not being present for examination, or for some other reason, the objector is prevented from discovering or proving the truth respecting the entry objected to. (11) If such proof is given by the objector as herein prescribed, or if the objection is by overseers, then unless the person objected to appears by himself or by some person on his behalf, and proves that he was entitled on the 15th day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list in respect of the qualification described in such list, the revising barrister shall expunge the name of the person objected to."

Nov. 6.—Sutton, for the revising barrister, showed cause against the order nisi.—The affidavits on which the order nisi, was obtained do not state the facts fully or accurately. The true facts are stated in the written report which the revising barrister has submitted to the court. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Why is the report not made in the form of an affidavit?] The revising barrister considered that, having regard to the observations of the court in In re Bane, Weekly Notes (1879), p. 200, he ought to make his report in the form of a written statement not verified on oath. [KENNEDY, J.—In Rogers on Registration (16th ed.), at p. 340, it is stated that Grove, J., in In re Sale, Saint's Registration Cases (2nd ed.), p. 443, is reported to have said that the observations in In re Bane were not to be understood as applying to all cases, but had reference only to the particular circumstances of that case; and in the subsequent case of Reg. v. Soden (Syke's case), 45 W. R. 234, Smith's Registration Cases (1896), p. 115, there was an affidavit made by the revising barrister.] The revising barrister is quite prepared to make his statement in the form of an affidavit if the court thinks it proper to do so. [Lewis Thomas.—I take no objection to the barrister's report not being in the form of an affidavit.] [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think it better that in future the barrister's statement should be made by affidavit, though, of course, there may be cases in which the matter cannot be put on affidavit.] The question of yearly value is a question of fact. The barrister had before him, on the one side, the statement in the declaration annexed to the lodger claim that the lodgings were of the clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards, and that statement was, no doubt, by virtue of section 23 of the Act of 1878, primâ facie evidence of value; on the other hand, he had before him the following facts—namely, that the rateable value of the whole house was only £14, that the class of houses in this street was as poor as any he had inspected personally, that in former years no objection had been taken to lodger claims on the ground of value, and that the claimant had ignored the written notice which the barrister sent him on the 15th of September. It was therefore a question of the balance of evidence as to a matter of fact—viz., the value of the lodgings—and consequently, having regard to section 65 of the Act of 1843, the barrister's decision was not a matter of appeal. The evidence as to the rateable value of the whole house was an important, although not a conclusive, element, and the fact of the claimant's ignoring the notice was also material. The Scotch cases of Andrews v. Armstrong, (1897) 25 Rettie 95; Stirling v. Fletcher, (1895) 23 Rettie 120; and Hamilton v. Ferguson, (1897) 25 Rettie 94, cover the present case, and also show that no appeal lies in such a case. Kellie v. Little, (1897) 24 Rettie 379, is also an authority showing that the rateable value of the house is an element—though not a conclusive one—on the question of value, and that case was followed in Flynn's case, (1899) Lawson's Registration Cases 1894-1900, at p. 287. [Lewis Thomas.—I shall rely on Flynn's case as a strong authority in my favour.] The case of Nuth v. Tamplin, 8 Q. B. D. 255, which has been relied by the claimant, has no application here; it only decided that section 23 of the Act of 1878 applied to new lodger as well as to old lodger claims. I rely on the concluding portion of sub-section 10 of section 28 of the Act of 1878.

Lewis Thomas, for Jenkins, in support of the order nisi.—The report of the revising barrister discloses no single fact which is evidence, apart from the statutory declaration which the claimant had made as to the value of his lodgings. The claimant was entitled to ignore the written notice sent by the revising barrister on the 15th of September, which was sent out in fact before he held any court at all, and before the case had been gone into at all. The revising barrister had no right or authority to send any such notice to the claimant saying "your name will or may be struck off unless you come here with some specified form of evidence, such as your rent-book." [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Are you satisfied, Mr. Thomas, to take this report of the barrister as the statement of a special case?] I must take what the revising barrister says are the facts. [He was stopped.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am not quite clear whether there is not a point of law involved here with regard to the nature of the evidence, which, as it appears from his report, the barrister was acting upon. My brother Kennedy and I both think that there is quite sufficient evidence to have the case raised. We will treat the report of the revising barrister as the statement of a special case, and we make the rule nisi absolute. The revising barrister, however, can add anything further to the report if he wishes to do so; and the report so altered will be treated as a special case.

Order nisi made absolute.

Solicitors for the applicant, Russell, Cooke, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) } Nov. 16; Dec. 21.

JENKINS v. GROCOTT. (a.)

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Lodger claim—Objection as to value—Evidence pro and con*—Revising barrister—Jurisdiction—Registration Act*, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18), ss. 42, 65*—Representation of the People Act*, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 4, sub-section 2*—Parliamentary Registration Act*, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), ss. 22, 23; s. 28, sub sections 10, 11; s. 36.

A revising barrister has no jurisdiction to make the allowance of a lodger claimant's vote dependent upon the claimant's compliance with a requirement that he shall attend personally; the only way in which a lodger claimant's personal attendance can be required is by means of a summons under section 36 of the Registration Act, 1878.

Section 28 of the Registration Act, 1878, does not absolutely confine the right of a revising barrister to disallow a lodger claim to the case of such primâ facie proof of the ground of objection being given as is described in sub-section 10 of that section; that sub-section deals only with one special method of establishing a primâ facie case against the claim; and, therefore, even although the objector's case does not satisfy sub-section 10, it may still consist of evidence against the lodger's claim, which the revising barrister is entitled to weigh and ought to give effect to by allowing the objection, if he thinks that the weight of such evidence is sufficient to outweigh the evidence of the lodger's declaration (which by section 23 of the Act of 1878 is constituted primâ facie evidence of the qualification) and any other evidence confirmatory of the declaration which the claimant may think proper to adduce. As to the weight and effect of such evidence pro and con, the revising barrister is the constituted judge, and no appeal lies from his decision.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the Parliamentary Borough of Hackney, whereby he disallowed the claim of the appellant William Jenkins to be registered as an old lodger for the South Hackney Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Hackney.

The facts of the case are fully stated in Rex v. Nepean, ante, p. 264, and the written report submitted to the court by the revising barrister in that case was, by the direction of the court, taken to be the case stated, together with anything further the revising barrister might add to the report. The revising barrister added a further paragraph by way of amplification to paragraph 14 of his report, set out in Rex v. Nepean.

"14A. The question" (as to the course of practice adopted by the barrister in the case of disputed lodger claims) "is generally raised by the objector tendering hearsay evidence in support of his objection. For example, the objector says: 'The claimant does not occupy solely, but jointly with his brother; I have seen his brother, who says so'; or again, 'He does not pay four shillings a week, but only three shillings; his landlord told me so.' In all such cases I hold that the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds, (1894) 22 Rettie 198, precludes me from disallowing the claim on hearsay evidence; but I think I am justified in saying that the claimant must attend and prove his claim. I therefore adjourn the matter to the evening sitting, giving the claimant notice, as in the case under appeal, or summoning him to attend, pursuant to section 36 of the Registration Act, 1878, in most cases issuing a notice rather than a summons, as being less oppressive. Sub-sections 10 and 11 of section 28 of the same Act seem to render the giving of notice unnecessary, but I consider it fairer to give it."

Nov. 16.—The appeal came on for hearing on this date before a Divisional Court (Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and KENNEDY and DARLING, JJ.).

Robson, K.C., and Lewis Thomas, for the appellant Jenkins.—The point of law arising in this case is, what is the true construction and effect of that part of sub-section 10 of section 28 of the Registration Act, 1878, which enacts that "the primâ facie proof shall be deemed to be given by the objector if it is shown to the satisfaction of the revising barrister by evidence, repute, or otherwise that there is reasonable ground for believing that the objection is well founded, and"—(I emphasize the conjunction "and")—"that by reason of the person objected to not being present for examination, or for some other reason, the objector is prevented from discovering or proving the truth respecting the entry objected to." The revising barrister has given too wide a construction to that paragraph; he seems to think it is applicable to all cases. But it only applies where two facts are found to co-exist—namely, first, where the objector is prevented by reason of the absence of the claimant from discovering or proving the truth of his objection; and, secondly, in addition to that, that the revising barrister is satisfied by evidence, repute, or otherwise that the objection is well founded. The revising barrister has not found as a fact—and could not so find—that the objector in this case was prevented, by reason of the absence of the claimant, from proving the truth of his objection in the ordinary form; he has found that he was satisfied "by evidence, repute, or otherwise" that the objection was well founded; but we submit that those words in the sub-section only apply to a case where the objector is prevented, by the claimant's non-attendance, from being able to discover or prove the ground of his objection. The objector could have asked the claimant's landlord (whose name and address appears, as it was bound to appear, on the claim) as to whether the claimant did in fact pay 5s. 6d. a week rent; or he could have applied to the barrister to issue a summons either to the claimant or his landlord to attend, but he took no steps whatever to try and prove his objection. Under section 36 of the Registration Act, 1878, the barrister has power to issue a summons to any person to attend, under pain of a fine. Section 23 of the Act of 1878 enacts that the declaration annexed to the lodgers' claim shall be primâ facie evidence of his qualification. The barrister states in paragraph 14 of his report that if the objector was able to raise a reasonable doubt, he (the barrister) would hold that the primâ facie evidence in favour of the qualification was displaced, and that the claimant should attend and prove his claim; and in paragraph 21 the revising barrister states that one of the reasons why he refused to state a case was, lest he should be throwing doubt upon the existence of the power of the revising barrister to require the personal attendance of the claimant in a case where the primâ facie evidence of the claim was displaced. That, we submit, was a wholly wrong procedure; the barrister had no right to make the personal attendance of a lodger claimant a condition precedent to the allowance of the claim simply because the barrister had a reasonable doubt in his mind as to the validity of the claim; he should also be satisfied and find as a fact that by reason of the non-attendance of the claimant the objector was prevented from discovering or proving the truth of the objection. Though the claimant Jenkins did not attend personally to prove his claim, yet he was represented by the registration agent, who was present for that purpose. There was no evidence at all that the objector was prevented from proving the truth of his objection by reason of the non-attendance of Jenkins. The statutory provision making the declaration primâ facie evidence would be absolutely worthless if it can be displaced—not by rebutting evidence in the legal sense of evidence—but by repute or otherwise. [KENNEDY, J.—As I read the clause in sub-section 10, the words "if the barrister is satisfied by evidence, repute, or otherwise" apply to both branches of the clause—namely, to there being reasonable ground for believing that the objection is well founded, and also to the barrister being satisfied that by reason of the non-attendance of the person objected to or for some other reason, the objector is prevented from discovering the truth.] Flynn's case, Weekly Notes, 1900, at p. 230, is a distinct authority, that although the rateable value of the house is of some importance when the general question is being considered, yet standing alone and unrebutted, it is not primâ facie proof of an objection as to value. The evidence on which the revising barrister acted here was not evidence constituting primâ facie proof of the ground of the objection; it was merely a relevant circumstance, but was not sufficient to displace the statutory primâ facie evidence supplied by the claimant's declaration.

Sutton, for the respondent.—The statutory form of declaration of a lodger claimant only declares that his lodgings are of the yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards; the declaration does not purport to declare that all the particulars in the form of the claim—such as the rent paid for the lodgings—are correct. Those particulars are often filled in by the registration agents before the claim is signed by the claimant. The revising barrister has found that the claimant Jenkins failed to satisfy him that Jenkins' lodgings were of the prescribed value; and the only question for this court is whether the barrister had any evidence before him to justify that finding. The evidence which the barrister had before him is fully stated in his report. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The revising barrister has not expressly found that he was satisfied by evidence, repute, or otherwise that the objector was prevented from discovering or proving the truth respecting the entry by the non-attendance of the claimant.] He has not expressly so found, but inferentially he has. As to the cases, the Scotch cases—Andrews v. Armstrong, (1897) 25 Rettie 95; Hamilton v. Ferguson, 25 Rettie 94; and Stirling v. Fletcher. (1895) 32 Rettie 120—are important as to the effect of a claimant ignoring altogether a notice to attend, or giving no explanation on the question of value; the effect being that such conduct on the part of the claimant is an admission of the want of value. If the claimant Jenkins was himself unable to attend the evening sitting of the court on the 18th of September, he could at least have got his landlord to write to confirm the statement as to the rent paid, or have given his rent-book to the registration agent to produce to the court. The barrister was entitled to take these circumstances into consideration in arriving at his decision. If there was (as I submit there was in this case) any evidence before the barrister which would entitle him to say as a question of fact: "I am not satisfied that the claimant's lodgings are of the clearly yearly value of £10 unfurnished," then, having regard to section 65 of the Registration Act, 1843, there can be no appeal from his decision.

Robson, K.C., in reply.—The lodger's declaration is intended to be the substitute for attendance, and the claim has to be in a statutory form setting out full particulars as to the lodgings, the amount of rent paid, and the name and address of the landlord: full means of information are therefore given by the claim to the objector. The only condition under which a lodger claimant can be called on to attend is where the objector has given primâ facie proof of the objection and is prevented from discovering the truth by the absence of the claimant, or otherwise.

Sutton further cited Neilson v. Bryan, Lawson Registration Cases 1901, p. 10, an Irish case, in which Fitzgibbon, L.J., said, "If the objector was able to raise a reasonable doubt on the subject" (i.e., the value of the lodgings) "the primâ facie case in favour of the qualification would have been displaced, and the claimant would have to come up and show that he gave good consideration."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

KENNEDY, J.—The material facts appearing in the special case are these: The claimant duly sent in his declaration annexed to his statement of claim. This was, under the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 23, primâ facie evidence of his qualification. The claimant was objected to on the ground that the lodgings were of insufficient value. The South Hackney list came on for revision in the Registration Court on the 15th of September. Before that date the revising barrister had made a personal inspection of the larger part of South Hackney with the borough registration officer, who had known the constituency for twenty years. He satisfied himself, he states, that the character of the constituency was very poor and the houses very small, many streets consisting entirely of houses which were little better than hovels, and that consequently the question whether or not any particular lodgings were worth £10 a year unfurnished was an extremely doubtful one. Upon the claim of Jenkins being opposed by the Conservative agent, the registration officer, in answer to a question of the revising barrister, stated that Ada-street (the street in which Jenkins' lodgings was situate) was as poor a street as any which the revising barrister had inspected; and it was proved to the satisfaction of the revising barrister that the rateable value of the whole house in which Jenkins lodged was only £14 per annum, that is, 6s. less than the amount of the rent which Jenkins in his claim stated to have been paid by him for the lodgings on which his title to be a voter depended. The town clerk, at the request of the revising barrister, had prepared a statement in regard to lodger claimants considered in relation to the rateable value of the houses in which they lodged, and this was also put in evidence. The statement appears in the schedule to the case. The relevant point in it appears to be that no less than 317 lodger claims were like that of Jenkins in respect of lodgings in houses of a rateable value of, or less than £14 per annum, and that in the case of fifty-three claims there were instances of two lodgers claiming in respect of houses whose rateable value ranged from £9 to £20. The revising barrister knew from the statement of the party agents in the previous year that they had by agreement then abstained from opposition on the ground of value to lodger claims. In the present year objection was made by the Conservative agent in numerous cases on the ground of insufficiency of value and to the claim of Jenkins amongst others. The revising barrister ordered all these cases of objection to stand over until the evening sitting of the 18th of September, stating in court that if the claimants respectively satisfied him that they paid rent amounting to £10 per annum, or that their respective lodgings were of the prescribed value, he would allow the claims, but that otherwise he would not allow them. He also gave to each claimant a notice in writing, which, in the case of Jenkins, ran thus: "To Mr. William Jenkins, of 8, Ada-street, N.E. Take notice that your claim to vote as a lodger has been objected to on the ground that your lodgings are not of the clear yearly value of £10, if let unfurnished. Your claim will, or may, be disallowed unless you produce, or cause to be produced, to me, at the evening sitting of my court, commencing at 6.30 p.m., on Friday, the 18th of September, 1903, your rent-book, or other sufficient evidence that your said lodgings are of the clear yearly value of £10 or upwards, if let unfurnished." On the 18th of September, according to the case, Jenkins did not attend. He sent no letter or other communication. No explanation of this absence was given. The revising barrister disallowed the claim.

These being the facts, the appellant contends that the decision was wrong in a point of law necessary to the decision of the case, according to the Registration Act of 1843, s. 42. The same statute provides (section 65) that there could be be no appeal on a question of fact only, or upon the admissibility or effect of any evidence or admission adduced or made in any case to establish any matter of fact only. The points of law put forward by the appellant are two. He says, first that the revising barrister improperly made the personal appearance of the claimant a condition of his allowance of the claim; secondly, that the claimant having by his declaration given that which by the express terms of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, s. 23, was primâ facie evidence of his qualification, and the objector not having given, it is contended, that which is to be deemed to be primâ facie proof of objection under section 28, sub-section 10, of the same statute, the revising barrister was not in point of law entitled to require of the claimant what he did require by his oral notice given in court on the 15th of September, and by the notice of the same date sent the claimant in writing; and upon the claimant's failure to comply with these requirements to disallow the claim.

As to the first point, we are clearly of opinion that if a revising barrister in such a case as the present made the personal attendance of a claimant a condition of the allowance of his vote, he would be doing that which the law does not authorize. No statutory sanction for such a requirement was cited to us, and we are aware of none. The only way in which the claimant's personal attendance can be compelled is under the provisions of section 36 of the Registration Act, 1878, which empowers the revising barrister by summons under his hand to require any person to attend and give evidence or produce documents. Section 28, sub-section 11, of the same Act, to which we shall refer presently, makes sufficient the appearance of the claimant "by himself or by some person on his behalf." In commenting upon this enactment Mr. Rogers, in the 16th edition of his work (Rogers on Elections: Registration Appeals), at p. 322, speaks of these words as dispensing with the necessity of personal attendance of the person objected to, if he is represented by some one in court. "But, of course," he adds, "the absence of a person objected to will in some cases weigh with the revising barrister in deciding as to the facts of the case." If in this case the revising barrister could be shown to have made the allowance of the claimant's vote dependent upon his compliance with a requirement of personal attendance and had disallowed his claim because the claimant did not personally appear, we should be of opinion that his decision could not be supported. But, as we understand the facts, although the revising barrister seems by the statements in paragraphs 14 and 21 of the special case to have entertained a mistaken opinion on this point of the personal appearance in court, it appears to us to be the fair interpretation of the special case and of the written notice sent to Jenkins, which we have already cited, that he did not disallow this vote or intimate, either by his statement in court or by the written notice, that he would disallow it on the ground of the failure of the claimant to appear personally on the 18th of September. He gave notice that he should require certain evidence to support the claim; but neither orally nor by notice did he insist upon the personal attendance of the claimant; in fact, as the case tells us, in some cases where claimants were unable to attend he accepted as sufficient evidence letters written by them to him stating that they had paid rent sufficient to satisfy the statutory standard of qualification. We desire to express our view that the statute does not make personal attendance absolutely necessary; such a requirement might entail serious hardship in the case of these lodger claimants who, to a very large extent, form part of a very poor class which could ill afford to bear the loss of time involved in personal attendance at the proceedings of the revising barrister's court.

We now pass to the second point made by the appellant, that the provisions of section 28, sub-section 10, have not been complied with. In our view this contention rests upon an erroneous conception of the meaning and intent of this enactment. It is not intended by the Legislature, in our view, absolutely to confine the right of the revising barrister to disallow a claim when the claimant has by his declaration given primâ facie evidence of his declaration, to the case of such primâ facie proof of the ground of objection as is therein described. Section 28, sub-section 10, deals only with one special method of establishing a primâ facie case against the claim, and then in sub-section 11 goes on to say that in case of such primâ facie proof of objection being given the revising barrister shall (not may) expunge the name of the person objected to unless the person objected to appears by himself or by some person on his behalf and proves his title to inclusion in the list of voters. The section does not prevent the revising barrister from considering and, if he thinks it just, giving effect to, by a decision adverse to the claim, any proper evidence against the claim. If, to take a single example, the objector, in order to meet the primâ facie evidence afforded by the claimant's declaration, at once called the landlord or produced the lodger's rent-book, and by this evidence proved that the rent paid was much below the statutory standard, the revising barrister would, in our view, clearly be entitled in point of law to say that if the matter stood there he had evidence which entitled him to reject the claim. As to the weight of such evidence and the proper effect to be given to it, he is the constituted judge, and no appeal lies from his decision. Section 28, sub-section 10, and sub-section 11, merely enacts in substance that if the objector's primâ facie proof of the ground of objection is made out in a particular way, then, unless it is rebutted in a particular way, the revising barrister must disallow the claim. If the objector's case does not satisfy section 28, sub-section 10, it still may consist of evidence against the claim which the revising barrister is entitled to weigh, and may give (and ought to give) effect to, if he thinks its weight is sufficient to outweigh the primâ facie evidence of the claimant's delaration, and any other evidence confirmatory of the declaration which the claimant may think proper to adduce.

In this case the revising barrister had on one side the declaration, and on the other side the rating of the house within formation as to the character of the street in which it was situated. The rating was not necessarily conclusive evidence against the claim; it was some evidence only, as the court pointed out in regard to the valuation roll in Kellie v. Little; and the revising barrister decided to give the claimant the chance, if he wished to take it, of "producing or causing to be produced" at a later sitting of the court evidence, either by his rent-book or otherwise, in support of the declaration. Many other claimants in the like position availed themselves of the chance, and succeeded; this claimant did not do so; and the revising barrister, in this state of things, held adversely to the claim. He had to decide what effect he ought to give to the evidence pro and con; and even if this court could upon the same evidence have decided otherwise it has no power to overrule his decision.

Appeal dismissed, without costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Russell, Cooke & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } July 29, 30, 1903.

WILSON v. BASSET. (a.)

Probate—Undue influence—Fraud—Costs.

The Court held that, inasmuch as there did not appear to be anything unreasonable in the charge of undue influence and fraud being made, it was justified in allowing the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client to come out of the estate, and subject thereto the costs of the defendant as between party and party to be paid out of the estate also.

Action.

The plaintiff in the action, Frances Mary Wilson, claimed revocation of probate of a will dated the 2nd of December, 1892, the probate having been granted on the 22nd of June, 1902, and she propounded a will dated the 28th of May, 1900.

The testatrix, Eliza Sarah Bird, died on the 2nd of April, 1902, and the plaintiff was her niece.

The defendant, who was a nephew of the deceased, pleaded, inter alia, that the execution of the will was obtained by the undue influence of the plaintiff, and stated that the substance of his case was that the plaintiff and her mother had threatened to send the testatrix, who was a woman of 82 years of age, to the workhouse unless she made a will in favour of the plaintiff.

With respect to the allegation of fraud the defendant alleged that the plaintiff and her husband had led the deceased to believe that the defendant was a bankrupt and was unable to assist her financially.

The facts were shortly as follows: In May, 1900, the plaintiff's husband called on a gentleman named Wright, who was not a solicitor, and asked him to take instructions from the testatrix for her will. This he did, and the testatrix in the presence of the plaintiff stated that she wished to leave all her property to the plaintiff. A solicitor, on the suggestion of Mr. Wright was subsequently sent for, who drew a will, and this was the one dated the 28th of May, 1900. The doctor and the clergyman deposed to the fact that the deceased appeared to be perfectly rational and to have understood what she was doing.

The court found for the will, and negatived the charge of fraud and undue influence.

W. O. Willis, for the plaintiff, asked that the defendant should be condemned in costs in accordance with the usual practice where a charge of undue influence and fraud was put upon the record and failed.

Slade Butler, for the defendant, contended that there was no hard and fast rule.

He cited Orton v. Smith, 3 P. & D. 23; Fulton v. Andrew, 7 H. L. 448; Tyrrell v. Painton, [1894] P. 151.

WALTON, J., in delivering judgment, said the present case being within Brown v. Fisher, 63 L. T. 465, and Fulton v. Andrew, 7 H. L. 448, there was a presumption against the will of May, 1900, which presumption the person propounding the will was bound to rebut, as Lord Hatherley said in Fulton v. Andrew, "by showing the righteousness of the transaction." The defendant was, at all events primâ facie, entitled to presume what the law presumes, and to call upon the plaintiff to prove not merely the valid execution of the will, but also that it was not obtained by fraud or undue influence, and that it does really express the true will of the deceased. The defendant did this by pleading undue influence and fraud. There may be cases which fall within the rule laid down in Brown v. Fisher, 63 L. T. 465, and in which, nevertheless, the circumstances may be such as make it unreasonable for the person disputing the will to plead undue influence and fraud. But there is nothing in the circumstances of the present case which made it unreasonable for the defendant by his pleading to raise those issues. I think that the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the plaintiff reasonably excited suspicion and justified those pleas.

The fact that the plaintiff has now, by the evidence adduced on her behalf, succeeded in discharging the additional burden of proof, does not affect the right which the defendant had to call upon her to do it. I shall follow the case of Orton v. Smith, 3 P. & D. 23, and, in doing so, I do not think that I am departing from the established practice. The order I make is that the plaintiff's costs, as between solicitor and client, be taken by her out of the estate, and, subject thereto, that the costs of the defendant as between party and party be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Welman & Sons, for Last & Goodford, Windsor.

Solicitor for defendant, R. L. Butler.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } Oct. 30.

PAIN v. PAIN. (a.)

Divorce—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), s. 5—Desertion—Condonation—Revival.

The Court held that the statutory offence of desertion created by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, may be revived by subsequent adultery.

This was a petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion. The desertion had been condoned and the question for the consideration of the court was whether that offence, which was the statutory offence created by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, could be revived by subsequent adultery.

The facts were shortly as follows:

In September, 1901, the husband left the wife, telling her that he intended to go away with a woman and that nothing would alter his determination. The wife then filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights and obtained a decree which the husband did not comply with. She then filed a petition for dissolution of marriage, but during the pendency of that suit she resumed cohabitation on an assurance that her husband had given up the woman. The petition was then dismissed by consent. She subsequently discovered that her husband was still intriguing with the woman in question, and she thereupon declined to live any longer with her husband, who accordingly left her on the 10th of February, 1903, and in the following month this petition for dissolution was filed.

Priestley, K.C., and Barnard, for the petitioner, cited Blandford v. Blandford, 8 P. D. 19, and Bigwood v. Bigwood, 13 P. D. 89.

Le Bas, for the respondent, did not oppose the suit.

BARNES, J., held that the statutory offence of desertion had been revived by the subsequent adultery, and pronounced a decree nisi.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Norris & Norris.

Solicitors for the respondent, Keen, Rogers, & Co.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } May 4, 18, 1903.

HOUGHTON v. HOUGHTON. (a.)

Divorce—Incest—Condonation—Revival—Desertion.

The husband committed incestuous adultery, which the wife condoned, but he afterwards deserted her.

The Court held that such desertion revived the condoned incestuous adultery, and granted a decree nisi.

This was an undefended suit. The facts were briefly as follows:

Mary Jane Houghton was married to David John Houghton in 1887, and there had been one child of the marriage.

In the year following the husband committed adultery with the wife's sister, but in order to avoid scandal the wife forgave her husband and lived with him, at least to the extent that marital intercourse was renewed between them, although for some months the incestuous adultery continued. About five years after the last act of incest the husband went to Canada, stating that he was going for eighteen months for his health, and for a time he corresponded with his wife.

In 1901 the husband obtained a decree at Detroit, U.S.A., dissolving his marriage on the ground of desertion, but the wife was not served with the documents in that suit.

In 1902 the husband returned to this country for a short time, but did not go back to the wife.

Since the husband's first leaving for Canada, the wife had maintained herself by keeping a tobacconist's shop, and afterwards by taking a situation as a housekeeper, and the reason, as she alleged, for not taking proceedings when the offence of desertion was complete was her want of means.

Newson, for the petitioner, contended that the wife was entitled to a decree of this court dissolving her marriage on the ground of incest; for, although it had been condoned by subsequent cohabitation and intercourse, the incest had been revived by the desertion. Although desertion was not an offence known to the ecclesiastical courts it would, since its creation by statute, have the same power to revive a matrimonial offence as the older offences had. There was no case which decided that it would have that power; but the words in Dent v. Dent, 4 Sw. & Tr. 105, and Cooke v. Cooke, 3 Sw. & Tr. 126, on the doctrine of the revival of a condoned offence were very wide and might by implication fairly include the offence of desertion.

He cited also Palmer v. Palmer, 29 L. J. P. M. & A. 124; Cargill v. Cargill, 1 Sw. & Tr. 235; and Binney v. Binney, 69 L. T. 491.

Cur. adv. vult.

